The White House is hoping this analysis is right. "Public opinion is not going to change overnight, and we understood that going into these speeches," Bartlett said. "But that doesn't lessen his responsibility as the leader of this country in a time of war to carefully explain the conduct and developments of this war."

Osama's Spin Lessons (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Somewhere, Osama bin Laden must be smiling. Or at least he will be whenever his couriers deliver the next batch of press clippings.

Once again he has beaten America at an American game: public relations. He may be sitting powerlessly in a cave, but his image is as scary as ever. He doesn't even have to cut a new video. He released an old one last week, the equivalent of a fading musician putting out a greatest-hits album, only this one's getting played every hour.

Last night, President Bush paid him homage by quoting his warning that America will face "defeat and disgrace forever" it if loses in Iraq. Bush himself called the war on terror a "struggle for civilization," and said it was essential to "maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations."

It was just the kind of apocalyptic language favored by bin Laden, except that, for all his delusions, he might realize that American civilization is not really in jeopardy. Americans can try to copy him, but they don't understand his rhetorical technique.

They continually misinterpret his equine theory of international relations: "When people see a strong horse and a weak horse, by nature, they will like the strong horse." This is supposedly a reason America was attacked on Sept. 11 — it was perceived as weak for failing to respond to Al Qaeda's earlier attacks — and why it can't leave Iraq.

If we falter in Iraq, Vice President Dick Cheney explained to Tim Russert on Sunday, the war on terror will falter because people will say: "My gosh, the United States hasn't got the stomach for the fight. Bin Laden's right, Al Qaeda's right, the United States has lost its will and will not complete the mission."

But bin Laden knows something else the Bush administration hasn't figured out: You don't actually have to be the strong horse. You just have to look stronger. You can be weak, you can be pummeled in a fight, but as long as your opponent looks more scared than you, you can save face by simply declaring victory.

As an act of war, the attack on Sept. 11 was a blunder by Al Qaeda, and not merely because of the counterattack that destroyed Al Qaeda's training camps and ousted the Taliban. It also alienated former jihadist allies in the Arab world, and caused a rift within Al Qaeda.

One of its senior members, Abu al-Walid al-Masri, broke with bin Laden and accused him of having an "extreme infatuation" with international publicity. The attack, as Fawaz Gerges notes in Foreign Policy magazine, demonstrated that "bin Laden was prepared to sacrifice Afghanistan and Mullah Omar at the altar of his public relations campaign."

But at least bin Laden knew his P.R. Al Qaeda wasn't a serious military threat to America, but it could play one on television. As Al Qaeda's losses mounted and America recovered from the attack, bin Laden and his cohorts didn't let the facts get in the way of their campaign to promote fear (and themselves). They hid in caves and proclaimed themselves champions.

America, meanwhile, accentuated the negative. Instead of declaring victory against terrorists after routing the Taliban and sending bin Laden into hiding, it invaded Iraq, reinvigorating Al Qaeda with a new tool for recruiting. Instead of putting the terrorist risk in perspective, Bush (with the full cooperation of Democrats and the press) set an impossible standard for making America safe.

"We're on the offense against the terrorists on every battlefront," Bush said last week, "and we'll accept nothing less than complete victory."

When you define victory that way, when you treat one attack from a disorganized band of fanatics as a menace to civilization, you've doomed yourself to defeat and caused more damage than they could. You can't completely stop terrorism, but you can scare people into giving up liberties, wasting huge sums of money and sacrificing more lives than would be lost in a terrorist attack.

Take it from bin Laden, who bragged in 2004 that it was "easy to provoke and bait this administration."

"All that we have to do," he said, "is to send two mujahedeen to the farthest point east to raise a piece of cloth on which is written Al Qaeda, in order to make the generals race there to cause America to suffer human, economic and political losses." And then Al Qaeda, no matter what losses it has suffered, will come off once again looking like the strong horse.

Bin Laden's Victory (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK -- I hear Osama bin Laden laughing. I heard him all day on Sunday and Monday as the mass murder of Sept. 11, 2001, was memorialized at the Pentagon and in that field in Pennsylvania and especially here, where the most people died and where countless cameras recorded it all for posterity and an abiding, everlasting anger. He laughs, the madman does, whenever George Bush says, as he has over and over, that America is "winning this war on terror." Bin Laden knows better. He has already won.

It is not merely that bin Laden has not been captured or killed and that videotapes keep coming out of his hideout like taunts. It is, rather, that his initial strategy has borne fruit. It was always his intention to draw the Americans into Afghanistan, where, as had been done to the Soviets, they could be mauled by the fierce mujaheddin. He tried and failed when he blew up the USS Cole off Aden at 11:15 a.m. on Oct. 12, 2000, killing 17 sailors and crippling the ship. But he succeeded beyond his wildest expectations when the United States responded to the Sept. 11 attacks by invading Afghanistan and, in a beat, then going to war in Iraq. It remains mired in both countries to this day.

From bin Laden's standpoint, this has been a glorious victory, made possible, it has to be said, by the totally unforeseen incompetence of the Bush administration. It was so intent on going to war in Iraq that it would not finish the job in Afghanistan. So, to bin Laden's absolute amazement -- I am guessing here -- the United States took on his enemy, the secular and ungodly Saddam Hussein, whom bin Laden himself would gladly have murdered. It has to be a wonderful thing when your enemy vanquishes your enemy.

On "Meet the Press" on Sunday, Dick Cheney said that if he had it to do all over again, he would still go to war in Iraq -- "we'd do exactly the same thing," he said. Why? Is the man incapable of learning from experience? We now know from umpteen reports that there was no link between bin Laden and Hussein. We now know, the Weekly Standard notwithstanding, that Mohamed Atta did not meet in Prague with someone from Iraqi intelligence. We now know that Hussein had no weapons of mass destruction and that the Iraq war -- which has cost America more than 2,500 lives, 20,000 casualties, the respect of the world and billions of dollars -- is for naught. Talleyrand said of the Bourbons that they forgot nothing and learned nothing. It will be said of Cheney that he forgot everything and learned nothing.

How did bin Laden get so lucky? How did he get so fortunate in his choice of enemies? The Bush administration not only validated his wildest dreams -- dreams that even some of his aides thought were unrealistic -- but went even further. By using torture, by the abuses at Abu Ghraib prison, by employing "extraordinary renditions" of suspects to countries where they could be tortured, by insisting on going it almost alone in Iraq, by telling the international community to shove it, by declaring a war for an idÃ©e fixe -- this fierce obsession with Hussein goes back a long way -- the United States has made itself reviled in much of the world.

And here at home, here in the United States of America, it will be a long time before lots of people trust their government again. Little wonder that 16 percent of respondents said in a recent poll that it was "very likely" that the government played some role in the Sept. 11 attacks to justify a war in the Middle East. This is a shocking figure, a measure not just of irrational thinking but of the cost of the Bush administration's mauling of the truth in its mad march to war. Bush has damaged his country more than bin Laden ever could on his own.

I was here on Sept. 11, 2001 -- downtown when the twin towers collapsed. My instantaneous reaction -- the thought that came to my mind as I heard the sound of the buildings coming down -- was for revenge. I would, to this day, kill Osama bin Laden with my own hands. But as much as I hate the man, I have to recognize that from his vantage point, from his mountain fastness somewhere on the Pakistan-Afghanistan frontier, he has won. What he had set out to do, he has done. That is more than we can say.

In Unpredictable District, Some Say Bush Is Politicizing Terrorism (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

ARVADA, Colo., Sept. 11 — Leaving services Sunday morning at Faith Bible Chapel, an evangelical megachurch, Jim McBride, a pilot who served in Vietnam, said he was not happy with President Bush's handling of Iraq. And he displayed little inclination to rethink his position despite the White House's new push to focus this year's Congressional elections on which party will keep the nation safer.

"I do have a bit of mistrust," said Mr. McBride, who said that he twice voted for Mr. Bush but that he is now disappointed — a sentiment he said is shared by many in his Bible study group. "The whole thing about W.M.D. and that Iraq is somehow tied to 9/11, I just don't believe it."

Mr. Bush has plenty of supporters in this Denver suburb and the surrounding cities, an evenly divided swing district that is a bellwether in the battle for control of the House. But interviews over the last three days here found Republicans, Democrats and independents all expressing degrees of skepticism about Mr. Bush's motives in delivering a set of high-profile speeches on terrorism and the war in Iraq two months before Election Day.

While it is too early to know whether the White House will succeed in winning over enough voters to make a difference in what is shaping up as a tight race, the interviews suggested that Mr. Bush's newest efforts to cast his party as better suited than Democrats to defend the country had yet to overcome concern and anger among many voters about Iraq and a more generalized sense of discontent with the administration.

"I have been a Republican all my life, but we have just gotten to the point where we may need a change," said Shannon Abote, an Arvada resident who was stopping at Starbucks for a coffee on Monday morning.

Many residents said they were aware only in general terms of Mr. Bush's recent speeches and his decision to bring high-level terrorism suspects to trial before military tribunals. They acknowledged that the terrorist threat often seemed distant, far removed from their busy lives in the shelter of the Rocky Mountains. Fewer than 20 people turned out Monday morning outside the Elks Club in Arvada to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"Living in the central part of the country has probably kept terrorism from the forefront of our minds," said Peter Strecker as he and his wife, Robin, strolled through downtown Golden on Saturday with their 13-month-old daughter, Paige, after a sudden downpour.

Still, even strong Bush supporters said they doubted the presidential drumbeat on terrorism would alter the political landscape here. "I think people already have their minds made up," said Michael Mason, an engineer and Golden native. "The whole thing could end tomorrow, and they would still hate his guts. The damage has been done."

The random interviews with dozens of residents across the Seventh Congressional District were not scientific. But they do suggest that Mr. Bush's public standing could be problematic for the Republican candidate in the race for the open House seat,

Rick O'Donnell, and that the Republican push on terrorism will not necessarily pack the same political punch it did in 2002 and 2004.

"I think it is the only card they have got," said Floyd Ciruli, a longtime Denver pollster, referring to the national Republican focus on terrorism. "Will it make a difference in Colorado? Absolutely not."

If so, that would be bad news for Congressional Republican leaders. They are counting on Mr. Bush's concerted efforts to both raise his own public approval and to simultaneously help give Republican House and Senate candidates an edge on the security issues that have dominated the last two national elections. But polls indicate that the climate is different this year, with fewer Americans confident that the fight against terrorism is going well, and Democrats, including Mr. O'Donnell's opponent, Ed Perlmutter, are vigorously trying to counter Mr. Bush.

"My job is to make sure that people remember that all this was brought out in '04 and '02," said Mr. Perlmutter. Republicans are resurrecting the "same old plays from the same old playbook," he said. "The war on terror is clearly an important subject, but they have made a mess of it."

Mr. O'Donnell said terrorism and the war in Iraq continued to be secondary issues in a race he described as being driven more by immigration and economic issues. "Having the president talk about the threat to the country reminds people that we live in a dangerous world, but it is not the No. 1 issue on their minds," he said.

Mr. O'Donnell, who was the beneficiary of a fund-raising visit by the president this year, has good reason to put a little distance now between himself and the president: Senator John Kerry carried the district in the 2004 presidential race.

But Mr. Bush retains his strong backers.

At the Sept. 11 ceremony on Monday in Arvada, Nancy Goodman, whose 21-year-old son is finishing a tour as a marine in Iraq, expressed full confidence in Mr. Bush's antiterrorism strategy.

"I agree with what he is doing," said Ms. Goodman, a Republican, who said the public could not always know the reasoning behind the administration's actions. "We have to trust our leadership, and we have to trust our military, and we have to trust that they want to protect us."

Blaine Engdahl, an off-duty police officer who was waving the flag Saturday as he watched Arvada's annual harvest festival parade from the back of a pickup, said: "I think he has made his mistakes, but he is trying. If we don't fight them there, we are going to be fighting them over here."

Dale Burkhart, another Bush supporter, urged the president to step up the effort to get his message across. "Everybody has forgotten why we got hit," Mr. Burkhart said. "Americans need to be continually reminded because of the way we live. We are blessed, and we take it for granted."

But independents and Democrats repeatedly characterized Mr. Bush's recent spree of speeches and actions on terrorism as a cynical effort to thrust the issue into the Congressional campaign season.

"I think it is a calculated attempt on the part of the president and Karl Rove to push terrorism before the election," said Patrick Bassett, a Democrat and software developer from Golden who was visiting a mall in Aurora. "All these issues could have been brought up at an earlier time."

Robin Dodich, a retired teacher and self-described independent who was part of a small group of antiwar protesters along the Aurora parade route, called Mr. Bush's recent actions disgusting.

"Republicans believe their party is in trouble and they want to help their campaigns," Ms. Dodich said. "It is almost like Bush is frantic."

Nation Pays Tribute To Heroes (USAT)

By Rick Hampson And Charisse Jones

USA Today, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK — Americans solemnly remembered and mourned Monday the lives lost five years ago in the worst terror attacks on the nation, a tragedy that President Bush said brought "extraordinary acts of courage" and heroism from ordinary citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0061522

Ceremonies marked the Sept. 11 anniversary at Ground Zero, the former site of the World Trade Center towers, and at the Pentagon and in a Pennsylvania field where Americans died in attacks that propelled the nation to war.

More somber memorials were held in schools, churches and other places across a nation still seared by the fresh memory of that day.

Bush began the remembrances at a New York firehouse, laying a wreath and mingling with firefighters and police officers who were among the first to rush to the burning towers. He visited 9/11 crash sites in Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon before returning to the White House to deliver a prime-time television address.

Bush paid tribute to the heroism of "ordinary citizens rising to the occasion," and described the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq that have ensued as "a struggle for civilization."

"We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations," he said. "We are fighting for the possibility that good and decent people across the Middle East can raise up societies based on freedom, and tolerance, and personal dignity."

He said the nation faces "a difficult road ahead."

"If we do not defeat these enemies now, we will leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons," he said.

At Ground Zero, a procession of loved ones read the names of the 2,749 people who died in the collapse of the twin towers. Some held photos. Many sobbed.

"There's no way to mend a broken heart," said ToniAnn Carroll, wife of Peter Carroll, a New York firefighter who died at the World Trade Center.

The Trade Center site fell quiet at 8:46 a.m. and 9:03 a.m., the moments in 2001 when hijackers crashed jetliners into the twin towers.

At the Pentagon, where 184 people died when a jetliner flew into the building, Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld led the observance.

In the Pennsylvania field where 40 people aboard United Flight 93 died hundreds gathered at a temporary memorial — a chain-link fence covered with U.S. flags, firefighter helmets and children's drawings. "We should be thinking about remembering on Sept. 12th and 13th and 14th, when America really came together," said Jerry Bingham, whose son, Mark, died on Flight 93. "Somewhere along the line, we lost that."

Survivors At Three Gatherings Talk Of Heroism, Loss And Love (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, September 12, 2006

From Ground Zero to the Pentagon and a remote field in western Pennsylvania, Monday's fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks prompted Americans to measure the day's meaning through the words and tears of the victims' survivors.

Memorials, dedications and religious services marked the day when Muslim extremists turned jetliners into weapons and ushered in what has come to seem like the age of terrorism.

"It surely cannot be easy to come to this site and speak out loud the name of the person you had thought would always be next to you," New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg told thousands at Ground Zero, where 2,749 died when the World Trade Center towers collapsed. "We stand by your side, yet who can know what is in your hearts?"

He soon got an answer. After reciting their loved ones' names, many relatives — like others in other places — said what was in their hearts:

•"I miss you, and I need you." — Eulogia Hernandez, wife of Nuberto.

•"The greatest gift I can give you is the gift of remembrance. Love you, babe." — Joanne Grzelak, wife of Joseph.

•"The cost of freedom is vigilance." — Nicholas Chiarchiaro, husband of Dorothy Chiarchiaro and uncle of Delores Marie Costa.

There were promises: "Don't worry, your granddaughter will know all about her Poppa," Stephanie Esposito told her husband, William.

Requests: "Keep your shadow on us … so that I do not lose my path," Sneh Jain asked her husband, Yudh Vir Sing Jain.

The expressions of grief, longing and hope came amid public sentiment that the war on terror is far from over. A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found last month that four of five Americans think suicide bombers probably will strike a crowded U.S. location in the next five years.

There were reminders of those fears Monday. New York's Pennsylvania Station was evacuated because of a suspicious duffel bag that turned out to hold nothing but trash. A jet bound for San Francisco was diverted to Dallas after a backpack and handheld e-mail device were found on board. Both were harmless.

Everywhere, Americans remembered. At Boston's Logan Airport, where two teams of 9/11 terrorists boarded jets they later crashed into the World Trade Center, security screeners wore wristbands reading "We will never forget" and stopped checking passengers for a moment to mark the anniversary. In Akron, Ohio, firefighters sounded sirens for 30 seconds to symbolize the moments the twin towers fell. In San Diego's Balboa Park, 500 people held a remembrance walk.

At the three hallowed sites where almost 3,000 people died, a nation mourned, reflected and moved forward:

America Marks A Grim Anniversary (WP)

By Michael Powell, Josh White And Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

In three wounded communities yesterday, the nation commemorated the worst terrorist attack in American history, as bells sounded, thousands murmured prayers and the families of victims once again read the names of their lost loved ones.

On the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 hijackings, there was an aching familiarity to the rituals. In New York, family members recited 2,749 names, punctuated by violins and the wail of bagpipes, to the drawn and tearful faces of the families of the victims.

President Bush joined the commemoration in New York, journeying to Ground Zero on Sunday night to lay a wreath and then sharing Monday breakfast with 75 firefighters at a firehouse, nicknamed Fort Pitt, on the Lower East Side. He later flew to Pennsylvania to lay a wreath in the Shanksville farm field where United Airlines Flight 93 hurtled to Earth, and then he traveled on to the Pentagon.

Families and firefighters and cops in New York filed slowly down ramps into the three-story-deep pit that is Ground Zero, gray slurry walls rising around them. Bells sounded at 8:46 a.m. and 9:03 a.m. -- the moments when the hijacked planes slammed into the twin towers. On the podium, Carmen Suarez glanced skyward as she finished reading 10 names of those who died.

Her husband, police officer Ramon Suarez, died in those towers.

"If I could build a staircase to heaven I would," Suarez said, "just so I could quickly run up there to have you back in my arms."

Rain fell in Shanksville and cool and clouds cloaked Washington, but in New York it was one of those eerie carbon-copy days: a slight chill of autumn, a cloudless sky, wind tugging at flags, just like five years ago. Except that yesterday, every flag in the city was at half-staff.

Bush and Vice President Cheney paid homage to the dead. And as during the past few weeks, they did not hesitate to try to draw a connection between the Sept. 11 attacks and the war in Iraq.

New York Battalion Chief Jim Savastano, who knew 100 of the 343 firefighters who died at Ground Zero, sat next to Bush at the breakfast of scrambled eggs and French toast; he recalls talk of war. "He talked about how he's going to continue the war on terrorism," Savastano said. "He's not going to give up the fight."

Cheney observed the day at the Pentagon, where five years ago American Airlines Flight 77 rocketed into the facade, burrowing its way through the building's outer rings and killing 184 people. Five hundred family and friends of the lost sat in a cold drizzle, listening as speakers mixed soft talk of empathy with blunt calls to support the nation on its two war fronts: Iraq and Afghanistan.

Heads turned as one commercial jet after another streamed over the Pentagon's Mall Terrace, the roar of engines drowning out the voices below and sending a chill of remembrance through the audience.

"There are no words that can soothe your pain and no way that we can truly understand all the sacrifices that you have made," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the audience.

Cheney's style was more aggressive, as he tossed rhetorical haymakers at critics of the Iraq invasion. "We have no intention," he said, "of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics."

In New York, there was little talk of the war. Recent polls show that 75 percent of the city's residents see no links between the 2001 attacks and the three-year-old war in Iraq. Antiwar sentiment is deeply felt in New York, even by Republicans, polls show.

Jack Lynch went to Ground Zero yesterday with his wife to stand once again in the footprint of those 110-story towers. He recalled searching in that wreckage for the body of his son, Michael, who was a firefighter with Engine 40, Ladder 35, on the Upper West Side of Manhattan.

"On March 21, 2002, we recovered Michael's body," Lynch said. "His body was entangled with a body of a female. . . . The medical examiner said he was either carrying her or protecting her.

"It was saving grace because we know that Michael . . . died doing something noble."

Lynch wishes he were younger so that he could fight terrorism. But not in Iraq. "Iraq really is the wrong target," he said. "Terrorism is the target and the attitude of those that want to hold us hostage in fear."

Five years out, the emotion is less raw than it was in those first years. One could walk the streets of Manhattan or the District yesterday and sense little amiss. But that impression would be wide off the mark.

In Astoria, Queens, a working-class immigrant community, Joseph Kiss walked beneath the elevated tracks on Broadway. He is a just-retired elevator operator, a white-haired, blue-eyed Croatian immigrant with a gold crucifix. Ask if he still thinks of that day and he nods.

He said his daughter was nearly buried under the wreckage and was rescued several hours after the collapse.

"Every day I think about how I almost lost her, trapped down there in the cement and dust," he said. "I remember calling her and calling, hope she get home.

"I am lucky, though. So many families --" He paused and snapped his fingers. "They look up and they lost the love of their lives."New York

Lt. Tom Carlstrom, 53, walked one last time in his dress blues along the eastern lip of the gaping hole where this city's two largest towers once stood. He is a New York City firefighter of 25 years' service, or rather he was -- he retired yesterday at 2 p.m.

Five years ago, Carlstrom, a quiet and polite man who stops here to help an old woman navigate a high curb and there to help an old Marine veteran tape a memorial on the fence, was in the North Tower. He was setting up a triage unit in the cavernous lobby when he felt a shaking and heard a roar, like an avalanche. One hundred ten stories were coming down upon him.

"The South Tower had already gone, so we knew this could happen," he said quietly as he stood on Church Street, watching the Emerald Society's bagpipers wet their lips. "I knew I had six, maybe seven seconds."

He ran north on West Street and dived down a side street. Metal beams, clouds of volcanic-like dust and boulders hurtled by. Somehow -- he's not sure how or why -- Carlstrom survived, and as he huddled there he thought of his friends who at that moment were dying.

"I come down every year, to think about my people I couldn't get out of there." He shrugged, helpless. "These memories are never going away, I realize that now."

Each anniversary has its own feel. The first was defiant and heartbreaking, the Fire Department's bagpipers leading a ragtag march of 3,000 firefighters, cops and ordinary citizens into the dawn and across the Brooklyn Bridge to Ground Zero.

This anniversary feels different, the wounds half-cauterized, the neighborhood around Ground Zero rebuilt, shiny, polished. And yet the roses are stuffed in the gates and the photos taped up, and everywhere around Ground Zero there are families with photos of their loved ones on their lapels and purses, slowly walking down the ramp into that deep pit.

There was not a sense this time of a city come to a stop. Many on Church Street hurried to work. But others were there to protest, to talk of conspiracies, to put up art -- and many just to quietly listen as family members read off the names of the dead.

"I worked in the hole a couple of times, and it kind of touched me," Tom Miller, 41, said from behind mirrored sunglasses. He wore biker boots, a T-shirt with a big American flag and a handlebar mustache. He repairs construction cranes, and he drove south on his Harley to the memorial.

"It's just emotional, the destruction, to see people wasted here -- that's just the best way to put it."

Elsewhere the day was given to private remembrance. At Sixth Avenue and Houston Street a powerfully built man in a business suit and sunglasses knelt on the sidewalk, head bowed in front of Engine House 24, which lost eight men on that day.

He got up and walked away and was momentarily startled to be asked his thoughts. "I live across the street, and I guess I feel like I owe these guys my prayers," he said. "I love this city, but I don't feel it's very healed. So many people just got wiped out on a perfect day just like this."The Pentagon

Zenovia Cuyler was starting her morning at a Pentagon health clinic on Sept. 11, 2001, when she heard that an airplane had ripped through the building's limestone exterior. When she learned where the plane had crashed, she immediately feared the worst.

"I watched the building burn for a while, and then I knew my mother was gone," Cuyler said yesterday, her eyes softening. "In a way, she's still here."

Surrounded by family members, Cuyler returned to the spot yesterday where her mother, Ada M. Davis, 57, was working as an accountant for the Army five years ago when Flight 77 rammed through the Pentagon's E-ring at 9:37 a.m. For Cuyler, of Upper Marlboro, the wars and the U.S. troops dying overseas are a continual reminder of that personal horror.

"I haven't healed because I live it every day," she said. "There is no closure."

Beneath ominously dark clouds and a sporadic spitting rain outside the Pentagon yesterday, Cuyler and more than 500 family members and friends of the 184 victims joined in solemn remembrance. They waved small American flags and saluted the same enormous Stars and Stripes that draped the Pentagon in the days after the attack.

Songs such as "Battle Hymn of the Republic" streamed through the morning mist, while America's top military leaders spoke of the great sacrifices members of the military made on Sept. 11, as well as the sacrifices they are now making. Cheney, Pace and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said the attacks marked the surprise beginning of a now-global struggle.

The moment appeared to affect Rumsfeld, who struggled briefly through his opening words before speaking about the need to aggressively go after the terrorists who celebrated while America mourned the victims five years ago.

"The highest tribute we can pay to them is to commit ourselves to doing everything possible to fight the extremists wherever they are, to making every effort to stay united as a country, and to give our truly outstanding men and women in uniform all that they need to succeed," Rumsfeld said, a sling holding his left arm in place after surgery last week.

In a brief afternoon visit, Bush and the first lady placed a wreath at the spot where the plane hit the Pentagon, standing for a moment of silence before a five-piece band played a soft version of "America the Beautiful." Several senior senators and White House officials joined about 225 family members representing 56 victims. Bush then spent about 15 minutes shaking hands and sharing hugs, at one point wiping tears from his eyes.

Joyce Johnson's eyes began to water as she talked about her husband, Army Lt. Col. Dennis M. Johnson, who five years ago died just a few feet from where she was standing.

Walking away from the afternoon ceremony, five years of memories flooding back to her, Johnson praised Bush for his dedication to the victims: "Just for him to take the time to go to all three places means more than anything."Shanksville

Just a few miles down the road from a field shrouded with memories and mementos, Oleg Kis stood in his hotel trying to decide whether to wear the suit jacket and tie or the black T-shirt folded on his bed.

"This may be too provocative," said the soft-spoken Kis, 49, holding the T-shirt out in front of him, the words "Face the Facts" emblazoned on the front. In one corner of the room, boxes brimmed with thousands of fliers. In another reclined a placard splashed with the words "Stop 9-11 Cover-Up."

"I believe the truth should be spread," Kis said of his one-man protest at the crash site.

People came for many reasons, some alone and some by the busload, to a field even locals considered the middle of nowhere until a plane punctured the earth five years ago. Danielle Anderson, 18, and Angela McMillen, 21, drove hundreds of miles through the night from Dubois, Pa., to in hopes of creating a memory for themselves.

"My grandmother talked to me about WWII, and my parents talked to me about Vietnam," McMillen said. "This is what we're going to tell our children."

They came on a whim, leaving at 2 a.m. and arriving before the sun rose. About 1,000 people would follow, gathering under a slate-gray sky at 9 a.m. for the memorial service. There were prayers and victims' names read and politicians searching for words of comfort.

Afterward, Bush visited the crash site with families, taking a moment to talk to each. A chapel also held a service, with people spread among fold-out chairs. Alice Hoagland, mother of victim Mark Bingham, attended both ceremonies.

"This is really comforting to be here today, to look into the eyes of the other Flight 93 families and to grieve together and to find comfort together," Hoagland said.

If there was a lesson her son and others on Flight 93 learned that day, it was that there is power in numbers, she said.

Shanksville, a small town of about 250 people, often appears overwhelmed by the attention. This is a place where deer, raccoons and bears still wander up to back porches and where scrapple, a mix of cornmeal and pig fat, is a dietary staple. The plane crash ripped a hole in that solitude.

"I stomped these grounds when I was a kid," said Fred Bruening, 76, adding that he shot his first 10-point buck where the plane came down. "Just think of a boy who might have seen two cars all day long going down that road to Shanksville. I never would have never thought there'd be all these people standing here."

He and his wife had driven from Youngtown, N.Y., for the ceremony yesterday, as they have every year since the crash.

"This is our special place," said Diane Bruening, 62.

Up the hill, near the makeshift memorial that has grown each year, Kis stood in a gray suit and blue tie, handing out fliers and calling to passersby.

"Find out what really happened," he shouted.

"You're a moron," one man yelled back.

"What you're trying to accomplish has nothing to do with what is going on here," shouted Jim Kunkel, 38, of Pittsburgh. "Go away."

"I don't want them to have died uselessly," Kis yelled back.

Memories, Grief Endure Across Region (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

In the past five years, Ron Miluszewski has been unable to shake the smell of the first victims who were brought to his hospital from the shattered Pentagon: They reeked of jet fuel.

In the past five years, Mazie Lawson's anguish at the loss of her daughter, Cecelia Richard, on Sept. 11, has lingered, undiminished.

In the past five years, Colin Wolfe grew from childhood in Manassas to the Marine Corps in Iraq, determined to battle the perpetrators of Sept. 11. Yesterday -- at the age of 19 -- he was borne to his grave in Arlington National Cemetery.

So much can happen in five years, while much stays unchanged.

Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, residents and visitors across the Washington region paused yesterday, away from the grand commemorations, to remember the milestone and take stock of all that has and has not changed in the half-decade since 2001.

At the Lincoln Memorial, prayers for nonviolence echoed across the Reflecting Pool and mingled with the roar of airliners soaring through the overcast that shrouded the city and its psyche.

At a downtown Washington cathedral, a churchgoer attended Mass carrying a framed photograph of a Roman Catholic priest who died in the World Trade Center.

And at a Montgomery County interfaith building project, a 74-year-old Rockville man lamented that he had not done more to improve ethnic relations in the past five years.

"I'm looking for ways to knock down barriers," John Harris of Rockville said yesterday as he stood in the drizzling rain wearing a tool belt and jacket. "Get to know people as individuals, not categorize them by groups."

Harris and 14 other volunteers had assembled in Burtonsville to build townhouses as part of what Habitat for Humanity of Montgomery County had dubbed "Interfaith Build," aimed at bringing together Christian, Jewish and Muslim volunteers. Habitat planned a group lunch and breaks for prayers. But the Muslim contingent never showed. (A representative of the Muslim group later said that he didn't have directions and that by the time he and volunteers reached each other on the phone yesterday, the build had been called off because of rain.)

At the site, the early end to the project gave Harris time to reflect. A Missouri native, onetime CIA worker and lifelong liberal-leaning Baptist, he is nothing if not honest with himself.

Five years ago, immediately after Sept. 11, he hoped the nation's unity would have him getting to know more Muslims. That hasn't happened. He blames himself, in part, saying he instinctively falls back to being with those he knows best, Christians. But he also thinks the war in Iraq has hurt unity.

"We have broadened who the enemy is," he said.

At the Lincoln Memorial, Arun Gandhi, grandson of Mohandas Gandhi, India's famed philosopher statesman, led speakers and bystanders in calling for peaceful approaches to counterterrorism.

"I see a lot more fear in the minds of people," said Gandhi, who lives in Rochester, N.Y., and, with his wife, Sunanda, founded the M.K. Gandhi Institute for Nonviolence. "It's reached a point where somebody shouts, 'boo,' and everybody runs."

As he spoke, Gary Smith, 60, who served in Vietnam with a Marine Corps artillery unit, was walking by with his wife, Margaret, 60, and their granddaughter, Shelby, 13, who was wearing a pink sweatshirt that said "FBI."

Smith, of Adrian, Mo., said he has changed in the past five years. But he is not afraid. "I'm an American, and I'm going to do what I want to do," he said. "I'm free, and I'm going to stay that way. They're not going to scare me. They may make me nervous. But they're not going to scare me."

Across the Potomac River, the body of Colin Wolfe was being carried through Arlington National Cemetery. Wolfe was a 14-year-old, preoccupied with girls and baseball and successfully sidestepping homework assignments, when the terrorists stuck.

It was in that moment, when the twin towers fell and the Pentagon was on fire, that the Manassas youth decided his future would take a very specific path: service in the Marine Corps.

Wolfe deployed to Iraq in July. He was killed last month, cut down when his Humvee struck a roadside bomb.

Yesterday, the Marine lance corporal was buried on a day his parents said they selected for its raw symbolism.

"September 11 was an integral part of his decision process to become a Marine, and it seems absolutely appropriate," said Wolfe's father, Mark Wolfe.

In Bladensburg yesterday morning, a bell chimed 25 times in honor of the 25 Prince George's County residents who lost their lives that day five years ago.

Mazie Lawson, 77, shed tears as the bell tolled for her daughter, Cecelia Richard, 41.

The ceremony was held to dedicate the Prince George's County Sept. 11 Memorial at the Bladensburg Waterfront Park at Peace Cross. Twenty-five white crepe myrtle trees, one for each victim, lined a brick walkway and a granite memorial with an inscription that reads: "We will always remember them."

Lawson, of Capitol Heights, tried to hold back tears as she talked about her daughter. "It's a terrible feeling," she said. "It's a hole that can't be filled."

"I just hate the word 'closure,' " Lawson said. "There's never closure. To me, the word closure means to close and forget, and I never want to forget my daughter's spirit."

In Vienna, about 50 people gathered on the lawn of the Freeman House for the town's annual Sept. 11 commemoration, organized by American Legion Post 180. Some took shelter from the drizzle beneath a maple tree; others sat in folding chairs.

Ron Miluszewski, director of admissions at Virginia Hospital Center, was the featured speaker. The hospital treated 44 victims of the Pentagon attack, and his memories of that day at the hospital's triage center are a mix of horror and heroism: The sound of the ambulance sirens bringing the day's first victims. The two injured servicemen who, after receiving treatment, tore off their hospital tags and returned to the crash site at the Pentagon to look for others. The smell of jet fuel on the burn patients.

"It's a memory that has stayed in my head," he said later. "All I could smell was jet fuel, like being in an airport. I'll never forget that. I've tried to. But every time I go to an airport, the smell of jet fuel reminds me. It was so strong."

A group of Arab Americans gathered at the Capital Hilton hotel downtown to mark the anniversary. One of those in attendance, Samiah Bahhur, 45, was upset.

"Don't use the word 'angry,' okay?" she said.

An energy regulation specialist, Bahhur said she feels "punished" when she finds airport security slips in her luggage or when she thinks about the Patriot Act -- which she feels unfairly puts Arab Americans such as herself under a microscope and makes other Americans feel suspicious.

"We are just like every other American," she said, her right hand gesturing firmly. Bahhur, of Fairfax, was among 150 people in business suits, military uniforms and modest hijabs who came to listen to religious figures -- Muslim, Christian and Jewish -- reflect on the past five years. Speakers talked about the anti-Muslim, anti-Arab vitriol that came after Sept. 11, as well as the interfaith bonding.

Bahhur said she wanted to be optimistic. She volunteers with the Red Cross and the Arab American Institute and tries "not to let the things that affect the community affect me." She said she remembers feeling optimistic in the months after the attacks after seeing people work for more tolerance, more education. But then came the wiretapping and other terrorist incidents, each one a reason for some to let loose a little hate.

Last night, thousands of football fans waved small American flags, chanted "USA! USA!" and observed a moment of silence before the start of the Redskins-Vikings game at FedEx Field.

But in a utility tunnel beneath the stadium, Prince George's firefighter Ernie Alsop stood by, sitting in a firetruck, in case of calamity.

Alsop, 46, is in his 25th year as a firefighter, but this is his first season working security at Redskins games.

He worries about car fires and sick fans and, now, mysterious backpacks stashed in the woods.

"You can't let that stuff go these days," he said. "You've got to check everything out. I'm a rookie when it comes to this, but I know that day has changed the world."

During Mass in the cathedral in Washington, John Mohan sat with a black-framed, smiling photograph of his friend, Franciscan priest Mychal Judge. The 68-year-old Roman Catholic chaplain for New York's fire department was killed at the World Trade Center as he ministered to the dead and dying.

"There's a sadness of course . . . but I do think there is a determination too, to remember those who died and maybe take what was good from their lives," said Mohan, 41.

The District resident was among about 200 worshipers at the Mass celebrated by Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl at the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle in Northwest Washington.

In his homily, Wuerl sought to dispel the paralysis that people can feel in the face of horrible events. "Our capacity to change the world is not as limited as we think," he said.

After the Mass, Mohan stood in line to speak with Wuerl. He asked the archbishop to bless the photograph.

Later, standing on the steps of the red brick cathedral, Mohan called Sept. 11 "one of the landmarks that you look at and say, 'Where were you on the day?' And everybody knows where they were before and after, and how their lives changed."

The experience, he added, had marked his generation, "maybe in some ways that people in this generation living now are not even aware of yet and won't be for many years to come."

Marine Felt Calling After 9/11 Attacks (WP)

By Leef Smith

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Colin Wolfe was in sixth grade, fixated on girls, sports and the challenges of being a preteen, when a group of Marines visited his Manassas elementary school.

He returned to his Manassas home that afternoon with their presentation swimming in his head. Perhaps, he told his parents, he might enlist one day.

It was just childhood talk, his parents reasoned. Their son was a skilled ballet dancer, performing since childhood with a local dance company, and he had smarts. Perhaps he would go to college.

Then came Sept. 11, 2001.

Wolfe was 14 when the twin towers fell, and like so many, he watched in horror as the Pentagon burned on cable news channels.

He was just a boy, but the call to action that he felt struck deep.

In the years that followed, he collected articles depicting the attacks and search for Osama bin Laden. He talked with friends and family about the war on terror and visited the Pentagon and Ground Zero in New York.

And when he graduated from Osbourn High School in Manassas last year, he did the one thing he felt in his heart that was right: He enlisted in the Marines, ready to fight.

"Like a lot of kids, he had a sense of wanting to serve his country, but 9/11 crystallized that in him," said Mark Wolfe, his father.

Pfc. Colin J. Wolfe, 19, was deployed to Iraq in July. He was killed Aug. 30 in Anbar province, when the Humvee in which he was riding struck a roadside bomb.

Yesterday, family and friends gathered at Arlington National Cemetery to honor the slain Marine. His parents picked Sept. 11 for the burial, believing it to be a fitting tribute to a young man who gave his life for his country in Iraq.

"He knew what he was fighting for and what he was all about," Mark Wolfe said. "He believed he was serving the country, protecting the country. He had made his choice."

Colin was assigned to the 3rd Battalion, 2nd Marine Regiment, 2nd Marine Division, 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force at Camp Lejeune, N.C., and was posthumously promoted to lance corporal.

Hundreds of mourners -- among them Virginia Sens. George Allen (R) and John W. Warner (R) as well as Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) -- gathered at the graveside under a threatening, gray sky.

They listened as a bugler played taps, the instrument's echoes fading softly across the field of grass and gravestones. They watched spellbound as six marines folded the American flag draped over Wolfe's coffin with precision.

The motorcade to the cemetery -- one of the largest for a casualty of the Iraq war, according to cemetery officials -- was led by a small police escort.

Family members said Wolfe wasn't planning a career in the military. He just felt he had a job to do -- and not as an officer, either. Wolfe's father said he wanted to be on the front lines, doing the real work, he said.

Mark Wolfe said his son's battalion has lost six Marines in the past few weeks, a heavy toll that drives home the danger of their jobs.

"People in the general public don't realize how hard they fight and how many risks they take," Mark Wolfe said. "It's war."

But Colin Wolfe knew it was war. He looked on the conflict in Iraq with the same gravity as he viewed World War II, his father said.

Shortly after Colin graduated from high school, his family traveled to France, where they drove from Paris to Omaha Beach, the famous Normandy landing site during the allied invasion of World War II. They were there, Mark Wolfe said, to pay their respects.

For Colin, who had just enlisted, it was "hallowed ground." He pointed out to family members headstones marked with the Star of David -- a symbol of Jewish heritage, like his own.

Mark Wolfe said he last spoke with his son on Aug. 19. The phone conversation lasted 15 or 20 minutes, and Colin talked about the tedium of combat and how much the Iraqi children loved the Marines. His father said he stressed that the Iraqi soldiers were doing a good job, that they were to be trusted.

The job might be progressing slowly, he told his father, but they were going to get it done.

"We're winning," Colin said. "It's just going to take some time."

U.S. Observes 5-year Anniversary Of 9-11 (AP)

By Amy Westfeldt And Erin Mcclam

The Associated Press, September 12, 2006

Clutching photos to their hearts and blowing kisses to the sky, tearful loved ones of Sept. 11 victims recited a 3 1/2-hour litany of the lost Monday, the names echoing across an expanse still largely barren five years after terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center.

At the Pentagon and on a wind-swept Pennsylvania field, and in simpler, quiet moments in airport security lines, at churches or by themselves, Americans paused to reflect on the worst terrorist act on U.S. soil.

The centerpiece of the commemorations was the mostly barren 16-acre expanse at ground zero, where four moments of silence were observed to mark the precise times jetliners crashed into the twin towers and the skyscrapers crumbled to the ground.

The achingly familiar task of reading the names of the 2,749 trade center victims fell this year to their husbands, wives and partners, who personalized the roll call with heartbreaking tributes to the loves of their lives.

"If I could build a staircase to heaven, I would, just so I could quickly run up there to have you back in my arms," said Carmen Suarez, wife of city police officer Ramon Suarez, killed five years ago at the World Trade Center.

And this from Linda Litto, who lost husband Vincent Litto: "As I said 31 years ago tomorrow, I will love you and honor you all the days of our life. Happy anniversary, my love."

On a crisp, sunny day not unlike the morning of the attacks, family members descended into the pit 70 feet below ground where the towers stood, tearfully laying wreaths and roses in the skyscrapers' footprints.

The mournful sound of bagpipes, so familiar from the seemingly endless funerals that followed Sept. 11, echoed across ground zero after a choir performed the national anthem.

The ritual has changed little since the first anniversary of the attacks, and in many ways the site has remained the same as well.

Squabbles over design and security have caused long delays in the project to rebuild at ground zero. Only this year did construction start on a Sept. 11 memorial and the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower, which is not expected to be finished for five more years. At dusk, officials planned to turn on a memorial light display in lower Manhattan, sending beams of blue light skyward in a glowing silhouette of the twin towers.

President Bush laid a wreath at the Shanksville, Pa., field where United Flight 93 crashed, and privately greeted relatives of the 40 people killed there. Standing without umbrellas in a cold rain, he and first lady Laura Bush bowed their heads for a prayer and the singing of "Amazing Grace."

"One moment, ordinary citizens, and the next, heroes forever," retired Gen. Tommy Franks said, alluding to the Flight 93 passengers who apparently fought the hijackers and forced them to crash the plane into the ground. "We mourn their loss, to be sure, but we also celebrate their victory here in the first battle on terrorism."

Bush planned a prime-time Oval Office address later Monday. In prepared remarks, he characterized the war against terrorism as a "struggle for civilization" that requires a determined effort by a unified country.

"We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations," Bush said.

The president ate breakfast with New York firefighters, and a day earlier walked ground zero and laid wreaths in reflecting pools that symbolized the north and south towers.

After visiting Shanksville on Monday, the president and first lady placed a wreath near a plaque on the outside of the Pentagon, where American Airlines Flight 77 claimed 184 lives and tore a gash in the building. Bush appeared teary-eyed as he greeted victims' family members around him, and he could be seen mouthing "God bless you" as he embraced them.

At an observance near the Pentagon, Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld strode side by side to a speaker's platform.

Rumsfeld appeared to struggle with his emotions as he recalled the day of the attacks, and Cheney vowed resolve: "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power."

The day was marked with reminders of the sometimes tense new reality that settled on the nation, and particularly its transportation systems, after the attacks five years ago.

New York's bustling Pennsylvania Station was briefly evacuated because of a suspicious duffel bag that turned out to be holding only trash. And a jet bound for San Francisco was diverted to Dallas after a backpack and handheld e-mail device were found on board. Both items were pronounced harmless.

And lest anyone forget the terrorists responsible for the day, al-Qaida's second in command warned of forthcoming strikes in the Persian Gulf and against Israel in a new video Monday.

It was one of three al-Qaida videos released around the 9-11 anniversary. One showed images of the fuel-laden jets striking the trade center, and in another Osama bin Laden smiled and chatted with the plotters of the attacks.

In Washington, the co-chairmen of the Sept. 11 commission assailed the Bush administration and Congress for a what they called a lack of urgency in protecting the country. Only about half of the 41 recommendations issued by the commission two years ago have become law.

Former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton and former New Jersey Gov. Tom Kean cited a failure to distribute adequate homeland security money to cities most at risk for an attack, and said U.S. policy toward Arab nations has been largely ineffective.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino insisted that the administration had adopted many of the commission's suggestions. She said Bush "wakes every day determined to ensure that we are doing all we can — with all the lawful tools possible — to detect and prevent terrorists attacks."

At Boston's Logan Airport, security screeners wearing wristbands that read "We will never forget" stopped checking passengers for a moment to mark the anniversary, and travelers waiting in line — another legacy of the attacks — paused to join the tribute.

At Dallas Fort-Worth International, speakers at a ceremony paused intermittently as jets roared overhead, and an employee choir sang "God Bless America.

Ceremonies around the country inevitably included salutes to police and firefighters.

Outside an elementary school in Mascoutah, Ill., not far from Scott Air Force Base, Lt. Col. Jim Williams attended a Sept. 11 ceremony but said the first responders were the true heroes of the day.

"I'm in the military and defend the country, but only in certain times," he said. "They do this every day."

In Akron, Ohio, firefighters rolled their trucks out of their garages and sounded their sirens for 30 seconds at the moment the south tower of the trade center collapsed, and again a half-hour later for the north tower.

Dave Johnson, a 69-year-old retiree, was completing his daily walk along Las Olas Boulevard in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and said he worried the nation had grown less vigilant over the five-year span.

"It changed everybody's life, even if they don't admit it," he said.

The families of the nearly 3,000 people killed five years ago made their way through the anniversary as best they could, the rituals now familiar but never easier.

Among them was the family of Candace Lee Williams, 20, who was on American Flight 11, the first plane to hit the trade center. Her mother, Sherri Williams, remains haunted by the way her daughter died, but comes to ground zero every year "to keep her legend alive."

Sherri Williams and her son begin the way by visiting Candace's grave in Danbury, Conn., covering it with yellow roses, her favorite. Then they get on a train and travel to lower Manhattan.

And so the mother found herself at ground zero on Monday morning, holding a large, framed photo of her blonde, blue-eyed daughter.

"It's so hard to believe the five years have passed," Sherri Williams said. "She would have been 25. She wanted to do so much with her life."

Anniversary Brings Back Memories Of Attacks (MCT)

By Robert S. Boyd And Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Across the land, Monday brought back memories of that awful morning five years ago: the crisp blue sky above Manhattan, the silver planes streaking into tall buildings, the flames, smoke, dust, horrified faces, people running, firefighters and police officers struggling, the fear, grief and death.

That day marked the end of America's innocence; the grim realization that our nation no longer is protected by its broad ocean ramparts, that enemies can strike our homeland at any time. Americans everywhere recalled on Monday where they were when the planes struck and the towers fell. Bells tolled, bagpipes wailed, flags flew at half-staff.

After an emotional tour of crash sites at New York, Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon, which will be forever linked by Sept. 11, 2001, President Bush called for national unity in the struggle against terrorism.

"Our nation has endured trials - and we face a difficult road ahead," he said in a prime-time TV address from the Oval Office, according to prepared remarks issued before the speech. "Winning this war will require the determined efforts of a unified country. So we must put aside differences, and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

Earlier, at a memorial service in New York, relatives of the 2,749 people lost there stood in the void that was created when the buildings collapsed and paid tribute to the victims. They clutched pictures of their loved ones, sobbing quietly as their names were read in a four-hour ceremony.

Blocks away, on a spectacular late-summer morning remarkably like the one that ended in tragedy five years before, the president and first lady Laura Bush joined a group of firefighters for moments of silence at 8:46 a.m. and 9:03 a.m., the times when the first aircraft, then a second one, slammed into the twin towers of the World Trade Center.

A few hours later, the Bushes stood in a rainy field in Shanksville, where a third hijacked plane crashed as passengers fought back against the terrorists. Again, the weather mimicked conditions five years ago. Relatives of the victims from United Airlines Flight 93 wept as the president sought to console them.

"Their actions have ennobled our lives. Their death has enriched our lives. Their courage has demonstrated that which we are all capable of," the Rev. Paul Britton, a Lutheran minister, told the crowd. His sister Marion died on the flight.

At the Pentagon, Bush's final stop, the president wiped away tears after placing a wreath in honor of the 184 passengers, crew members and people in the building who died when American Airlines Flight 77 smashed into its west side.

Lt. Col. John Jessup, whose office was destroyed in the attack, skipped the ceremonies, choosing to mark the day with quiet reflection. Jessup said he lost 23 co-workers and friends five years ago. He helped colleagues escape his office until the billowing black smoke stopped him.

He still has survivor's guilt, but said he knows that God "isn't done with me yet." He said he was back at work the day after the attacks.

"Because I'm a soldier," he said.

America's memories of that fateful day were mixed Monday with reminders that life changed then.

Jittery officials diverted a United Airlines plane bound for San Francisco to Dallas when an unclaimed BlackBerry was found aboard. New York's Penn Station was evacuated briefly because of a suspicious package.

Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, warned in a new video that Persian Gulf countries and Israel would be al-Qaida's next targets.

In Afghanistan, a planned moment of silence by American troops was disrupted by a rocket attack from resurgent Taliban fighters that sent the soldiers scrambling for cover.

"This struggle has been called a clash of civilizations," Bush said, according to his prepared remarks. "In truth, it is a struggle for civilization."

Five years on, the aftereffects of Sept. 11 remain inescapable. Public buildings resemble fortresses. Air marshals ride planes. Police patrol subways. Billions of dollars are being spent on security, yet nearly half of Americans fear another terrorist attack, pollsters report. People say they're more cautious, suspicious of others, wary of public transportation.

Yet life went on Monday. Astronauts worked to finish the International Space Station orbiting 270 miles above Earth. Meteorologists monitored Hurricane Florence in the Atlantic. "Monday Night Football" competed with the president for TV viewers' attention.

Even Congress put politics aside, briefly, holding a memorial ceremony on the Capitol grounds at dusk. The Marine Corps Band played and top Republicans and Democrats spoke. But no one expected the bipartisan spirit to last. On Tuesday lawmakers will return to battle over how to balance the rule of law with the war on terrorism, defining the rights of detainees facing trial in special military courts.

In his prepared remarks, Bush said the attacks brought out the best in Americans by exposing them to the worst.

"On 9-11, our nation saw the face of evil," he said. "Yet on that awful day, we also witnessed something distinctly American: ordinary citizens rising to the occasion, and responding with extraordinary acts of courage."

He warned Americans to brace for a long struggle.

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I," he said. "But the war is not over - and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

Hours before, the co-chairmen of the independent 9-11 commission had voiced anguish at America's halting efforts to improve homeland security. They spoke at the National Press Club, where they rued Washington's failure to embrace many of the 41 recommendations that their panel had offered toward making America safer.

In Baghdad, the mood was somber as a digital clock counted down to 4:46 p.m., the local time of the first Sept. 11 attack. Military personnel and civilians hung their heads for a moment of silence.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the war in Iraq was the center of an effort to promote democracy and security in the Middle East.

Boyd wrote from Washington, Hutcheson from New York and Washington. Mark Brunswick of the Minneapolis Star Tribune in Baghdad and Margaret Talev and Brady Averill in Washington contributed to this report.

Nation Marks Lives Lost And Hopeful Signs Of Healing (NYT)

By Robert D. Mcfadden

Once more the leaden bells tolled in mourning, loved ones recited the names of the dead at ground zero, and a wounded but resilient America paused yesterday to remember the calamitous day when terrorist explosions rumbled like summer thunder and people fell from the sky.

On the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, as most Americans went about their Monday routines, thousands gathered at ground zero, at the Pentagon and in a field in Pennsylvania where the hijacked jetliners crashed. They included families and friends of the 2,973 people who died, President Bush and other public officials, and countless strangers united by haunting but receding memories.

At the pit in Lower Manhattan where the World Trade Center stood, they commemorated the day with familiar rituals: moments of silence to mark the times when the planes struck and the towers collapsed, wreath-layings, prayers, the music and poetry of loss and remembrance. All were freighted with emotions that still cut deeply but were showing signs of healing.

“How much do I love you?” Susan Sliwak, a mother of three, intoned at a microphone on a platform above the grieving crowd, quoting from an Irving Berlin lyric in tribute to her husband, Robert Sliwak, a Cantor Fitzgerald employee and one of the 2,749 killed at the trade center. “How deep is the ocean? How high is the sky?”

As a bass viol, a flute and other instruments softly rendered the Pachelbel Canon, Albinoni’s Adagio and other solemn strains, about 200 spouses, partners and other loved ones took turns reading the names of the dead. Many spoke directly to their lost partners, often in firm, proud voices. Others told tearfully of the births of grandchildren or of having reaffirmed their marriage vows. Many simply expressed their love and that of their children, a promise never to forget.

Under shafts of golden sunlight, many family members knelt in the pit to pray. They hugged one another, cried softly or sobbed and set wreaths and roses adrift in reflecting pools that stand in the stead of the fallen towers. The waters were soon thick with flowers.

But if there was a theme to this year's proceedings, it was honoring the dead while moving on with life. "For all Americans, this date will be forever entwined with sadness," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said in closing remarks during the noon hour. "But the memory of those we lost can burn with a softening brightness."

Moments later, musicians of the New York Police and Fire Departments played taps, the slow, hauntingly beautiful solemnity that closes the military day. Yesterday actually closed with another tradition: the "Tribute in Light," two powerful beams that shot skyward, creating silhouettes of the fallen towers.

It was a sumptuously cool day in the 60's, a grand portal to autumn, and Lower Manhattan was a dramatic backdrop. One had to imagine the architecture to come on the gouged ground: angular skyscrapers to go with memorial pools. Still, the surroundings were vivid: the magical skyline rising in geometric patterns, the seas of fluttering American flags, the Hudson flickering mercurially in the sunlight, and in the distance seagulls dipping and soaring like strokes on a musical composition.

President Bush did not attend the ceremonies at ground zero, where he and his wife, Laura, laid a wreath on Sunday. Instead, he joined 100 police officers and firefighters for breakfast at a firehouse on the Lower East Side to honor first responders who rushed to the towers to save lives but lost their own. As bells tolled, Mr. Bush bowed his head in silence to mark the times when the planes hit the towers.

Later, he went to Pennsylvania and shared handshakes and hugs in a cold rain with families of 40 who died in the crash of United Airlines Flight 93 and who, the authorities believe, spared the White House or the Capitol from destruction by rising up against the hijackers. In Northern Virginia, Mr. and Mrs. Bush laid a wreath against the Pentagon wall that was hit by American Airlines Flight 77, killing 184 people.

For the first anniversary since 2002, the president visited all three places where lives were lost on 9/11, and he did so without making a speech until his evening address to the nation from the Oval Office.

The commemoration at ground zero was only one of many solemn remembrances across the country. In houses of worship, firehouses and police stations, in parks and public buildings in scores of cities, there were vigils, forums, interfaith services, concerts, exhibits and events that ranged from flying kites to floating lanterns. Millions watched the ceremonies on television and talked about where they were and what they were doing when the planes struck, and about how their lives had changed.

There were commemorations elsewhere in New York, at St. Patrick's Cathedral, St. Paul's Chapel near ground zero and in the rotunda of State Supreme Court in Manhattan. Concerts, masses, exhibits, memorial unveilings and other events were held in many suburbs: in Hempstead and Mineola and Nyack, N.Y.; in Hartford; and in Trenton, Bayonne, Middletown, Newark, Holmdel and other places in New Jersey, a state that was home to 700 of those who died at the trade center.

But behind the ceremonial day, the rhythms of life in America went on. There were jobs to do, classes to attend, soccer games, weddings, births, deaths and appointments. The armies of commerce, homemakers and civil servants went about their business, not quite as usual, perhaps, but with an awareness that 9/11, a date burned into the national psyche, had edged away from catastrophe toward the realm of tragic history. It was an occasion for solemnity but no longer a wrenching heartbreak.

Aside from discussions of the day's meaning, it was an ordinary day at most schools. At airports, bus and train stations and other transportation hubs, it was another day of security and travel, although Pennsylvania Station in Manhattan was evacuated briefly in the morning for a suspicious package that turned out to be nothing threatening.

Memories were still raw at firehouses, like one at Amsterdam Avenue and 66th Street, where Engine 40 and Ladder 35 lost 11 men five years ago. "We live with that every day," Capt. John Miles said. "This day is just for the remembrance of those that were lost." But at 8:42 a.m., minutes before the first moment of silence, a fire alarm rang in and firefighters rushed to their trucks.

At the New York Stock Exchange, work stopped to observe silences, an eerie effect on the normally raucous trading floor. On a New York Waterway ferry crossing to Jersey City, Capt. Kirk Slater, who had taken people to work who never came back on

Sept. 11, halted his engines for a moment and drifted on a silent river. A subway train halted at the same moment near 96th Street on the Upper West Side. In Central Park, people strolled, played ball and spread out on lawns as if spending the day in an impressionist painting.

Life and death went on. At the Owens Funeral Home in Harlem, a service was held for Clyde Griffin Jr., an 80-year-old veteran of World War II, who died last week.

At St. Luke's-Roosevelt Hospital Center, Emma Paulino-Chindra was born to Ines Paulino-Chindra, 26, and her husband, Wendell, 31. "It's a miracle baby," the new father said. "We'll celebrate life today, not death."

Tony Arroyo Sr. of Lancaster, Pa., who took his son, Tony Jr., to the Winter Garden of the World Financial Center, marveled at a $50 million renovation and, out the window, at North Cove Marina on the Hudson River, where boats caked with debris from the towers had fled. Now, more than 40 watercraft bobbed jauntily in a spanking breeze, including a gleaming huge catamaran called Best Revenge.

The anniversary dawned on a nation vastly changed in five years, with wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, renewed fears of nuclear conflagration and security measures that have altered the ways Americans travel, do business and think about the world. Despite $250 billion in new security measures for airports, borders and seaports, most Americans believe another major attack is inevitable but have accepted searches, delays and inconvenience as the price of life in an age of terror.

At ground zero, families and friends of the dead began assembling just after 7 a.m., and by 8:30 the clusters had merged into thousands. Some wore T-shirts bearing images of loved ones. Others carried photos, bouquets of roses or carnations and the burdens of five years with the void in their lives. They descended into the pit on a ramp lined with flags and cement blocks alternately painted red and white.

Bagpipes wailed "The Minstrel Boy," and violins and flutes added to a mournful air. Later, Wynton Marsalis gave a trumpet solo. Mayor Bloomberg was master of ceremonies, and there were readings and remarks by Governors George E. Pataki of New York and Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey, as well as former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. In the crowd were many public officials, including Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles E. Schumer and Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

But most in the crowd were people like Marie Paprocki, 50, whose brother, Denis Lavelle, was on the 94th floor of the North Tower when the plane hit and was among those never found in the rubble. "It's important for me to come here because we couldn't bury him," she said. "I can feel close to him here. I can feel peaceful."

The recitation of the names of the dead has become a centerpiece of the ceremonies, performed in past years by public officials, children, parents and grandparents. Last year sisters and brothers read the names. This year it was the turn of husbands, wives and companions.

The vast majority were widows, the wives of firefighters and police officers, financial workers and other trade center employees. It was hard for many, wives choking with emotion just to speak a husband's name. Voices quavered as they invoked the names of their fatherless children and offered endearments, messages that said, in effect, we love you, miss you and will never forget you.

The recitation of names took more than three hours and, before a silent and rapt audience, became a kind of narrative, one with a strange literary power. It conveyed images beyond the deaths of heroes and patriots, quietly and relentlessly capturing the loss of real husbands and wives, real fathers and mothers, real children and siblings, and finally touching the heart of the matter: the shattered loves, the crushed hopes and the poignancy of ordinary lives.

During the recitation, there were eloquent silences as well: at 8:46 a.m., the indelible moment when American Airlines Flight 11 slashed into the north tower and changed everything; at 9:03, when United Airlines Flight 175 hit the south tower; at 9:59, when the south tower collapsed, and at 10:28, when the north tower fell.

As the names of the dead echoed outward like oratorios, thousands milled about on the surrounding streets, some pensive, some looking upset, others acting as if they were at a 9/11 street fair. On Liberty Street, someone had draped a medallion around the neck of a live tropical bird sitting on a fence, steps away from a recently opened center for ground zero artifacts.

On Church Street, dozens of protesters in black T-shirts paraded with signs and literature espousing conspiracy theories about the trade center's destruction. Someone preached about God. Someone else banged a drum. Parked on Cedar Street was a bus covered inside and out with names and photographs of the dead.

By dusk, ragged ranks of clouds had gathered over the region, and the sky became a vast expanse of mother-of-pearl iridescence.

At 7:12 p.m., sunset in New York, a switch was thrown and two powerful shafts of illumination — the “Tribute in Light” — shot up from Lower Manhattan, restoring, for one more anniversary night, the outlines of the twin towers.

In Pa., Mourners Remember Flight 93 (AP-Y)

By Dan Nephin

AP, September 12, 2006

One man drove seven hours on his motorcycle to attend the ceremony. A 15-year-old girl also showed up, hoping to understand the deaths of 40 airline passengers and crew. Another visitor was a flight attendant.

They were among hundreds of people who gathered Monday in a wind-swept field to remember Flight 93, the hijacked jetliner in which passengers tried to storm the cockpit on Sept. 11, 2001, to wrest control from terrorists shortly before the plane crashed in southwestern Pennsylvania.

The passengers were ordinary citizens one moment "and the next, heroes forever," Gen. Tommy Franks said. "We mourn their loss, to be sure, but we also celebrate their victory here in the first battle on terrorism."

The flight had been headed from Newark, N.J., to San Francisco when hijackers took over, apparently planning to crash the jet into the White House or the Capitol.

"I believe I may owe my life to those ordinary people," said Republican Rep. Bill Shuster, whose district includes the crash site, about 80 miles southeast of Pittsburgh.

Conversations from the flight's final minutes indicate the passengers knew about the attacks and took action after one of them said, "Let's roll."

"They didn't back down," said Jim Martin, 51, a highway worker from Buffalo, N.Y., who rode his Harley-Davidson to the ceremony. "I don't want those people to be forgotten. They're really heroes."

About 1,000 people attended the memorial service, including nearly 300 relatives of victims.

President Bush laid a wreath at the crash site and privately greeted family members in a cold drizzle as they marked the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks.

The president and first lady stopped for a moment of silence and bowed their heads during a prayer and the singing of "Amazing Grace." Bells tolled in memory of the victims.

A 10-foot-tall chain-link fence stands near the site as a temporary memorial, festooned with American flags, firefighters' helmets and drawings by children.

Carol Fritz, 15, arrived from Uniontown with her uncle in search of understanding.

"My kids, my grandkids are going to ask me what happened," she said, crying. "I wanted to tell them, tell them I was here."

United flight attendant Kathy Klingaman had attended three previous anniversary events at the site. She did not know the crew aboard Flight 93 but recognized that the hijacking could have happened on any plane.

"I didn't want to forget. Too many people want to forget," she said. "I come because I choose to remember."

Since the crash, a group of volunteers point visitors to the crash site and describe what happened. Some months they guide more than 25,000 visitors.

Organizers hope to raise $30 million in private funding to build a permanent memorial on a 1,700-acre site in Shanksville; the total cost is estimated to be $58 million. Congress has passed the Flight 93 Memorial Act, which established a new national park to honor the victims of the hijacked plane.

At the ceremony, Gov. Ed Rendell announced that the state would sign a commitment letter to give $10 million to the memorial effort, and that it had acquired 300 acres around the crash site that will be managed as a public wildlife area.

"This action will forever preserve the entrance to the memorial in an undeveloped and natural setting," Rendell said.

In 2001, first responders quickly realized there would be no survivors. All they could find at first were small pieces of aircraft and bits of a United Airlines in-flight magazine.

Searchers recovered only about 8 percent of the potential human remains but were able to identify everyone from the fragments they did find, said Somerset County Coroner Wallace Miller.

"Most of the material was vaporized," he said.

Looking Back On A Tragedy With Energy And Respect (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

It was smart of CNN to send Anderson Cooper to Afghanistan, not ground zero, for the fifth anniversary of 9/11.

Afghanistan is where this all started. Ground zero is where innocence ended. That was obvious throughout the slow, mournful roll call of victims' names at the World Trade Center memorial service — a public tribute to private family tragedies, more than 2,700 of them, one after another.

It was just as clear on MSNBC, which chose to rebroadcast the "Today" show of Sept. 11, 2001. Until the second plane hit the south tower that morning, Katie Couric and Matt Lauer assumed, like almost everyone else, that the first plane crash was an accident. What stands out now is how calm they seemed as reality sank in and things kept getting worse, and how little anyone really understood at the time.

It is painful, but not difficult, to memorialize Sept. 11 on television. There are so many images from that morning, so many ways to recreate its horror and mourn those who died.

President Bush used that sadness and rekindled anger as a frame to challenge criticism of the Iraq war in his televised address. "We face an enemy determined to bring death and suffering into our homes," he said from the Oval Office. "America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I. But the war is not over — and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

The day of ceremony, remembrance and wreath-laying was bracketed by fresh scenes of violence in Iraq and Afghanistan and renewed jitters at home. Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, issued his own tribute, a video warning that new attacks were imminent.

In Afghanistan, a suicide bomber blew himself up at the funeral of the assassinated governor of Paktia. A United Airlines flight from Atlanta to San Francisco was diverted after an unclaimed BlackBerry was found on board. In New York, Pennsylvania Station was evacuated for a while.

For New Yorkers especially, yesterday unfolded with that same sense of sorrow and unease that darkened the entire fall of 2001.

CNN provided the morning's most ambitious fifth anniversary special by weaving together a time line of pivotal moments on Sept 11, 2001. Besides covering the president and Laura Bush as they paid their respects in New York, in Pennsylvania and at the Pentagon, CNN brought out witnesses in those places who recounted their memories.

A CNN reporter, Jonathan Freed, was at the Norad command center in Colorado to review what took place there five years ago. From there, he was the first to report that United Flight 351 was being rerouted for fear of a terrorist bomb — a precaution that fortunately proved unnecessary. Mr. Freed's live bulletins may have needlessly alarmed viewers, but they did evoke the pinpricks of tension that are a legacy of Sept. 11.

Sometimes CNN switched to the ceremony at ground zero, at others it went overseas to a forward base in Afghanistan where Mr. Cooper had gone to observe American soldiers gather for their own commemoration in the field. As he spoke onscreen about being on the "frontline" of the war on terror, the men suddenly broke into a run behind him, rushing to escape incoming fire. (To his credit, Mr. Cooper, who was on live, kept talking and didn't duck or run.)

Throughout all those zigzags, CNN held its own tribute — the news crawl at the bottom of the screen showed a candle and the word "remembering" as the names of the victims spilled across the screen, all day.

At 9:05 a.m. yesterday, CNN showed the clip of that exact moment five years ago in a classroom in Sarasota, Fla., when President Bush first learned that the county was under attack, and sat frozen in his seat. CNN accompanied it with an interview with the teacher who sat next to Mr. Bush at the blackboard, and she recalled that she knew something was wrong by the look in his eyes.

Hours before the president attended the ceremony for Flight 93 in Shanksville, Pa., CNN interviewed an assistant volunteer fire chief, Rick King, at the same time that, five years earlier, he was on his porch talking by cellphone to his sister when he saw a fireball in the distance and rushed to the scene of smoke and tangled metal. "I just looked around, and no people," he recalled. "I was thinking, Where are the people?"

All the news programs covered the anniversary with energy, respect and exhaustive detail. CNN found a way to relive the day hour by hour without losing track of the world around it.

Family Of Fallen 9/11 Rescuer Fights DOJ (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 12, 2006

New York Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) and Charles Schumer (D), and Rep. Pete King (R-N.Y.) gathered with President Bush at St. Paul's Chapel in New York Sunday to commemorate the five-year anniversary of the 9-11 attacks, but behind the scenes they are struggling with his administration over the controversial death of one rescuer.

On the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, Glenn Winuk — whose first love in life was being a firefighter but who became a lawyer at Holland & Knight to earn a better living — did what would be natural to any first responder near the scene of a disaster: he rushed to it. Winuk raced from his nearby office to Ground Zero to rescue survivors and died when the South Tower collapsed.

Near St. Paul's Chapel this weekend, Bush spoke in front of a 56-foot-long bronze bas-relief sculpture outside the Ladder Company 10 and Engine Company 10 firehouse donated by Holland & Knight as a tribute to Winuk and the 343 firefighters who died in the attacks.

But the Justice Department last week made public a ruling that Winuk was not eligible to be recognized as a firefighter having died in the line of duty despite his years of volunteer service. Justice made the decision because at the time of his death Winuk had downgraded his affiliation with the Jericho, Long Island, fire department to "associate member."

The decision has surprised many New York officials because it overruled the findings of a hearing officer appointed by Justice to adjudicate the case and because it disregarded the intervention of several prominent New York leaders, including Gov. George Pataki (R) and two of New York's most powerful members of Congress, Clinton and King, who is chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"I write to ask that the Department of Justice act without further delay and find that Glenn J. Winuk is eligible for the Public Safety Officer's Benefit," Clinton wrote in an Aug. 16 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. "Recognition of Glenn's heroism is long overdue, and it is my hope that the DOJ will see fit to award Glenn the same status as the other brave men and women who also sacrificed their lives for others on that tragic day."

Jay Winuk, Glenn's older brother, met with Clinton last month to explain his brother's case. Since Clinton wrote her letter, Winuk said, Sen. Charles Schumer's (D-N.Y.) staff has also offered to help battle the Justice Department.

The New York state legislature and Pataki have also intervened by passing and signing into law a bill that declared Winuk an active member of the Jericho volunteer fire department at the time of his death and eligible for all benefits of active employees.

The Justice Department's decision has denied Winuk's parents $250,000 in federal benefits.

Jay Winuk said his family's fight is about much more than money.

"Our family is doing this because Glenn deserves to be honored in the same way by the United States of America as all other rescuers who sacrificed their lives on Sept. 11 to protect their country and save other lives, " said Winuk. "It really is about honor. Firefighters and policemen shouldn't have to worry about if something should happen to them that their families have to struggle to have that great sacrifice recognized."

King has also gotten involved by writing two letters to Justice.

"It makes absolutely no sense to me," said King, who is working with Jay Winuk on the case. "In many ways Glenn Winuk personifies everyone on Sept. 11. He was both a civilian and a firefighter. He was evacuated as a civilian and he raced back in as a firefighter."

King said that he's been in discussions with former New York mayor and possible 2008 presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani (R) about how to win recognition for Winuk.

Thomas Von Essen, who is Giuliani's business partner at Giuliani-Von Essen LLC and who was New York City's fire commissioner at the time of the attacks, weighed in with the hearing officer appointed by Justice, Daniel Skoler.

"He had both the training and the guts to step forward in the face of great danger when it was needed most," Von Essen wrote of Winuk in a letter to Skoler. "That's what firemen do. I can assure you that true firemen don't care about their membership status when life is at stake, and every indication is that Glenn Winuk was a true fireman."

King said he didn't know what the next step would be, but vowed to continue pressing the issue.

Winuk said that only Justice has opposed recognizing his brother.

"Every other entity in a position to recognize Glenn's sacrifice officially has done so," he said. "Only the federal government in the form of the Department of Justice has failed to do so and refuses to do so."

He has continued to honor his brother by helping direct the Glenn J. Winuk Humanitarian Fund, which makes grants to educational and community service groups. He also serves as vice president for My Good Deed, a group devoted to establishing Sept. 11 as a national day of service.

He said he expects to appeal the Justice Department's decision in court.

The Justice Department did not comment by press time.

'Zero' Sums Up Our Paranoid Moment (USAT)

By Deirdre Donahue

USA Today, September 12, 2006

In today's media-fixated world, the intersection of various entertainment forms — miniseries, movies, novels, comic books — and 9/11 was inevitable. And on occasion, incendiary. Witness the firestorm over ABC's The Path to 9/11.

It would be a shame if Jess Walter's novel The Zero were lost amid all these other 9/11 projects. The author of the unforgettable non-fiction book Ruby Ridge and the admired novel Citizen Vince, Walter uses 9/11 and the past five years as a launch pad to explore how bureaucrats and profit-hungry corporations have distorted a tragedy.

In Zero, Walter has created a satire/tragedy that Franz Kafka and Kurt Vonnegut Jr. might appreciate.

This praise comes from a critic who thinks 9/11 is too recent, too controversial, too important and too painful a topic to be used for historical fiction or docu-dramatizations with their imagined dialogue and dramatic distortions.

Zero is different, in part because Walter succeeds in creating what he calls "a 9/12 novel." It's a dark allegory about the attack, the aftermath, and what has happened to America as seen through the prism of one man's nightmarish experience.

The novel focuses on Brian Remy. A cop who ran toward burning towers in an unnamed city which is clearly New York on a day that is clearly 9/11, Remy finds himself working for a political heavy hitter in the aftermath of 9/11.

Shell-shocked, suicidal and prone to memory gaps, Everyman Remy becomes involved with a covert government agency. His assignment: Find out what happened to a woman who may have fled the towers on 9/11, warned by her Muslim terrorist lover.

This task dispatches Remy into a disturbing world of terrorist cells, victims' families, torture and spy agencies. Walter subtly presents this as a metaphor for what's happening in the USA.

Zero is not perfect. Walter often employs a very heavy trowel to apply symbolism to the novel, and Remy's fractured love and family life distract from the story.

But for a corrosive black comedy about how politicians have manipulated genuine grief and fear, count on Zero.

The Liberals' War (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

"When I was 19, I moved to New York City. . . . If you had asked me to describe myself then, I would have told you I was a musician, an artist and, on a somewhat political level, a woman, a lesbian and a Jew. Being an American wouldn't have made my list. On Sept. 11, all that changed. I realized that I had been taking the freedoms I have here for granted. Now I have an American flag on my backpack, I cheer at the fighter jets as they pass overhead and I am calling myself a patriot."

-- Rachel Newman, "My Turn" in Newsweek, Oct. 21, 2001

Here's a puzzle: Why is it so frequently the case that the people who have the most at stake in the battle against Islamic extremism and the most to lose when Islamism gains -- namely, liberals -- are typically the most reluctant to fight it?

It is often said, particularly in the "progressive" precincts of the democratic left, that by aiming at the Pentagon, the World Trade Center and perhaps the Capitol, Mohammed Atta and his cohorts were registering a broader Muslim objection to what those buildings supposedly represented: capitalism and globalization, U.S. military power, support for Israel, oppression of the Palestinians and so on.

But maybe Ms. Newman intuited that Atta's real targets weren't the symbols of American mightiness, but of what that mightiness protected: people like her, bohemian, sexually unorthodox, a minority within a minority. Maybe she understood that those F-16s overhead -- likely manned by pilots who went to church on Sunday and voted the straight GOP ticket -- were being flown above all for her defense, at the outer cultural perimeter of everything that America's political order permits.

This may be reading too much into Ms. Newman's essay. Yet after 9/11 at least a few old-time voices on the left -- Christopher Hitchens, Bruce Bawer, Paul Berman and Ron Rosenbaum, among others -- understood that what Islamism most threatened wasn't just America generally, but precisely the values that modern liberalism had done so much to promote and protect for the past 40 years: civil rights, gay rights, feminism, privacy rights, reproductive choice, sexual freedom, the right to worship as one chooses, the right not to worship at all. And so they bid an unsentimental good-bye to their one-time comrades and institutions: the peace movement, the pages of the Nation and the New York Review of Books, "the deluded and pathetic sophistry of postmodernists of the left, who believe their unreadable, jargon-clotted theory somehow helps liberate the wretched of the earth," as Mr. Rosenbaum wrote in the New York Observer in 2002.

Five years on, however, Messrs. Hitchens, Bawer et al. seem less like trendsetters and more like oddball dissenters from a left-liberal orthodoxy that finds less and less to like about the very idea of a war on Islamic extremism, never mind the war in Iraq. In the September issue of the Atlantic Monthly, James Fallows, formerly Jimmy Carter's speechwriter, argues that the smart thing for the U.S. to do is declare victory and give the conflict a rest: "A state of war with no clear end point," he writes, "makes it more likely for a country to overreact in ways that hurt itself." Further to the left, a panoply of "peace" groups is all but in league with Islamists. Consider, for instance, QUIT! -- Queers Undermining Israeli Terrorism -- a group that, in its hatred for Israel, curiously fails to notice that Tel Aviv is the only city in the Middle East that annually hosts a gay-pride parade.

An instinct for pacifism surely goes some way toward explaining the left's curious unwillingness to sign up for a war to defend its core values. A suspicion of black-and-white moral distinctions of the kind President Bush is fond of making about terrorism -- a suspicion that easily slides into moral relativism -- is another.

But there are deeper factors at work. One is appeasement: "Many Europeans feel that a confrontation with Islamism will give the Islamists more opportunities to recruit -- that confronting evil is counterproductive," says Ayaan Hirsi Ali, the Somali-born, former Dutch parliamentarian whose outspoken opposition to Islamism (and to Islam itself) forced her repeatedly into hiding and now into exile in the United States. "They think that by appeasing them -- allowing them their own ghettoes, their own Muslim schools -- they will win their friendship."

A second factor, she says, is the superficial confluence between the bugaboos of the Chomskyite left and modern-day Islamism. "Many social democrats have this stereotype that the corporate world, the U.S. and Israel are the real evil. And [since] Islamists are also against Israel and America, [social democrats] sense an alliance with them."

But the really "lethal mistake," she says, "is the confusion of Islam, which is a body of ideas, with ethnicity." Liberals especially are reluctant to criticize the content of Islam because they fear that it is tantamount to criticizing Muslims as a group, and is therefore almost a species of racism. Yet Muslims, she says, "are responsible for their ideas. If it is written in the Koran that you must kill apostates, kill the unbelievers, kill gays, then it is legitimate and urgent to say, 'if that is what your God tells you, you have to modify it.'"

A similar rethink may be in order among liberals and progressives. For whatever else distinguishes Islamism from liberalism, both are remarkably self-absorbed affairs, obsessed with maintaining the purity of their own values no matter what the cost. In the former case, the result too often is terror. In the latter, the ultimate risk is suicide, as the endless indulgence of "the other" obstructs the deeper need to preserve itself. Liberal beliefs -- and the Rachel Newmans of the world -- deserve to be protected and fought for. A liberalism that abandons its own defense to others does not, something liberals everywhere might usefully dwell on during this season of sad remembrance.

A War Of Words (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

There was a time, not so long ago, when no one ever spoke of an American "homeland." During World War II there was a home front, and of course there has always been a heartland between the two heartless coasts, but no one thought of our big-shouldered cities, traffic-choked suburbs, purple mountains' majesties and amber waves of grain as anything called a homeland.

The United States was always a place for people who had left their homelands behind, a polyglot, rainbow-colored nation whose defining characteristics were vitality, mobility, dynamism and the restless urge to push toward the next frontier. But now we inhabit an official homeland, with an official Department of Homeland Security to protect it.

"Homeland" is one of the burdens left to us by the trauma of Sept. 11, 2001. Words are all we have to give shape to reality, and because we had no words for what happened five years ago -- by definition, language falls short of the unimaginable -- a new lexicon had to be developed. I am convinced that much of this new language, by accident or design, has the effect of clouding our view of our enemies and ourselves. We need to begin choosing our words more carefully, and we need to discard the ones that do not serve us well.

The word homeland is a vivid but relatively inconsequential example -- less a distortion than an infelicitous choice that makes us sound as if we had quaint harvest rituals and a colorful national costume. It strikes an odd note, with its vague connotations of ethnic solidarity and ancient nationalism, and it gives off more than a whiff of us-vs.-them. This nation does have enemies from whom we need vigilant protection, but something more like "domestic security" would have done just fine, with less baggage.

At the other end of the scale, by far the most fateful post-Sept. 11 coinage is "war on terrorism." The phrase that has come to define our era is entirely suspect, except perhaps the "on."

President Bush wasted little time in declaring that the Sept. 11 attacks were acts of war that could be met only with a military response -- a war on terrorism. The invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq certainly fit the rubric of "war," but the most effective ongoing action against al-Qaeda and other jihadist groups has been a worldwide exercise in law enforcement -- surveillance, arrests, detentions, interrogations, prosecutions.

Witness the recent arrests of would-be airline bombers in London, or the fact that so many of the high-value terror suspects held until recently in secret CIA prisons were captured in Pakistan, an ostensible ally. We should call this police work what it is, although that might make it harder to ignore such principles as habeas corpus and due process.

As for the rest of the phrase, terrorism is a tactic, not an enemy. All terrorists are alike in only one regard -- they practice terrorism. Stubbornly refusing to acknowledge important distinctions among them strikes me as insanely self-defeating.

George W. Bush certainly is no great orator, but the White House does understand how language can be used to shape reality. So when the National Security Agency's unprecedented program of electronic eavesdropping was revealed, it was quickly dubbed a "terrorist surveillance program" -- as if somehow, magically, the NSA's computers could deduce who was unquestionably a terrorist without ever happening to overhear a single conversation involving someone who is innocent.

Then there's the matter of what is and is not a "civil war." By laying down this yardstick to judge the war in Iraq, the White House has focused its critics' attention on an irrelevancy. What difference does it make whether unrelenting bloody chaos meets the dictionary definition of a civil war? No difference at all to the next Iraqi civilian killed, or the next American soldier.

People whom it's inconvenient to call criminal suspects or prisoners of war are instead "detainees," as if they've been forced to stay an hour after school. Torture, as spelled out in international agreements, is merely an "alternative" method of questioning. And the steady climb in the death toll in Iraq is "real progress."

On Sunday, Dick Cheney said the reason there have been no attacks in five years is that the administration has done a good job on "homeland security, in terms of the terrorist surveillance program we've put in place, in terms of the financial tracking we put in place, and because of our detainee policy."

There was a time, not so long ago, when people would have scratched their heads and wondered what on earth the vice president was talking about.

Law Firms See An Array Of Fates After Sept. 11 (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 12, 2006

Successes and strains noted five years later

In the five years since the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, attorney H. Taufiq Choudhury said that he has grown numb to the reminders he sees every day on his way to work in lower Manhattan.

"I've gotten used to it," he said. "The feeling is not as sharp."

An immigration lawyer, Choudhury initially relocated his solo practice from the 22nd floor of 1 World Trade Center to midtown Manhattan after the attacks. But today, his firm, which also endured the 1993 trade center bombing, is back in the downtown area.

There is a certain comfort for Choudhury in returning to lower Manhattan, he said, but his practice still suffers as a result of the events on Sept. 11, 2001.

"It has changed for the worst," he said.

Choudhury is just one of an estimated 14,000 New York lawyers -- more than 10 percent of all lawyers in the state -- whose practices were upended when the planes brought down the Twin Towers. The businesses of virtually every lawyer working below 14th Street in Manhattan were affected by the attacks. In the towers themselves, attorneys and support staffers at about 30 law firms lost their offices and, in some cases, their lives.

STARTING OVER

Five years later, some law firms have come back to the downtown area, but many others have opted to start over in areas less scarred.

In Choudhury's case, returning to lower Manhattan made logistical sense, he said, because he commutes from Jersey City, N.J., located directly across the Hudson River from the Ground Zero area.

At first, small-business loans helped jump-start his practice. Later, he was able to pay those off when insurance proceeds came through. He also received assistance from nonprofit groups that helped displaced businesses after the attacks.

While moving back has made his commute easy, re-establishing his business has been difficult, he said. His immigration practice these days has very few new clients, he explained, mainly because of the increase in immigration "bureaucracy" following Sept. 11, 2001.

Obtaining documentation and credentials for business clients and individuals has become, in some cases, impossible, he said, because of rigorous scrutiny from more federal agencies involved in the process.

For a lawyer who does not bill hourly, the red tape has strangled his business, he said.

"The total effect has been devastating for firms like mine," he said.

Also returning to downtown Manhattan was Thacher Proffitt & Wood, which had about 300 people in its offices on three floors of 2 World Trade Center. It now is located at 2 World Financial Center.

Like Choudhury's practice, New York-based Thacher Proffitt initially relocated its New York office to midtown Manhattan. It, too, weathered the 1993 bombing. But most of the similarities between the firms ends there.

"We've done extremely well since we've been back," said Thacher Proffitt partner Omer S.J. Williams. He served as managing partner at the time of the attacks.

Many businesses returning to the area were able to do so at relatively low market rates and through federal and local incentive programs. Incentives for the Liberty Zone -- the area surrounding the World Trade Center site -- included per-employee payments, tax credits and accelerated depreciation programs. Many incentives remain in effect to help rebuild the area that lost as much as 10 percent of its commercial space when the towers collapsed.

But Thacher Proffitt's decision to move its New York offices back to lower Manhattan two years ago was largely based on a "commitment to the downtown area," Williams said.

"It was an emotional thing to get back downtown," he said.

Apparently, it was a good move. Gross revenues for the 274-attorney firm in 2005 were $157 million, up almost 25 percent from the year before, according to The American Lawyer, an affiliate of The National Law Journal. The firm also has offices in Washington; White Plains, N.Y.; Summit, N.J.; and Mexico City.

Some of the more prominent law firms with offices in or near the World Trade Center in September 2001 included Carter, Ledyard & Milburn; Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton; Drinker Biddle & Reath; Harris Beach; Hill Betts & Nash; Holland & Knight; Kenyon & Kenyon; Ohrenstein & Brown; Richards Kibbe & Orbe; and the firms then known as Pillsbury Winthrop; and Sidley Austin Brown & Wood.

Firms that have not returned to lower Manhattan include Harris Beach; Ohrenstein & Brown; Pillsbury Winthrop; and Sidley Austin.

Five years after the event, the pace of redevelopment has frustrated many New Yorkers. Although some transportation arteries and areas surrounding the site have been restored, there are no new structures at Ground Zero.

The results of a poll conducted by Pace University and released in July showed that nearly half of the lower Manhattan residents surveyed thought the rebuilding effort was "on the wrong track." The poll included responses from 511 residents. Critics pointed to state and local officials and developers as the culprits.

NINE MONTHS, SEVEN MOVES

For some attorneys and support personnel at Ohrenstein & Brown, returning to the area was too painful, said partner Michael Brown.

"There were too many people who would just not go back," he said. His firm was located on the 85th floor of 1 World Trade Center when American Airlines Flight 11 crashed into the building.

About 35 people worked in the New York office. After the terrorist attacks, the firm moved locations seven times in nine months before settling at One Penn Plaza, where it now has about 15 attorneys, said Brown. He added that the firm has a long-term lease at its current location. It also has an office in Garden City, N.Y.

The morning of Sept. 11, 2001, Brown was returning from an eye doctor's appointment and was not in the building. Then managing partner Geoffrey Heineman led 15 lawyers and support staff in a desperate descent 85 floors to the street. The firm lost two employees, believed at the time to have been in the elevator when the attacks occurred.

Five years after the event, Brown seems to possess a degree of optimism. Business at the firm now is "fine," he said, adding, however, that the series of moves during the last five years was traumatic.

"It is both a sad and yet in some ways hopeful memory in that you get to understand how resilient people really are," he said.

FBI Has Two Squads In Minnesota Focused On International Terrorism (MINNST)

By Pam Louwagie, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 12, 2006

The unit and its role came to light as the agent in charge reflected on U.S. security since Sept. 11, 2001.

As he reflected on five years of fighting terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks, Minneapolis FBI special agent in charge Michael Tabman said Monday that a second local squad was created last year to focus on international terrorism groups.

The squad, part of the Joint Terrorism Task Force that includes 22 local, state and federal law enforcement agencies, does not signify imminent danger of an attack to the community, Tabman said. It was created, he said, because there is "sufficient activity, people, things that we need to look at, people who may be acting in support of terrorism."

The Minneapolis FBI office had one Joint Terrorism Task Force squad focused on international terrorism before the 2001 attacks -- a group partially credited with the arrest of convicted Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui on immigration charges before the attacks.

Tabman, who took charge here last year, said he wanted a second squad to increase intelligence-gathering and reach out to communities, building trust and cooperation so people feel free to come forward with information.

The squad is one of several local changes that reflect new priorities in the FBI.

"We have gone from an investigative agency to a preventive agency," Tabman said.

A New York City native, Tabman sat down with reporters Monday to share his thoughts on the fight against terrorism over the past five years.

The Patriot Act

Tabman credits the USA Patriot Act with giving the FBI and other agencies better tools to do their work. He said the act helped tear down "the wall" that kept intelligence officials and law enforcement from sharing information before the attacks.

There's still a lot of oversight when decisions are made on intelligence gathering -- something the public still wants, he said. "If we become abusive of that power, then the terrorists have won. They've changed our way of life," he said.

Describing protocol, Tabman said there's "very little chance of us running around as a rogue agency just asking for things we don't need."

By the numbers

Besides adding the second international terrorism squad, which officials would not release details on, Tabman said they've increased the number of intelligence analysts in the Minneapolis office from four to nine and started programs such as a joint venture between business and law enforcement leaders to open lines of communication and share resources and information.

Nationally, there were 35 Joint Terrorism Task Forces before the attacks, local FBI officials said, and now there are 101; the number of special agents have increased from 11,186 to 12,626.

The FBI used to have 23 offices overseas. Now it has 60.

Winning by fighting

Tabman said we're winning by fighting terrorism.

He expects terrorism will be an issue into the next decade or two, but says the improvements mean the country is stronger and safer than it was.

"We're not going to wipe out terrorism, just like we can't wipe out drugs or stop crime completely," Tabman said. "Every day that we don't have a terrorist act, every day that citizens go home and feel confident we'll have a safe day the next day, we've won. We've won significantly."

Local FBI Chief: U-S Response To Terror Has Been Successful (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 12, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - The lead F-B-I agent in Minneapolis says it's no accident that there's been no further terrorist attacks in the five years since 9-11.

Special Agent in Charge Michael Tabman says that reflects the bureau's decision after the attacks to make preventing terrorism its top priority.

At a media briefing today marking the fifth anniversary of the terror attacks, Tabman rattled off statistics he says shows the bureau's emphasis. That includes almost 15-hundred new agents bureau-wide, 65 new anti-terror task forces nationwide between the F-B-I and local law enforcement agencies, and a shift from investigating crimes to preventing them.

Tabman says Americans have to be prepared for the war on terrorism to continue for decades. But he says that every day there's not another attack is a victory.

World Remembers 9-11 But Many Not Crying (AP-Y)

By Elaine Ganley

AP, September 12, 2006

The nations of the world joined Monday in solemn remembrance of Sept. 11 — but for many, resentment of the United States flowed as readily as tears.

Critics say Americans have squandered the goodwill that prompted France's Le Monde newspaper to proclaim "We are all Americans" that somber day after the attacks, and that the Iraq war and other U.S. policies have made the world less safe in the five years since.

Heads bowed in moments of silence for the 3,000 killed in the attacks on New York and Washington — while the No. 2 al-Qaida leader issued new warnings in a videotape. And dissident voices said the world has traded in civil liberties and other democratic rights in its war on terror.

In Europe, where Islamic terror has struck twice since 9/11, in the Madrid train bombings and the London transit attacks, the silent tributes were tinged with doubts and recriminations.

Even German Chancellor Angela Merkel — an advocate of repairing ties with Washington that were frayed under her predecessor Gerhard Schroeder — had veiled criticism of the United States, saying: "The ends cannot justify the means."

"In the fight against international terror ... respect for human rights, tolerance and respect for other cultures must be the maxim of our actions, along with decisiveness and international cooperation," she said.

The international landscape has changed irreversibly since terrorists hijacked four airliners in 2001, crashing two into the World Trade Center, one into the Pentagon and another into a Pennsylvania field.

Adding to the global jitters, a senior al-Qaida leader issued a new warning.

"You gave us every legitimacy and every opportunity to continue fighting you," said Ayman al-Zawahri, addressing the United States. "You should worry about your presence in the (Persian) Gulf and the second place you should worry about is Israel."

Another video posted on the Internet by al-Qaida showed previously unseen footage of a smiling Osama bin Laden and other commanders in a mountain camp apparently planning the Sept. 11 attacks.

Allies in the U.S.-led war on terrorism renewed their resolve Monday to fight fanaticism, while skeptics countered that they can no longer follow a superpower they say has relinquished its right to lead.

"Right after Sept. 11 the world was united with Americans. Their moral leadership was unquestioned," Pawel Zalewski, head of the Polish parliament's foreign relations committee, wrote in the Gazeta Wyborcza. "However, this strong moral authority was abused as a result of the Iraq war."

Exactly five years after its message of solidarity, Le Monde titled its lead editorial "The Mistakes of Bush."

In Caracas, Venezuela, about 200 marchers protested what they called "imperialist terrorism" carried out by the United States since the 9/11 attacks. Demonstrators — many of them supporters of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and some of Arab descent — carried Lebanese, Syrian and Palestinian flags. Many criticized the U.S. invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani wrote President Bush on behalf of the Iraqi people, expressing condolences to the families of Sept. 11 victims.

"On this sad and memorable day, I would like to reiterate the gratitude of the people of Iraq for the people of America and for your leadership," Talabani wrote. "The people of Iraq will never forget those who helped them in getting rid of the most brutal and terrorist regime of Saddam Hussein."

New Zealand's Prime Minister Helen Clark joined many when she said: "No, we're not more secure since 9/11."

Clark said more should be done to reach out to moderate states and leaders in the Islamic world to encourage understanding between different peoples, and to help end the sense of alienation and exclusion among some young Muslims that fuels extremism.

In Europe, bells tolled in Rome's city hall square. Bouquets of white roses and yellow carnations were piled in a memorial garden where the names of 67 Britons killed in the New York attacks are inscribed. Relatives tearfully remembered their dead.

"It doesn't get any easier, but our minds are much calmer, and we can think through all the events without being flooded by tears and sadness," said Adrian Bennett, whose 29-year-old son, Oliver, was killed.

At a 38-nation Asia-Europe summit in Helsinki, Finland, leaders stood in silence in a circle. The stock exchanges in Nordic and Baltic countries observed two minutes of silence to honor the victims.

French President Jacques Chirac, in Helsinki, reiterated in a written message to Bush his nation's "friendship" in the fight against terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0061546

A week after the Sept. 11 attacks, Chirac flew over the World Trade Center site — the first foreign leader to pay personal condolences. That solidarity quickly dissipated into rancor in the buildup to the Iraq war, when Chirac led opposition to Bush's plans.

Israel's Haaretz daily expressed disappointment and cynicism in an op-ed piece that said: "This is Sept. 11 five years later: a political tool in the hands of the Bush administration."

In Southeast Asia, U.S. and Philippine troops fighting Islamic extremists in the jungles prayed for peace and safety. Other remembrances took place in Japan, Australia, Finland, South Korea, Thailand and Indonesia.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who won the country's first post-Taliban election, expressed the appreciation of the Afghan people to the U.S. for the "sacrifices of your sons and daughters" in rebuilding his country. But in the Afghan capital, many residents said they had not seen much improvement since the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban for harboring bin Laden.

Despite about 20,000 U.S. forces fighting al-Qaida and Taliban fighters in Afghanistan, and about the same number of NATO troops, and billions in aid, the Taliban resistance has shaken the country, while corruption has stymied development.

In Brussels, NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer led a solemn military ceremony outside the alliance's headquarters to remember the victims of 9/11. A lone bugler played taps while a ceremonial guard, drawn from each of the 26 NATO member nations, lowered national flags to half-staff.

"Terrorism remains a threat to all of us ... this is why we are in Afghanistan, the cradle of 9/11," de Hoop Scheffer said, calling on NATO nations to "strengthen our alliance politically and militarily to meet this new scourge."

The Apocalypse Will Be Blogged (NYT)

By Bernard Haykel And Saud Al-sarhan

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

NEARLY every organ of the American news media marked the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 yesterday. But the Web sites affiliated with many of militant jihadism's top thinkers, including Abu Muhammad al-Maqdisi and Sulayman al-Alwan, remained silent. That shouldn't surprise us: the Salafi strain of Islam, to which most jihadis subscribe, prohibits commemorating anniversaries.

Celebrations other than the holidays of Id al-Fitr and Id al-Adha are considered reprehensible adaptations of non-Muslim ways. What's more, the jihadis normally use the lunar calendar, by which the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11, 2001, fell on July 19.

Perhaps more remarkable was the fact that this year, a number of Web sites affiliated with Al Qaeda did commemorate the day — no doubt because they knew Americans would. Osama bin Laden and his associates have generally referred to the Sept. 11 attacks as "the attacks on Manhattan," "the invasion of Manhattan" or the "attacks of Jumada," the lunar month in which they occurred. But this year, a number of jihadi sites have referred instead to Sept. 11.

Some messages yesterday were clearly meant for Western consumption, reminding the United States that Al Qaeda is still active and bent on future attacks, and even posting images overlaid with threats in English.

What follow are excerpts, translated from the Arabic, from texts posted on jihadi Web sites about the anniversary.

With God's help and yours, let us make the fifth anniversary of the events of Sept. 11 the beginning of a boycott of all Zionist-American products that are sold in Arab and Muslim countries. Many continue to buy these products despite all they see and hear about the killing, torture and destruction that Muslims are faced with due to the Crusader and Zionist-American war. Let us boycott these products because we do not need them, nor are they to be considered absolute necessities. Here is a list of the companies and products that should be boycotted: Coca-Cola, Proctor & Gamble, Nike, Mars, McDonald's ... "Pepsi" stands for "Pay Every Penny to Save Israel." ...

I'm against America even if it turns this life into a paradise

I'm against America even if a mufti issues a fatwa in its favor from within the glorious Kaaba

I'm with Osama no matter where he might be, so long as he carries a banner on the battle front

I'm with Osama whether he gains a quick victory or attains the rank of the martyrs.

A submission to a Qaeda Web site called for readers to sign their names to the following statement:

In the name of God the merciful and the compassionate, Monday morning is the fifth anniversary of the glorious attacks on New York and Washington accomplished by the 19 heroes of the Muslim community — may God have mercy on them and raise them to the highest rank for their sacrifice. They pressed America's nose into the ground and allowed the whole world to witness the destruction of its economic and military citadels. In so doing, they crushed the myth with which America had terrorized the world, namely that it was the greatest power on earth and no one was strong enough to confront, let alone make an enemy, of it....

That day changed the world, even by the admission of our enemies, and created ... a world divided into two camps, as our sheik and leader Osama bin Laden — may God protect him — has stated: "A camp of belief and another camp of hypocrisy and disbelief." Choose for yourself, o Muslim, which camp to belong to: that of belief, Islam and jihad under the banner of the holy warriors or that of hypocrisy and unbelief under the banner of America, the crusading West and those hypocrites who have banded with them. Our congratulations to all and we beseech God to show us in America another black day like that blessed Tuesday.

A poster calling himself Abu Lujayn Ibrahim contributed the following to a Saudi site that often posts jihadi material but is not controlled by Al Qaeda.

The text was interspersed with gruesome photographs of dead and mutilated children in the Middle East.

Before my eyes is a veil that does not permit me to see those killed in the twin towers, nor to remember them on this day. Indeed, I don't see those killed in the twin towers nor remember them on this day! Do you know why?

Because their fallen are not purer or better than our fallen. And because the blood of my Muslim brothers and that of my family in Palestine ... and in Iraq and in Afghanistan and in every location in which Muslim blood is shed has blocked my vision ...filled my retinas with black lines so that I can see only our martyrs and injured being slain by America's weapons and its support .... Yes, Sept. 11 is the anniversary of the fall of American arrogance into history's garbage dump, and of the rebellion against injustice.

Hamid ibn Abdallah al-Ali is a Kuwaiti ideologue of jihadism — the only Qaeda intellectual to have posted a text specifically for the Sept. 11 anniversary. The sheik cites an article by Leonard Peikoff, heir and executor to Ayn Rand, that appeared as an advertisement in The New York Times shortly after the 9/11 attacks.

In his article "End States that Sponsor Terrorism," Leonard Peikoff, one of the leading ideologues of American extremism, concluded that America's policy of appeasement toward the Muslim world led to Sept. 11. For 50 years, he writes, American administrations have relinquished their true ownership rights over Muslim oil resources, which they discovered and developed the technology to extract. The solution, according to Mr. Peikoff, is for the United States to eliminate the states that sponsor terrorism with the most lethal weapons at its disposal.

This is exactly the kind of rotten thinking that animates those living in the extreme west of the globe, from where they spread their rot to the rest of the world — these politicians of underdevelopment, criminality and mass extermination of humanity. This is the arrogance of fascism, of which Bush has accused Muslims recently: in this case it is the fascism of the cross standing on the tribunes of oil. In short, it means that they own our oil that is in our land; they own our blood, which they can shed at will; they own our present and future, and they have the right to change our history and our education!...

Hunger, disease, thirst and regional wars instigated by poverty all stem from the greed of the West, its thirst for plunder and desire to control the world's wealth. These in turn lead to a rate of destruction every year that equals the destruction World War II effected over six years.

The mercenaries who dominate the World Trade Organization ... the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund ...the bloodsuckers of the world's poor, the immiserators of nations and the thieves, murderers, shedders of blood: these are the ones who control the international political system. They are the ones who spread their armies throughout the world, terrorizing and stealing the wealth of nations while enslaving them. They are the ones who are exterminating the people of Afghanistan, Iraq, Palestine, Lebanon and other places. They are the ones who ally themselves to the despotic rulers in order to suck the blood of the people, using companies that are owned by the leaders of their countries and headed by murderers and criminals.

This essay, called "The Day Smoke and Dust Covered New York's Sky," was posted to a Qaeda-affiliated Web site:

What a beautiful morning it is today, an amazing morning when we witnessed this great power flailing in every direction as if it were a slaughtered headless animal....

Some believe that if Bush were to leave then the situation would improve and become stable. But the eternal truth is that there is no difference between Bush and the one who preceded him, or the one who will succeed him, and for a very simple reason: cloning is an inherent property of the American presidential personality. Every new president is a perfect copy of the previous one...

Three children, 10 or 11 years old, who watched the recently released film "United 93" at the theater zealously and gleefully cheered when the plane hit the tower, as if they were watching a goal being scored in a soccer match against an opposing team. What is it that makes these children so happy about this crash that they stand up and strongly applaud? Ask yourselves, oh Americans, what is it that made those 19 young men engage in such a legendary and miraculous act...?

Naturally, you will not bother to investigate, because you are not concerned with the reasons, and even if you find the answer you are incapable of understanding it. Therefore, nothing will change, and your troops will continue to invade our lands in order to teach us lessons about the virtues of American freedom and the well-known methods for spreading them, like flushing the Quran down the toilet, or one of your soldiers' stepping with his filthy foot on the face of a prisoner, having placed a metal chain like a dog leash around his neck, as we saw in Abu Ghraib.

You will witness anew men as brilliant as Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Ramzi bin al-Shibh, and as determined as Muhammad Atta, whom you saw on the monitoring screens full of self-assurance in his blue shirt.... Who knows, perhaps we will see another glorious day soon!

Rice Thanks Canadians For Post-9/11 Help (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday the generosity of Canadians who took in thousands of stranded American air passengers five years ago represents the best of human nature in the face of evil.

The top U.S. diplomat commemorated the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terror attacks with a short visit to the closest U.S. ally. She read a letter of thanks from President Bush to employees at Halifax's small airport who helped coordinate a huge impromptu aid effort.

More than 30,000 travelers on 247 U.S.-bound planes were diverted to Canada on Sept. 11, and most were stranded there during the nearly three days that U.S. airspace was closed for fear that more planes could be used to attack buildings. Halifax itself received 44 planes bearing more than 7,000 passengers.

"There is indeed evil in the world, and we saw its awful face on that horrible day," Rice said inside an echoing airport hangar. "But it is also a day to recognize that very often when the worst in human nature and human behavior exhibits itself, so does the best."

Rice's fifth anniversary visit came as President Bush toured the three sites where hijacked jetliners crashed in 2001.

In Halifax, residents opened their homes to complete strangers, sometimes for days at a time. Other travelers camped out at the airport, in school gyms, stadiums and cafeterias. Residents dropped off donated toothbrushes, towels and clothes.

The story of Canadian generosity is not well known in the United States, where news converge and public attention were focused on the aftermath of horror and death in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

During her overnight visit, Rice was also visiting the Nova Scotia parliamentary district of Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay. The detour from Rice's usual itinerary of foreign capitals is a nod to Canada's new Conservative government after strained relations with Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin. His government refused to take part in the U.S.-led attack on Iraq and rebuffed the Bush administration's plan for a cooperative North American missile defense scheme.

House In 9-11 Standoff (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, September 12, 2006

House Republicans and Democrats are locked in a standoff over the language of a resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Democratic leaders want the GOP to remove any reference to legislation passed in response to the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon, which include the USA Patriot Act of 2001, the Homeland Security Act of 2002 and the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004.

Republicans argue that many of these accomplishments were listed in two of the previous four such annual resolutions.

Democrats requested that Republican leaders remove a long passage that refers to the bills signed by President Bush, according to a draft from Sept. 6 obtained by The Hill.

GOP leaders refused, citing the two previous resolutions and a need for Congress to refer to its accomplishments following the attacks.

Homeland Security Chairman Pete King (R-N.Y.) was hopeful the leaders could broker a deal and get the resolution to the floor. His office is looking for chairmen and ranking members from the other committees to build support for the bill as it stands.

"I'm actually very disappointed in the Democratic leadership," said King, who spent yesterday at events commemorating the attacks.

"To me, it makes sense for the Congress to mention the legislation we passed," he said, "I just think they are drawing attention to themselves. I think it's making them look bad."

The controversial passage begins: "Whereas Congress passed, the president signed, numerous laws to assist victims, combat forces of terrorism, protect the Homeland and support members of the Armed Forces who defend American interests at home and abroad."

Democrats support that language, a leadership aide said, but oppose the mention of specific bills.

The rest of the section goes on to mention passage of the USA Patriot Act and its renewal this year, the 2002 Enhanced Border

Security and Visa Entry Reform Act, the 2002 Maritime Transportation and Security Act, the bill to create a director of national intelligence, the bill creating a national standard for IDs accepted by federal safety officials, and the 21st Century Emergency Communications Act of 2006 that enhanced the communications abilities of federal, state and local first responders.

The spat illustrates the partisan tension besetting both parties heading into the November midterm elections, which has been a factor preventing substantive legislation this year.

Negotiations on the resolution's language have been mainly between House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) staff and aides to King and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), King and a GOP leadership aide said.

This is the third such standoff between the Speaker's office and Pelosi's staff since mid-June. The two earlier fights were over language used in a resolution to support war efforts in Iraq and a resolution to articulate House support for Israel in its fight with Hezbollah terrorists.

The tension on this resolution built late last week when Pelosi released a letter to the San Francisco Chronicle that she sent to Hastert on Thursday, the second of two such notes. In it, the minority leader argued that the draft resolution "unfortunately injects controversial political issues into a subject that must remain free of partisan and political rhetoric."

"It is inappropriate, in this solemn and commemorative resolution, to reference legislation which generated bipartisan opposition and controversy," Pelosi continued.

Republicans have since unearthed the previous four resolutions to prove that legislative accomplishments were mentioned in resolutions honoring the first and third anniversaries of Sept. 11.

A passage from the first anniversary resolution mentions the creation of the Department of Homeland Security and contains an oblique reference to the USA Patriot Act, which congressional leaders marshaled through Congress in a mere 60 days following the attacks.

On Sept. 9, 2004, less than two months before the presidential election, Congress approved a resolution to honor the third anniversary of the attacks. It included a long list of individual federal programs that were either created or enhanced in the aftermath of those attacks. But the bill does not mention the specific legislation creating any of those programs.

The resolutions in 2003 and 2005 made no mention of legislation or programs. Each of the five resolutions focuses primarily on honoring those who died.

Republicans have mounted a communications campaign this fall to highlight their strength on national security, which includes references to the terrorist attacks.

It may be that neither side can benefit from the new controversy, but both pointed fingers yesterday.

"Democrats seem to care more about the November elections and risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on Sept. 11 than work with us in a bipartisan way," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "They don't even want the 9/11 intelligence reform bill to be recognized by Congress.

"We consider Sept. 11 so sacrosanct and nonpolitical that we're offering this resolution on Sept. 13 because the New York primary is on the 12th and we don't want politics to come into play."

Democrats echoed those claims in criticizing their Republican counterparts.

"The memory of 9/11 is sacred," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said. "It was a day to put divisions aside and unite in support of innocent victims and America's fight against terrorism. That is the spirit of what Republicans should offer. Instead, Republicans hope to score political points."

Parties Bicker Over 9/11 Bill (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

While House Republican and Democratic leaders joined together Monday night on the steps of the Capitol to pray and sing "God Bless America" to commemorate the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, a less-bipartisan affair occurred behind the scenes as the offices of Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) battled over the text of a resolution to mark the tragedy.

Deliberations over the annual anniversary resolution stalemated Monday, according to several House aides, with the GOP leadership now expected to bring the legislation to the floor Wednesday despite Democrats' unhappiness with the text of the measure.

"Negotiations have stopped," said a GOP leadership aide, who confirmed Hastert's office had walked away from the negotiating table. "We're going forward with it."

It is not the first time Hastert and Pelosi have sparred over the details of nonbinding resolutions — the two leaders have squabbled repeatedly on symbolic measures related to terrorism and the Iraq War — but it is indicative of the tone of the year's political season when the chamber's leading officials cannot agree on the wording of a Sept. 11 resolution, despite the fact that previous versions have overwhelmingly passed the House every year since 2001.

Bickering over the merits of one section in the otherwise bipartisan resolution has stoked tensions between the two top leadership offices, and each camp has sought to paint the other as acting with partisan motives.

"Congress should honor the innocent victims and resolve to continue to fight terrorism in the same unified sprit we came together with on Sept. 11, 2001," said Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's spokeswoman. "Unfortunately Republicans are more concerned about scoring political points."

Ron Bonjean, communications director for Hastert, offered similar criticism for the other party: "Democrats seem to care more about the November elections and risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on Sept. 11 than work with us in a bipartisan way."

According to both GOP and Democratic aides familiar with the dispute, Pelosi's office sought to strike a section of the resolution that acknowledges a series of laws enacted since 2001 to "assist victims, combat the forces of terrorism, protect the homeland and support the members of the Armed Forces who defend American interests at home and abroad."

Those laws include the USA PATRIOT Act, the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, and a number of border security, intelligence reform and port security laws.

In a letter sent to Hastert Thursday and released publicly by her office, Pelosi initially requested a resolution in line with the one approved 402-6 last year, on that makes no mention of specific legislation.

The California lawmaker also sought alterations in a telephone conversation with Hastert last week.

"This is not a time to praise Congress," she wrote in last week's letter. "It is time to offer our sympathies to the families of those who suffered losses on September 11th."

Many Democrats, including Pelosi, have questioned the merits of the legislation listed in the resolution and whether such laws have made America safer.

GOP aides familiar with the resolution said Hastert's office believed Pelosi's insistence to remove the references to legislation from the text went too far and they strongly disputed suggestions that the inclusion of the text was an attempt to put Democrats on the record as supportive of the legislation itself.

Republicans also believe that Democrats want to omit any discussion of Congressional achievements from the Sept. 11 bill because the minority party has been utilizing an election-year strategy accusing the GOP of not doing enough to protect the country from future attacks.

But Democratic aides countered those arguments, questioning why specific legislation would be cited in the bill, unlike previous years.

"Democrats want to vote on the resolution that we voted on last year. It was acceptable to Republicans then. Why is it suddenly unacceptable?" Crider said. "The people who are making this political are Republicans. We had hoped that this would be bipartisan and unifying."

Despite the partisan divide over the resolution's contents, House lawmakers are expected to pass the measure by a wide margin, as Democrats would be hard-pressed to oppose language praising civilians and first responders, as well as military personnel deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Democrats will show their support for the innocent victims of 9/11 and our continued fight in the war against terror," said one Democratic aide.

This week's dispute is only the latest of several instances where the top two House leaders were unable to agree on the text of a non-binding resolution.

In June, Democrats complained that the GOP was overly partisan in its crafting of a resolution that was used as the vehicle for a day-long debate on the Iraq War.

Iraq also was the subject of a spat in 2004, when negotiations between Hastert's and Pelosi's offices broke down over a resolution on abuses in military prisons. And in 2003, the two sides bickered over the wording of a resolution supporting American troops in Iraq.

In the Senate, this year's Sept. 11 resolution has sparked little contention, and lawmakers passed their measure under unanimous consent Monday night.

A Solemn, Sad Moment To Reflect, But Politics Also Surfaces (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — With their hands clasped to their hearts, Democratic and Republican members of Congress stood shoulder to shoulder on the steps of the Capitol on Monday evening and sang "The Star-Spangled Banner," in a ceremony echoing a spontaneous moment on the evening of the 2001 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0061552

"It is my sincere hope that we will reignite our united purpose," Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, said on the Senate floor before the ceremony. For 20 civil minutes, the Republican and Democratic leaders of the House and Senate took turns paying tribute to the victims of Sept. 11, before ending with "God Bless America."

But eight weeks before Election Day in the most contested midterm election in 12 years, even the tragedy of Sept. 11 could go only so far in uniting the two parties.

Back inside the Capitol, Republicans and Democrats were squabbling over the wording of a Sept. 11 resolution in what aides to both parties acknowledged was, to no small extent, a bid to gain political advantage. And throughout the day, even as Democratic and Republican aides talked about efforts to avoid being seen as tarnishing the memory of the attacks with blatant political appeals, candidates and Congressional leaders were issuing statements reflecting political implications that Republicans and Democrats saw in the day's events.

"We can't afford to grow complacent," said Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, as he signaled that Republicans intended to try to keep the issue alive with votes on national security initiatives.

And Democrats were no less aggressive in trying to frame the issue. "After 9/11, I think we lost an historic opportunity as a nation to bring a great deal of the world with us on the war against international terrorism," said James Webb, a Democrat challenging Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, in a closely watched race. "And we squandered that in the situation in Iraq."

The battle over the anniversary resolution reflected just how politically charged the day has become.

Congress has passed a resolution every year. In non-election years, the resolution has simply noted the valor of rescue workers and extended sympathies to families.

But in election years — 2002, 2004 and now 2006 — the Republican-controlled House has included language heralding accomplishments in the war on terror. This time, the Republican version of the resolution applauded the reauthorization of the legislation known as the USA Patriot Act, as well as the tough immigration bill passed in the House.

"They are asking us to endorse several things that many members voted against," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader. "9/11 should be a sacred day where we all come together and we remember the victims and we resolve to fight the terrorists. It shouldn't be a day to score political points."

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the House speaker, said the resolution was similar to those passed in earlier years. "The day of Sept. 11 is sacrosanct," Mr. Bonjean said. "Politics are not involved, nor should they be. We think the other side has overthought the issue."

The House will vote on the resolution on Wednesday. Republicans had hoped to hold the vote on Tuesday but put it off after assessing some real-life political concerns: there are a series of party primaries that day, so some members will not be around.

Lawmakers Unite Once Again Over 9/11 (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

Five years after lawmakers and Hill staffers fled the Capitol in fear of a terrorist attack like those at the Pentagon and World Trade Center, politicians gave a message of unity and determination yesterday.

"Today, we are called to put aside the differences that divide us and to remember the resolve of a September morning," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. "We are called to resummon the courage of a nation that came together on its darkest day around a common principle and a vision of hope. The principle being that we are Americans, and Americans shall always be free."

In a rare bipartisan event, Mr. Frist and Republican leaders joined Democratic leaders Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi and about 100 other lawmakers on the steps of the Capitol. The lawmakers recalled the evening of September 11 when many members of Congress gathered on the steps and sang "God Bless America."

Republicans and Democrats came together for that moment in a spontaneous show of patriotism, members said yesterday as they enter what are sure to be the bitter last two months of the election season.

Many echoed Mr. Frist's comments that September 11 was "a day that forever changed our world."

DOJ_NMG_0061553

Mr. Reid of Nevada said the American spirit now lives in everyone's heart -- with heroes of the terrorist attacks keeping a bright light shining on the nation.

"September 11th will always be our burden," he said. "Our minds, our souls, our hearts cannot forget."

The leaders praised the sacrifice of passengers on United Flight 93, who are thought to have tried to regain control of their hijacked plane, which likely was headed to the Capitol or the White House but instead crashed into a Pennsylvania field.

"We must protect and save the American people, because right now we are not fully safe and we are not fully healed," said Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat. "So it is important for us to continue to come together for that healing."

The party machines, which normally send dozens of e-mails a day blasting their political foes, yesterday agreed to a rhetoric cease-fire, avoiding negative campaigning and press statements on anything other than honoring the heroes of September 11.

In 2001, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois told lawmakers that both parties would stand "shoulder to shoulder to fight this evil that has perpetrated on this nation," according to press accounts.

Since then, Republicans and Democrats have feuded over September 11 -- its consequences, who is to blame and whether it should be used as justification for the war in Iraq.

This week, the House will consider a resolution commemorating the anniversary of the attacks, but Democrats have accused Republicans of larding the legislation with partisanship such as praise for the USA Patriot Act.

Some offered a reminder of the consequences of the terrorist attacks.

"Five years later, we are still a nation in mourning, and we are also a nation at war," Mr. Hastert said yesterday. "It is important, especially today, and especially here in this place, that we remember the difference.

"We do not fight to heal our wounds or to avenge our dead," he said. "We do not seek retribution but rather freedom and justice and peace."

The lawmakers closed the event with most joining hands and singing, again, the words that united them five years ago: "God bless America, my home sweet home."

Whereas Congress Cannot Set Aside Politics . . . (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

It is a testament to how far Congress has come from the post-attack unity of five years ago that House Republicans and Democrats are fighting over a resolution commemorating the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The resolution is the legislative centerpiece of the week in the House, and each side is accusing the other of using the resolution for political gain.

The dispute is not over the resolution's conclusions, which include the continued recognition of Sept. 11 as a day of remembrance, mourning and honoring first responders.

The wrangling, instead, is over one of 15 "whereas" clauses, in which Democrats see a possible trap: "Whereas Congress passed, and the President signed, numerous laws to assist victims, combat the forces of terrorism, protect the Homeland and support members of the Armed forces who defend American interests at home and abroad, including: the USA Patriot Act of 2001 and its 2006 reauthorization; the Homeland Security Act of 2002; the Enhanced Border Security and Visa Entry Reform Act of 2002; the Maritime Transportation Security Act of 2002; the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004; the Border Protection, Antiterrorism, and Illegal Immigration Control Act of 2005; the Safe Port Act of 2006; and the 21st Century Emergency Communications Act of 2006."

Democrats can vote for the resolution and in so doing, praise controversial legislation that many of them opposed. Or they can vote against the resolution and be portrayed as forsaking the victims and heroes of 9/11.

"This should be a resolution about unity, undertaken in the same spirit we came together to show on September 11, 2001," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Republicans say that Democrats are hoping to strike any reference to Congress's response to the attacks, in order to preserve the claim that the "do-nothing Congress" has done nothing to make the country safer. Democrats would rather "risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on Sept. 11 than work with us in a bipartisan way," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

GOP leaders yesterday sent the resolution to the House International Relations Committee for final approval. Democrats conceded privately the resolution will pass overwhelmingly, with or without Pelosi's signature on top.GOP Allies on Immigration Split on Tribunals

The core of GOP senators who successfully insisted that Congress take a moderate route on immigration legislation is spearheading the push for a bipartisan bill on military tribunals. This time, however, the group lacks the support of three key figures: President Bush, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

Playing central roles in both issues are Republican Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), John W. Warner (Va.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.).

In the months-long debate over immigration, they helped steer the Senate toward a bipartisan bill that, unlike the House version, would have allowed many illegal immigrants to pursue a path toward legal status. Most GOP senators opposed the bill, but it passed with the backing of 38 Democrats and 23 Republicans, including Frist and McConnell. Bush also supported it.

Now, however, Frist, McConnell and Bush oppose the McCain-led team on the question of how to regulate trials of enemy combatants being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Bush wants a hard-line stand on prosecutions, including the possible use of classified information that is never shown to defendants. Frist and McConnell, who visited Guantanamo on Sunday, support the president, leaving McCain and his allies with a steeper climb than they faced in the immigration fight.Lobbying Legislation Goes Quietly

The House will say goodbye to the once-trumpeted lobby-reform bill as early as this week. Lawmakers are reluctant to express their intentions exactly that way, but senior staffers said that when the House votes to change its rules to make "earmarks" -- narrowly focused spending projects -- more transparent to the public, that will signal that they have given up hope of approving a broader lobbying measure.

In January, spurred by lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty pleas on fraud and conspiracy charges, Republican leaders called the lobby legislation a top priority. But the bill quickly ran into trouble as lawmakers resisted provisions that would limit their interaction with lobbyists. Voters expressed little concern when the legislation was diluted.

Now, bogged down by a disagreement over a House-passed provision that would restrict independent campaign organizations called 527s, Congress is poised to punt on the entire exercise. As a consolation, GOP leaders in both chambers said they want to require lawmakers to disclose the earmarks contained in any bill and to name the earmarks' sponsors.

The House is still developing its earmark-disclosure language, aides said. In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) plans to ask for similar legislation to be drafted this week.

With 9/11 Film, Kean Finds Tough Critic In Hamilton (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

There have been few political love stories as beautiful as that of Tom Kean and Lee Hamilton, the former chairman and vice chairman of the 9/11 commission.

"I have never worked with anybody I've come to respect more than Lee Hamilton," Republican Kean said at a Sept. 11 fifth-anniversary joint performance with Hamilton yesterday.

"He is one of the preeminent public servants of our day, bar none," came Democrat Hamilton's well-worn reply.

So it packed even more punch when Hamilton, at the National Press Club luncheon, lectured his friend about the falsified Sept. 11 docudrama Kean helped ABC produce.

"It is either a documentary or it is a drama, and to fudge it causes me a great deal of concern and suggests to me that news and entertainment are getting dangerously intertwined," the former congressman from Indiana said of his friend's film. "And I do not think that that is good for the country, because an event of this consequence is very hard to understand, and to distort it or not to present it factually in this kind of a presentation, I think, does not serve the country well."

Kean, the "co-executive producer" of this disservice, stood at Hamilton's side, his hands clasped in front of him, grinning awkwardly.

In the past five days, the former New Jersey governor has infuriated many a Democrat who saw him as a nonpartisan truth-teller. In his work on ABC's "The Path to 9/11," Kean has blessed what has been documented to be a collection of falsehoods -- a disproportionate number of which make the Clinton administration look bad.

Critics on the left say Kean's bout of partisanship was brought on by the campaign of his son Tom Jr. for a Senate seat from New Jersey (ABC News was confused enough between father and son to say in its political calendar that "candidate Tom Kean Jr." was appearing with Hamilton). Whatever the motive, Kean's foray into the land of make-believe has thrilled those who seek to discredit the 9/11 commission's report.

The press club was thick with such people yesterday before Kean's arrival. In the Edward R. Murrow Room, conspiracy-minded characters hung posters announcing: "Neither planes nor fires brought the buildings down. Controlled demolitions did."

"They label us as kooks or wackos or conspiracy theorists," complained David von Kleist, making quotation marks with his fingers for the audience. But the "bottom line," he added, is that "this was an inside job . . . the terrorists didn't do it."

Lynn Pentz asked why plane wreckage was not seen at the Pentagon. "We're essentially to believe that the two six-ton titanium engines vaporized?" she asked.

The participants said the ABC show, which initially had claimed to be based on the 9/11 commission's report, proved their thesis that Kean lives in the realm of fiction. "It's a dramatized fraud of a fraud," said Jim Marrs, author of "The Terror Conspiracy."

Next door, in the John Peter Zenger Room, a group of 9/11 families were touting a new documentary, "9/11: Press for Truth," which promises that "the coverup" will be "exposed by the 9/11 families."

Kyle Hence, the documentary's producer, used Kean's role in the ABC film as his opening. "The consensus seems to be that this verges on propaganda; it distorts what happened," he said. "We'd like to put forward '9/11: Press for Truth' as a counternarrative, as a true documentary, not a dramatization, not a distortion of the truth."

An hour later in the press club's ballroom, Kean professed to being puzzled by the conspiracy crowd.

"It seems every time there's a traumatic event in American history, it spawns conspiracy theories," he said with a laugh. "I mean, people still think that John Wilkes Booth got away and hid somewhere in the South. As for the 9/11 conspiracy theories, he said, "I don't know what to do about them."

Kean saw no link between the conspiracists and his work in the docudrama trade. When the ABC question was put to him, Kean declared himself mystified by the criticism.

"I've been confounded by this whole controversy," he said innocently. He said that the film's creators are "serious people who wanted to do the best job possible," that it "was a responsible project" and that "I thought they did a good job."

His one attempt at distancing himself was halfhearted. "I was not the producer or director or the author or the writer or whatever else," said co-executive producer Kean.

Hamilton, a tireless Kean booster, answered with some rare public criticism of his partner. "They didn't ask me to participate in this," he said acidly, adding that complaints from Clinton officials were "accurate in their criticisms of ABC." As for the "docudrama" format, the no-nonsense Hoosier said: "I don't like the ring of that."

Spontaneous applause followed Hamilton's criticism.

If Kean was surprised by the scolding, he shouldn't have been. Even before the ABC question came, Hamilton volunteered some stern remarks about the importance of truth. "Facts are not Republican and they're not Democrat," he said. "They're not ideological. Facts are facts."

On this point, Kean was silent.

The Fictional Path To 9/11 (NYT)

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Perhaps the entertainment industry will come up with a few lasting lessons from the outcry over ABC's "dramatization" of the events leading up to the terrorist attacks on 9/11. One suggestion: when attempting to recreate real events on screen, you do not show real people doing things they never did.

The film, a fictionalized portrayal of the nation's failure to head off the attack on the World Trade Center, was shown Sunday and Monday. The second episode was wrapped around a live speech by President Bush, so it was especially unfortunate that the most questionable scenes all seemed to make the Clinton administration look worse, and Mr. Bush look better, than the record indicates.

Some of the most controversial scenes were cut at the last minute. But the first episode, for instance, showed C.I.A. agents and the charismatic leader of Afghanistan's Northern Alliance perched outside a bin Laden camp, ready to swoop in and capture him if only Washington approved. The authorization is not granted, and the Afghan leader rails, "Are there no men in Washington, or are they all cowards?" Yet neither C.I.A. operatives nor the Northern Alliance leader ever laid eyes on Osama bin Laden, terrorism experts say. The film may be referring to a proposed raid by other Afghan tribesmen that was vetoed by the C.I.A. because it had a low probability of success and was apt to harm civilians.

The "docudrama" format can be useful in allowing viewers to see recent history through the eyes of fictional characters inserted in the action. But it carries the inherent risk that scriptwriters will take the opportunity to improve on history. ABC should certainly have been aware this was a danger with such a politically charged topic. If that thought never occurred to the folks in charge, they might have heard warning bells when Rush Limbaugh went on the air promoting the film and bragging that the writer was a friend of his.

It was especially disturbing that Tom Kean, co-chairman of the 9/11 commission and a former Republican governor of New Jersey, was willing to lend his prestige to this ill-considered project. Mr. Kean served as a senior consultant to the miniseries and has repeatedly defended it in public, even as several Democratic members of the commission criticized its distortions. Mr. Kean has said he will give his payment to charity, but that does not undo the damage done to the aura of bipartisanship that has surrounded the commission's work. And it has not defused concerns that Mr. Kean did it in part to help his son, who is the Republican candidate for Senate in a close race in New Jersey.

Maybe Mr. Kean wasn't entirely kidding when he quipped that he had not apologized to President Bill Clinton for any inaccuracies because "he was out campaigning against my son yesterday, so I didn't reach out to him at all." Whatever his motives, he has tarnished his carefully nurtured image of a statesman above the political fray.

Serious Gaps Seen In Airline Security Since 9/11 Attacks (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

Congress has spent billions to protect against future airplane hijackings, but critics say many changes made are haphazard and misguided and that serious security gaps remain in place five years after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

"We are a token amount safer only because we are more aware -- but nowhere near safe enough to be confident," says David Mackett, director of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance. "The systems we've spent billions on have a record that is anything but confidence inspiring."

Mr. Mackett says airline security is a "patchwork" of "desperate attempts" to appear safe without offering long-term solutions.

Reinforcing cockpit doors is the accomplishment most cited by government officials to keep terrorists from gaining the controls of airplanes, but Mr. Mackett says several breeches have occurred putting pilots at risk.

"We're just trying to keep the pies from falling off the end of the conveyer belt," said Mr. Mackett, a commercial airline pilot.

In one incident, a drunken passenger kicked a door panel open during a flight to Argentina, and a passenger on another flight watched a crew member input the door code and later used that code to open the door, thinking it was the lavatory. In another incident, on a bet, a cleanup crew drove a beverage cart through a door, Mr. Mackett said.

In a speech Friday at Georgetown University, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said, "We have succeeded in laying over the last five years a solid foundation for the future of our aviation-security efforts for the five years and the 10 years to come."

He cited the hardening of cockpit doors, "thousands" of federal air marshals "on aircraft protecting travelers every day all over the world" and "armed flight deck officers authorized and trained to defend the cockpit."

"To be sure, there's more to do," he said. "The enemy constantly adapts his tactics and his methods. And we have to keep pace and get ahead of those."

While all airlines have installed new doors, United Airlines is the only company that has installed steel cable barriers to prevent someone from charging the flight deck.

"Pilots still leave the flight deck vulnerable when they go in and out to use the lavatory or when the flight attendants serve them food and beverages," says one former air marshal.

Only a small fraction of 25,000 to 30,000 daily flights are protected by air marshals -- who number less than 2,500 due to high attrition -- or about 6,000 armed pilots who complete the burdensome Federal Flight Deck Officers (FFDO) requirements set by the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

"Few pilots are armed because TSA insists on making the FFDO program so difficult," the marshal said.

"There has not been nowhere near the amount of [federal air marshals] hired to replace the ones that have left in the last four years," he said.

Pilots have to undergo more background and psychological investigations even though the airlines and Federal Aviation Administration have already completed such tests, and have to spend their own money for the training in Artesia, N.M.

"Right now, our last line of defense is for a military jet to shoot down an airplane," Mr. Mackett said. "It's tough to explain why a military pilot has the missile, but an airline pilot doesn't have a gun to protect his own aircraft."

The meat-eating Center for Consumer Freedom "almost" feels sorry for People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals. Why the change of heart?

The consumers point out that even after PETA heavily promoted last week's Washington premiere of an animal-rights documentary -- and promised prizes to activists who attended -- the audience was somewhere between "Gigli" and "Monkeybone."

"Seating capacity in Theatre No. 4 at Washington's E-Street Theatre: 232. Total attendance: seven. And we accounted for two of them," the center notes.

Worse yet, PETA President Ingrid Newkirk was on hand for the Washington premiere.

Hortensia to Hillary

Washingtonian S. Michele Nix writes to thank us for showcasing the "nonsensical banter" about Katie Couric's CBS anchoring "debut and outfits."

"I published a book in 2000 -- Women at the Podium: Memorable Speeches in History," she notes. "It was a long research project that resulted in a collection of speeches by women of power and influence -- from Hortensia 42 B.C. to Hillary in 1998.

"I did it because I noticed that, when it came to including speeches by women in speech anthologies, most [editors] would throw in a speech by Susan B. Anthony and call it a day. What struck me in my research for the book was how often reporters wrote of what these women wore, as much if not more than what they said, particularly in the 20th century (since it was only then that newspapers started acknowledging that women were speaking in public).

"Reporters (including women) talked of Margaret Chase Smith's outfits and ladylike style (as she skewered [Joseph] McCarthy on the Senate floor), Shirley Chisholm's white gloves and coordinated outfits, of Katharine Graham's dresses and pearls during Watergate, of Maggie Thatcher's suits and purses, of course Hillary Clinton's many hairdos and pantsuit color choices.

"We don't read stories that add mention of the president's bold, red [Tommy] Hilfiger tie or NBC's Brian Williams' broad navy suit and freshly shined oxblood shoes," she points out.

"Whether Katie Couric succeeds or fails, I doubt it will be on her fashion choices -- but on her merits as an anchor. Now, I'm off [and] I may walk out the door in my post-Labor Day white sandals."

Time to sweat

One of the most frightening predictions surrounding a future terrorist attack in the District comes from Dan Coleman, who until his recent retirement was the FBI's top expert on Osama bin Laden.

In an interview with Jeff Stein of Congressional Quarterly, Mr. Coleman foresees the next hijacked plane swooping down over the green grass of the National Mall, roaring over tourists' heads, and straight into the dome of the U.S. Capitol.

And by what means?

Airliners are virtually unguarded while refueled on airport tarmacs, Mr. Coleman cites among other security weaknesses not yet fully addressed. In addition, transportation workers still aren't sufficiently screened, and while grandmothers in wheelchairs can't slide by X-ray scanners, terrorists can.

Indeed, a trans-Atlantic pilot for American Airlines, who flew home from London two days after the most recent foiled terrorist attacks, tells Inside the Beltway that terrorists could easily smuggle the dreaded "liquids and gels" aboard airplanes by simply duct-taping the potentially explosive agents to their legs.

In the meantime, ordinary Americans continue to have their antiperspirant confiscated from carry-on luggage -- at a time when they need it most.

Lawmakers Back Ban On Liquids On Airliners (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers from both political parties say the month-old ban on carrying most liquids on airliners should remain until airport screeners and machines can detect explosives such as those that alleged terrorists planned to use to destroy U.S.-bound planes in August.

Congressional representatives such as Pete King, R-N.Y., chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, and Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., both have expressed support for the ban. King's spokesman, Chad Scarborough, said it “might be necessary to make the ban permanent until we can develop the technology to catch this stuff,” referring to potentially explosive liquids that right now can't be detected easily at checkpoints.

“Right now, I don't know what alternatives we have,” said Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., chairman of the House aviation subcommittee. “Until we can put other [security] measures in place, I think we're sort of stuck with it.”

The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) said last month that it was studying whether it can safely allow passengers to carry small amounts of liquids on airliners.

TSA chief Kip Hawley said encouraging passengers to use carry-on bags could ease the strain on luggage-bomb detectors caused since the Aug. 10 liquid ban increased the amount of checked luggage.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recently said that leaving the ban in place might keep security lines moving faster than a potentially confusing policy allowing small quantities of liquids.

"It might be that we'll conclude that any changes will only make it more inefficient and create more confusion, and we're better off sticking with what we have," said Chertoff, whose department oversees the TSA.

The National Business Travel Association has told Homeland Security officials about the frustrations of business travelers who must check luggage even for short trips.

Even so, association spokesman Caleb Tiller said, "We're not saying, take these bans out, because the most important thing is to manage security."

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., chairman of the Senate terrorism subcommittee, said most travelers "are understanding about why it's necessary to endure the inconvenience."

Airline passengers may carry small amounts of liquid prescription medicines, baby formula and eye-care products. The rules took effect Aug. 10 after British authorities said they foiled a plot to smuggle bomb components, including liquids, onto U.S.-bound airliners.

For airports, the ban "has not been a problem," said Charles Chambers, head of security for the Airports Council International. Sales at airport shops are up in the past month because travelers are arriving at airports earlier and have more time to spend in concourses, Chambers said.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate homeland security committee, said she hopes the TSA "will be able to ease the restrictions without compromising security." The long-term solution, Collins said, is developing better technologies.

Funding, Amendments Pose Ports Bill Obstacles (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

For all the talk of Senate committees skipping arm-in-arm down the path to stronger port security, the floor of the venerable chamber this week instead will feature its share of territorial disputes.

Though the chairmen of the three committees of jurisdiction — Commerce, Science and Transportation; Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs; and Finance — lauded the alleged compromise bill in floor speeches last week, a number of key agreements between the three, most notably how to fund the $835 million bill, have yet to be worked out. And the bill is in danger of being larded with myriad expensive transportation-related amendments.

Despite the hurdles, aides to both parties say they should be able to come up with some finished product by Thursday, before, perhaps, turning to an Amtrak authorization bill.

Of course, the lead sponsors of the bill — Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairwoman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) — warned last week that the bill they have worked on for more than a year would have no teeth if it lacked a solid funding mechanism. However, the measure they introduced on the floor Thursday does not have specific financial backing.

In fact, as of press time, they were still working with Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) to identify a funding source, but Murray's spokeswoman said the Congresswoman was prepared to offer an amendment today to pay for the bill using customs fees — a method to which Grassley previously has objected.

Meanwhile, several members of the Commerce panel appear to be trying to recreate a more comprehensive transportation security bill that the committee approved last year. Already, Collins and Senate Commerce Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) reportedly have agreed to entreaties by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to add the rail security portion of the Commerce bill.

But Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) also plans to offer an amendment to add the Commerce bill's titles on buses, trucks and hazardous materials, according to a Democratic aide. The pipeline-safety portion of the bill also may be proposed as an amendment, the aide added.

"This could quickly become a homeland security bill, rather than just port security," the aide said. "This debate could go in a lot of directions this week."

Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Chairman Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) may offer his bill to improve mass-transit security, Democratic and Republican sources said.

No word on how any of those amendments, which would only add to the price tag, would be paid for, either.

Even prenegotiated provisions in the port security measure could come under fire from Commerce members eager to restore their prerogatives.

For instance, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) may offer a proposal to tap the Coast Guard as the agency in charge of handling the aftermath of a terrorist attack at a port, a GOP aide said. The Collins-Murray bill gives the secretary of Homeland Security the authority to name the appropriate agency, but the original Commerce bill named the Coast Guard, the aide said.

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats are planning a host of other transportation security-related amendments.

Although Collins said the bill sets up a pilot program at a handful of ports to assess the feasibility of screening 100 percent of the cargo that enters the United States, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) — who is facing a tough GOP challenger in a state where port security is vital — is expected to offer an amendment to require 100 percent screening at all ports.

Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), who also is up for re-election this year, could propose an amendment addressing explosives detection, while Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) may seek to add provisions requiring first-responder radios to be interoperable. (You guessed it, Stabenow also is running for another term.)

Meanwhile, the House finds itself in the familiar position of waiting for the Senate to act on legislation it passed months ago. The House passed its port security measure on May 4. But for either party to campaign on the issue, the two chambers will have to resolve whatever differences they have by the end of this month — a challenging, though not impossible, task.

Port Security Bill Set To Clear Senate (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — When a state-owned Arab company attempted to take over the management of some U.S. port facilities this year, it caused a bipartisan uproar in Congress and set off a wave of initiatives aimed at tightening security on the waterfront.

Most of the proposals have foundered. But now, with both parties jostling for the upper hand on national security ahead of November's midterm elections, a port security bill is headed for approval.

The measure — expected to pass the Senate this week — would, among other things, impose deadlines on background checks for port workers, expand a program to screen for "dirty bombs" and authorize $400 million to help ports bolster anti-terrorism defenses. A good chunk of that money is likely to go to the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex.

Republicans have made port security legislation a priority since February, after Democrats seized on the Bush administration's approval of the takeover of some U.S. facilities by Dubai Ports World to highlight what they contended was the continued vulnerability of ports to attack. In response to the political furor, the Dubai company backed off from taking over the facilities.

The House and Senate also have approved legislation requiring greater scrutiny of foreign investments in the United States. But there may not be enough time left in the current congressional session for the two chambers to reconcile the substantial differences in those bills.

A stack of other proposals that grew directly out of the Dubai controversy also appears doomed for the year, including prohibitions on foreign companies controlling facilities determined to be crucial to national security.

Asked what happened, Chris Koch, president of the World Shipping Council, said: "Some people took some deep breaths and became rational."

The Dubai controversy put the spotlight on the vulnerability of ports, which some say was shortchanged by the focus on protecting airliners from hijackers after Sept. 11.

Stephen E. Flynn, a retired Coast Guard commander and port security expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, called port security legislation a "good step forward," adding: "We still have a ways to go."

But Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) expressed skepticism that the Republican-controlled Congress would back up the legislation's pledges of tougher security measures with appropriations of money.

Noting that the port security bill that the Senate is considering this week would authorize programs that still would need to be funded, Byrd spokesman Tom Gavin said, "His concern is that this Congress has said, 'Oh, look at what great things we have done' — and then failed to put the money in place" to fund programs.

That measure is part of a package of security-related legislation that GOP leaders, concerned about losing control of the House in November, want to pass before the midterm elections. The port security bill is expected to be amended to include a $1.2-billion rail security measure, as well as language to expand the emergency warning system so that alerts of disasters or terrorist attacks could be sent out on cellphones and BlackBerries.

Democrats are expected to make a renewed push to require screening of every cargo container destined for U.S. ports. But they face long odds because of strong opposition from business groups.

One business group warned in a letter to senators that a "mandate of 100 percent scanning has the potential to do significant damage to the flow of goods and to the U.S. economy."

The bill would set up an experimental program at three not-yet-selected foreign ports to screen every cargo container headed to the United States. Currently, only a fraction are physically inspected, although customs officials check cargo lists and target suspicious containers for a closer look.

"What we have tried to do with this bill is very carefully balance the need for effective, improved security with the need to ensure that we are not crippling our international trading system," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee and a co-author of the port security bill.

Aaron Ellis of the American Assn. of Port Authorities, an industry lobbying and advocacy group, said the bill included a number of components that were "pretty darn good."

"This will be the first time that there has been legislation that actually puts a number of how much should be appropriated for the port security grant program," he said.

The bill would authorize $400 million in port security grants. By the end of this month, the federal Department of Homeland Security will have provided $876 million in port security grants since the Sept. 11 attacks — about 20% of the $4.35 billion in federal aid that ports have sought.

A similar bill has already passed the House. House-Senate negotiators are expected to agree on a final version to send to the president's desk before lawmakers recess this month or early next month.

Safe Ports (WP)

THE BRIEF SESSION of Congress that just convened is distinguished in part for what is absent from its agenda -- immigration and lobbying reform, for example. A notable exception, though, is a serious bill that has just emerged from the Senate Commerce, Finance and Homeland Security committees: the Port Security Improvement Act of 2006.

The bill contains several common-sense proposals. It requires the Department of Homeland Security to develop a strategy to rapidly resume trade after an incident at one of the nation's ports, in order to limit economic slowdown. It codifies a number of good programs in law, including the Container Security Initiative, which, if it operates properly, will target suspect cargo for inspection in foreign ports before it gets close to the United States. And it establishes deadlines for Homeland Security to complete critical infrastructure projects -- including installing radiation portal monitors in the nation's 22 biggest ports by the end of next year.

Two things distinguish this moderate legislation from the irresponsible rhetoric on port security that has marred debates on the subject for years. First, it does not call for 100 percent of containers arriving at U.S. ports to be individually inspected for all dangerous materials. The "inspect all containers" mantra is a red herring that exploits Americans' fears about what might slip through in order to score political points, ignoring the fact that there are much more cost- and time-effective ways of keeping dangerous cargo out of the country.

To her credit, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), one of the bill's key sponsors, recognizes that the time and money it would take to inspect all 11 million containers that come into the country every year would be prohibitive with the technology available today, and she has committed to vote against it if such a provision is added. Instead, the bill calls for a pilot program in which the feasibility of individually inspecting all containers leaving three overseas ports will be gauged, which should test promising next-generation technologies without significantly slowing the pace of trade to the United States.

Second, while providing five years of steady funding for port security projects, the bill does not dedicate money for port security in perpetuity. The initial costs of making essential improvements such as buying radiation detectors, putting up fencing around ports and coordinating inspection procedures with ports overseas will require a fair amount of steady start-up cash. But a half-decade of grants for improving port security ought to be enough. After that, port security should have to compete for federal money with other worthy projects.

With those sensible checks in place, the Senate should pass this bill.

Jack Bauer Insurance (WSJ)

What would Jack Bauer do? If he worked at the CIA in real life today, the anti-terror hero of Fox's "24" would apparently be buying insurance in case the ACLU or John Kerry decided to sue or subpoena him for protecting America with too much vigor.

The Washington Post reported yesterday that more CIA counterterrorism officers are signing up for private insurance that would pay for civil judgments and legal costs if they are sued or charged with a crime. These are the agents who interrogated Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, Abu Zubaydah and other jihadis, using what President Bush last week called methods that were legal but "tough." Those methods succeeded in breaking these men into divulging information that led to the arrest of other al Qaeda bigs, and to the foiling of plots that could have killed thousands.

"'There are a lot of people who think that subpoenas could be coming' from Congress after the November elections or from federal prosecutors if Democrats capture the White House in 2008," wrote the Post, quoting a retired intelligence officer close to the CIA's Directorate of Operations, which conducted the interrogations. This is not paranoia. We reported yesterday how Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat, is blocking Bush nominees simply for having been mentioned in passing in emails about Guantanamo. Some of us also remember the infamous Frank Church hearings of the 1970s that pilloried the CIA and weakened it for decades.

Though the government pays the premiums for this kind of insurance, it is a sorry spectacle that these agents must now fear partisan retribution for having done precisely what the country asked them to do. The story is one more reason Congress should follow through on Mr. Bush's request to put its stamp of approval on such interrogations, including ex post facto immunity for these CIA officers.

Intelligence is the front line of this anti-jihadi conflict, and the danger from the current political second-guessing is that CIA officers will go back to the FBI's law enforcement mentality of reading terrorists their Miranda rights that failed the country leading up to 9/11. The country needs Jack Bauer insurance, too.

The Aftermath Of Hurricane Katrina (HILL)

By Rep. Neil Abercrombie

The Hill, September 12, 2006

I have witnessed destruction before, some caused by humankind and some by nature. But nothing I've seen prepared me for the scale of devastation in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast of Mississippi. It looked like a neutron bomb had detonated, leaving the shells of dwellings standing in forlorn rows, virtually devoid of human presence.

One year after Hurricane Katrina, the area remains a terrible, twisted portrait of lives and families and whole communities washed away; home by home, block by block, neighborhood by neighborhood. One year after President Bush viewed the destruction from 40-thousand feet as he flew back to Washington from his vacation; one year after he vowed—"We will do what it takes," promises of timely federal assistance to help the people of the region rebuild are as empty as the endless square miles where homes and businesses once stood.

Twenty-five of my congressional colleagues and I spent two full days on a battlefield in the war between the Bush administration and America's middle-class. Make no mistake: post-Katrina is class warfare with a vengeance. Black or white doesn't matter. The Bush administration is an equal opportunity purveyor of indifference.

Infrastructure and Public Services

The City of New Orleans is still struggling to provide basic municipal services. Nearly 60 percent of homes and businesses still have no electricity, heating gas or a dependable supply of potable water. In fact, the lower 9th Ward has been without safe drinking water since Katrina struck. New Orleans neighborhoods had to wait 11 months for mail delivery. Major traffic arteries critical to Louisiana and the nation still suffer from major delays in reconstruction.

Housing

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita created the greatest housing crisis in our nation since the Great Depression — more than 650,000 people displaced. Only 35 percent of New Orleans' housing units are occupied, according to a recent city estimate, and thousands of homes will have to be razed. The Mississippi Gulf Coast has vast landscapes that were once neighborhoods — but the houses have vanished. Driveway after driveway leads to an empty lot. Homeowners have become slab owners.

Rather than providing housing vouchers that quickly and effectively provided emergency shelter in previous disasters, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) threw together a $10 billion housing program that wasted vast sums of money and left thousands of victims without a roof over their heads.

Healthcare

There are shortages of doctors, nurses, and hospital beds, and medical costs are rising to staggering levels. Depression and mental health challenges, as well as physical injuries, are rampant. Yet, in New Orleans Parish, only three of 10 hospitals have re-opened, leaving the most vulnerable— the uninsured—with even fewer options for care.

Small Business And Government Contracting

One year after Hurricane Katrina, 80 percent of the small business owners with approved Katrina loans from the U.S. Small Business Administration are still waiting for the funds. Congressional hearings into FEMA's contracting procedures have found massive fraud, mismanagement and gross incompetence.

Mississippi And Gulf Coast

These same kinds of conditions pervade the Mississippi Gulf Coast, in smaller numbers perhaps, but just as starkly. The refusal of insurance companies to pay claims is now a principal cause of homelessness in the area, and in many cases, insurance company actions are scandalous — even fraudulent.

Conclusion

The federal government's treatment of lower income areas in one of the country's most unique and historic cities, and nearly all the Mississippi Gulf Coast region, are a national disgrace. Yet, beyond the Gulf Coast, there is no outrage.

The Army Corps of Engineers has only begun to raise sinking levees and deal with unfinished hurricane protection and flood prevention projects. But, they're only rebuilding the levees to withstand a Category 3 storm, Katrina's level. Prudent planning and common sense would dictate that they be raised to Category 5 levels.

DHS waited eight months to even begin a review of its response to Hurricane Katrina, and now three months later, it refuses to make the results public.

Congress has been a mute witness, forsaking once again its Constitutional oversight responsibilities. But, one year after the most destructive natural catastrophe to strike the U.S., the "federal response" is still not effective. It is high time the legislative branch got engaged.

FEMA must be restored to independence from the Department of Homeland Security, with a legislative mandate to rebuild now.

Hospital and community clinic construction must begin now. Non-profit health and human service agencies need immediate funding and contractual support.

Legislative action to cut through the insurance standoff over availability and cost in New Orleans, and more particularly, on the Mississippi Gulf Coast, must be taken now. DHS has failed miserably to coordinate hurricane evacuation and emergency communication capacity. A desperate lack of emergency services leaves an already vulnerable and battered city and Gulf Coast even further in harm's way. This must be remedied now.

The Pentagon has just announced a new czar for infrastructure construction in Iraq. The American people should demand that the federal government's post-Katrina priorities reflect an equal and urgent commitment to the infrastructure of the U.S.

WAR NEWS:

Grim Outlook Seen In West Iraq Without More Troops And Aid (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — The political and security situation in western Iraq is grim and will continue to deteriorate unless the region receives a major infusion of aid and a division is sent to reinforce the American troops operating there, according to the senior Marine intelligence officer in Iraq.

The assessment, prepared last month by Col. Peter Devlin at the Marine headquarters in Anbar Province, has been sent to senior military officials in Iraq and at the Pentagon.

While the American military is focused on trying to secure Baghdad and prevent the sectarian strife there from escalating into a civil war, the assessment points to the difficulties in Anbar, a vast Sunni-dominated area of western Iraq where the insurgency is particularly strong. The province includes such restive towns as Ramadi, Haditha and Hit.

Marine commanders have been mounting a campaign to secure the province in the face of a virulent insurgency. But they have had to cope with seriously short-handed Iraqi Army units and a Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad that has tended to view the area as a low priority for government spending and programs.

Elements of the assessment were reported Monday in The Washington Post. Military officials familiar with the document disclosed additional material and provided several quotations from the assessment.

One factor that has hampered the American counterinsurgency effort has been the limited number of American troops. As a general rule, a substantial number of troops are required in a counterinsurgency campaign to protect the population from attacks and intimidation by insurgent groups.

There are about 30,000 marines, soldiers, airmen and sailors in Anbar, a region that borders Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia and is roughly the size of Louisiana.

American forces can generally maneuver where they want and are fighting to regain control of Ramadi, the provincial capital, neighborhood by neighborhood. But there are areas of the province where the Americans have not established a persistent presence, the assessment says.

Without the deployment of an additional division, "there is nothing MNF-W can do to influence the motivation of the Sunni to wage an insurgency," the report states, according to a military officer familiar with it. MNF-W stands for Multinational Force-West, the formal name of the Marine command. A division numbers about 16,000 troops. The limited number of troops, however, is just one problem in countering the insurgency there, the report says. The assessment describes Anbar as a region marked by violence and criminality. Except for a few relatively bright spots, like the towns of Falluja and Qaim, the region generally lacks functional governments and a respect for the rule of law.

Anbar does not have valuable resources like oil. Nor does its Sunni population appear to represent an important constituency for the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad. Although there is economic growth in relatively secure areas, much of it can be attributed to the American-supported reconstruction effort. The level of economic activity in the province is just a fraction of what it was before 2003, the assessment says.

Feeling marginalized in the new Iraq, the Sunnis in Anbar have generally lost faith in the new Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad. The Sunnis' "greatest fears have been realized," the report says.

The Sunnis' suspicion of the government makes the task of forging a political reconciliation more difficult, and has also complicated one policy option that some critics of Bush administration's strategy have proposed as an alternative means of stabilizing Iraq: dividing the country into Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni enclaves. Such a plan would not be welcomed by Sunnis, since they would not trust the central government to share proceeds from oil sales, the assessment says.

As the situation has deteriorated, insurgent attacks have increased. The report describes Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia as an "integral part of the social fabric" of Anbar. The organization, which is predominantly made up of fighters who are native Iraqis, is flush with cash, much of it earned from black market or criminal activity.

As an intelligence assessment, the report is intended to analyze trends, not make policy recommendations. A spokesman for the Marine command declined to comment on the assessment. Many of the points in the analysis were also presented to Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, when he met with senior Marine officers at Camp Falluja in August.

Several elements of the intelligence assessment are consistent with the views of some Marine officers who were interviewed in the field in July. Discussing force levels, Lt. Col. Ronald Gridley, the executive officer with Regimental Combat Team 7, a Marine unit that is charged with securing a large swath of the province, said then that his regiment had recommended that additional troops be allocated to its section of Anbar. Even a battalion or two, he said, would help a great deal.

"What we recommend and what we get is going to be two different things," Colonel Gridley said. "In our perfect world, we could use some more infantrymen to be able to patrol the streets and partner with the Iraqi Army."

Since the intelligence assessment was prepared in August, however, no reinforcements have been sent. To the contrary, the strain on the American troops in Anbar has increased. An American Stryker unit, which was under the overall Marine command, has been sent from Rawa to Baghdad to help with the operation there. Also, military police who had been earmarked for training the Iraq police in Anbar have also been sent to Baghdad. The Marines have sought to make up the shortfall by using existing troops.

The Iraqi Army has deployed two divisions in the region with a combined authorized strength of some 19,000. But the Iraqi military is under strength. The two Iraqi divisions in Anbar together are some 5,000 troops short of that level, while hundreds more are absent without leave. As a result of these developments and the practice of giving monthly leaves, the day-to-day strength of the two divisions is 50 percent for one division and 35 percent for the other.

A separate report, titled "Stabilizing Iraq," issued Monday by the Government Accountability Office, says that, although the solution to securing the country is not entirely military, there is an important relationship between security conditions and efforts to strengthen the economy.

The G.A.O. report noted that attacks against the American-led forces and Iraqi security forces reached an "all-time high during July 2006."

"Despite coalition efforts and the efforts of the newly formed Iraqi government, insurgents continue to demonstrate the ability to recruit new fighters, supply themselves, and attack coalition and Iraqi security forces," the G.A.O report added. "The deteriorating conditions threaten the progress of U.S. and international efforts to assist Iraq in the political and economic areas."

Pentagon Weighing Report On Anbar (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The Pentagon is taking "very seriously" a classified intelligence report concluding that the U.S. military has fought to a stalemate in Iraq's western Anbar province as political conditions also worsen in the "epicenter" of the country's Sunni insurgency, a senior defense official said yesterday.

In congressional testimony on security in Iraq, Pentagon officials also said the rise of "ethno-sectarian violence" has laid the conditions for civil war, aborting plans by U.S. commanders to begin withdrawing U.S. troops. Gaps in the capabilities of Iraqi security forces leave open the prospect that U.S. forces may have to stay in the country for as many as five or more years, they said.

Calling Anbar "a very hot zone on the battlefield," Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Eric S. Edelman said the secret report on the volatile, strategic province was gaining high-level attention at the Pentagon.

"It is an important report. We've taken it very seriously," Edelman told a panel of the House Government Reform Committee. "This is an operational assessment by one very good intel officer," he said, adding that "a lot of us are looking at it very closely" and are seeking a further assessment on Anbar from top U.S. commanders in Iraq.

The report, first outlined publicly in The Washington Post yesterday, said a shortage of U.S. and Iraqi troops in Anbar and the collapse of local governments have left a vacuum that has been exploited by the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq. It painted a bleak picture of security prospects in Anbar, a large province bordering Syria and Jordan that includes the troubled cities of Fallujah and Ramadi.

"Anbar has been the epicenter of the insurgency," Edelman said, adding that "a purely military solution to any insurgency is not possible." He said the report was a "snapshot" that does not represent the entire country.

Edelman prompted an angry retort from Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio) by saying that it would not be "productive" to discuss the classified report on the conflict in Anbar in a public hearing.

"But wouldn't it be of interest to the parents of American soldiers who are being sent to fight, that they would know that a report existed that said that a province was beyond repair and the thing couldn't be won militarily? Wouldn't that be of interest, Mr. Edelman?" Kucinich replied. Edelman explained that he was concerned because "the enemy, you know, is clearly following the discussion."

On overall security in Iraq, lawmakers pressed Edelman and Rear Adm. William D. Sullivan, vice director for strategic plans and policy on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, on why the growth of Iraq's military and police forces has not yet permitted a reduction in the number of U.S. troops, which increased to 140,000 over the summer.

Iraq expects by December to have completed the training and equipping of 325,000 security forces, including 137,000 military personnel and 188,000 police and other Ministry of Interior forces, Sullivan said. And the U.S. military has turned over 53 of its 100 bases in Iraq to the Iraqi government. But he said the emergence of sectarian violence in addition to the Sunni insurgency has led U.S. commanders to decide "that they cannot afford to draw down our own troop levels while the Iraqis are still building up theirs."

Sullivan conceded that in the longer term, because Iraq's military has been trained and outfitted primarily to fight an insurgency, rather than to defend Iraq against foreign attack, U.S. forces could be required as backup for many years.

"Am I wrong in making the assumption that we're going to have American troops there or nearby for a long time . . . in order to defend this nation?" asked Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), chairman of the Government Reform subcommittee on national security.

"It is very much a possibility," Sullivan replied. He said the intent in developing Iraq's military was to create a force "that would have a modicum of its own self-defense capability without being an army that could threaten its neighbors." Iraqi leaders are still trying to "figure out what kind of military ultimately they need," he said.

Edelman said he did not know whether U.S. troops would be withdrawn from Iraq in five or fewer years. Asked whether they would be home in 10 years, he replied: "I certainly hope so."

Sadr Holds Out Against Plan To Divide Iraq (WP)

By Amit R. Paley And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 11 -- Moqtada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite Muslim cleric, remains adamantly opposed to a controversial plan to partition Iraq into a federation of three largely independent regions, a top Sadr aide said Monday.

"Iraq must not be divided," said Riyadh Nouri, the aide to Sadr, who has opposed the U.S. presence in Iraq.

Sadr's objection to the plan remains steadfast despite a meeting Sunday night in Najaf between Sadr and his intermittent rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the prominent Shiite political party that is leading the push for federalism.

The dispute between two of the most influential Shiite politicians in Iraq highlights the bitter divisions between various parties in the country's fragile ruling coalition. The rift also underscores the divisive nature of the federalism issue, which has pitted Sunni Arabs against some Shiites and Kurds.

The main Sunni bloc in parliament, the Iraqi Accordance Front, boycotted Sunday's legislative session to protest a measure that would create a mechanism for carving Iraq into three autonomous regions. The Sunnis fear the creation of a predominantly Shiite region in the south of Iraq that would resemble the largely independent zone controlled by the Kurds in the north. The Sunnis would be left with swaths of the country devoid of the oil reserves in the other regions.

Sadr's bloc broke with Hakim's party to support the Sunni boycott on Sunday. That move prompted Hakim to meet later in the day with Sadr and then with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, although he declined to describe their conversations.

"We stand to benefit from federalism because the Sadr movement enjoys wide support of the majority of the people in the center and the south," said Nouri, the Sadr aide. "But we will not accept that, because national interest is above any other interest."

The speaker of parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, warned political leaders "not to fish in troubled waters" on the subject of federalism, a principle established in the constitution approved by voters last fall.

"Federated Iraq is a principle that is agreed to in Iraq," he said. "This is not alterable."

The tumult came on another day of bloodshed in Iraq. A man wearing an explosive belt boarded a minibus carrying Iraqi army recruits Monday morning and detonated it when the vehicle reached a recruiting center in western Baghdad, according to Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Abbas of the Interior Ministry. Abbas said 15 people were killed and 18 wounded.

The genocide trial of Saddam Hussein resumed on Monday with the former Iraqi leader calling the tribunal an attempt to pit Arabs against Kurds. Prosecutors accuse Hussein of trying to annihilate the country's Kurdish minority during the Anfal campaign in the 1980s, in which as many as 180,000 people were killed.

"The intention is to create a split in the Iraqi population," a visibly angered Hussein said of the case. "This is a preparation to divide Iraq."

When the judge assured him the country would not be carved up, Hussein responded: "Of course not. Iraq is not 50 years old or 200 years old. It's 9,000 years old, and Iraqis won't be divided."

Katrin Michael, a former peshmerga militia fighter in Kurdistan who now lives in Virginia, testified at the trial about the horror in her village when Iraqi planes dropped chemical weapons.

"I saw hundreds of people with tearing eyes vomiting," she said. "They had pain in their stomach. They were screaming from the pain. People were collapsing because they lost their sight."

She lost her sight for three days. When she opened her eyes, Michael testified, she saw a man named Abu Rizgar who had gone totally blind. He had heavy blisters on his back, and he couldn't speak properly. Later that day, he died.

"His voice is still in my ears," Michael said.

Sarhan reported from Najaf. Special correspondents Naseer Nouri, K.I. Ibrahim and Salih Dehima in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Top Aide To Sadr Outlines Vision Of A U.S.-Free Iraq (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Sudarsan Raghavan, Washington Post Foreign Service

NAJAF, Iraq -- In a shabby but spotless living room in the holy city of Najaf, a top deputy of Shiite Muslim leader Moqtada al-Sadr quietly sketched out his vision of the Iraq to come, after the Americans withdraw.

First, "there will be a civil war," said the aide, Mustafa Yaqoubi, as his three young children wandered in and out of the room. The rising violence and rivalries under the American occupation make a shaking-out all but inevitable once foreign forces go, Yaqoubi said. "I expect it."

"No matter the number of people who would lose their lives, it is better than now," he added. "It would be better than the Americans staying."

When the tumult ends, the Sadr aide said, Iraq's Shiite majority will finally be able to claim its due, long resisted by the Americans -- freedom to usher in a Shiite religious government that Yaqoubi said would be moderate and perhaps comparable in some ways to Iran's. The bespectacled, bearded cleric's mild tone buffered his talk of the blood that would have to be spilled to achieve this goal. No matter when the Americans withdraw, "the first year of transition, it will be worse," Yaqoubi warned. "After that, it will gradually improve."

Yaqoubi speaks as one of two or three longtime intimates of Sadr, the young heir of a revered Shiite clerical family. Sadr's rough-edged, strongly anti-American street movement of poor, largely uneducated Shiites has burgeoned into one of the strongest political and armed forces in Iraq.

When Sadr's father, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, was shot to death with two of his sons in 1999, in an assassination blamed on Saddam Hussein, Yaqoubi helped Moqtada al-Sadr, then only 25, keep the family's mosque-based network alive, despite unrelenting pressure from Hussein's intelligence services.

Yaqoubi's arrest by U.S.-led coalition troops, on charges in the brutal stabbing death of a Sadr rival, ignited full-scale street battles between Sadr followers and U.S. forces in April 2004.

Freed in August 2005 after 16 months in prison, Yaqoubi helped preside over a remarkable political transformation that culminated with elections last year that put Sadr in charge of the largest individual bloc in parliament.

While Sadr and his aides, including Yaqoubi, stayed in Iraq throughout the darkest years of Hussein's rule, others among Iraq's current leaders went into exile in London, Tehran or Detroit, returning here only after Hussein's overthrow. Leaders of the other main Shiite religious parties were quick to make accommodation with the U.S.-led occupying forces. Overnight, many of them adopted a life of secondhand splendor in the former palaces and villas of Hussein's regime.

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, for example, who leads the Shiite religious party that most nearly matches Sadr's movement in strength, moved into the marbled villa of former Hussein foreign minister Tariq Aziz, who is now in U.S. military custody. Sadr and his aides, in contrast, make their homes in the Shiite neighborhoods of the capital and the Shiite holy cities of the south. Sadr lives in a gleaming, whitewashed concrete mansion behind high walls in Najaf. His top aides there have more modest houses, less freshly painted.

Yaqoubi is considered an intellectual, in the vanguard of Sadr's Shiite movement. In an interview over the course of an afternoon, he outlined his views of an organization that is scarcely known to Americans. His children occasionally came in to interrupt, putting a hand on his knee to whisper a message from the women out of sight in the back of the house.

Despite their ascendancy now, Yaqoubi said, Iraq's Shiites owe no gratitude to the Americans. "The Americans are not saving us from Saddam for the sake of the Iraqi people," he said. "They gave Saddam clearance in the 1990s to strike at the Shia people. It was in their own interest to get rid of Saddam."

According to Yaqoubi, the Americans brought the armed resistance on themselves by staying after the invasion and by ignoring Iraqi protests. For example, he said, tens of thousands rallied this summer in Baghdad's Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City to protest the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, but the Americans ignored them. "It was the largest rally in the world. But with them, it's useless," he said, referring to U.S. officials. "No one ever reacts, no one responds to these protests."

Ordinary Americans, on some level, must understand the resistance to the foreign forces, he said.

"We believe the American people are not coming from Mars. They see on their televisions how it is here," Yaqoubi said. "They have the same mentality we have. We believe that if the Americans were occupied by another country they would do the same as we are, or even more."

Yaqoubi said the U.S. failure to meet even the simplest security needs of Iraq was to blame for much of the current instability. As a result, he said, "when the Americans pull out, there will be a civil war. They are using that now, as an excuse for staying."

The Sadr deputy spoke confidently and simply of which faction would emerge the winner. "I don't want to use this expression, but you have an expression," he said. " 'Survival of the fittest; the strongest survive'?"

He added, "If there may be other forces to use their strengths, I don't think they have the capability to match us."

Sadr's armed followers are often accused of enforcing strict Islamic codes; commanders of his militia, known as the Mahdi Army, have acknowledged beating up alcohol vendors.

How would a Sadr government look, should the cleric come to full power? "Our main goal, by our nature, we are Islamists," Yaqoubi said. "Our only desire is to obey God. We want the heavenly laws to be applied, in a normal way."

Yaqoubi described a gentler version of Shiite Islamic government. He insisted that Iraq would not model itself on Shiite Persian Iran next door. But he spoke approvingly of Iran in hinting how Iraq might look, saying, "There is freedom of journalism, women can drive, can go without veils."

Many Western analysts say Iran's religious government and its people have learned to coexist. Newspaper editors now tend to self-censor, and women, while often allowing a generous display of hair to show, still wear head coverings.

Asked if Iraq might adopt the same de facto tolerance as Iran, Yaqoubi replied, "Possibly."

Yaqoubi suggested that statistics support his vision for Iraq. Shiites make up at least 60 percent of Iraq's people, he said, and millions of them follow century-old traditions of fealty to the instructions of their religious leaders.

"The Americans wanted elections and wanted democracy," the Sadr aide said. "This is what they wanted."

Iraqi Militias Seen As Spinning Out Of Control (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — As U.S. and Iraqi officials seek a way to disarm Shiite militias involved in the sectarian violence driving Iraq toward civil war, the paramilitary forces are splintering into more extreme groups that militia leaders say they are powerless to control.

U.S. officials had hoped that an ongoing military sweep in the capital would curtail the Sunni Arab insurgency and convince the Shiite Muslim militias — armed partisan brigades that guard neighborhoods, mosques and political offices — that they could leave security to the Iraqi government.

"I think when the people begin to feel more confidence in their security forces, they'll feel less need to rely on the militias," Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said during a recent news conference.

But a series of devastating paramilitary strikes against Shiite neighborhoods has eroded early gains attributed to the security sweep and severely undermined U.S. arguments for disarming militias.

Recent violent clashes pitting Shiite paramilitary fighters against Iraqi and U.S. troops, and against rival Shiite forces, also have cast doubts on militia leaders' ability to rein in their fighters even if they choose to do so.

U.S. forces have been drawn into confrontations with militiamen in recent weeks. Late last month, U.S. warplanes dropped a 500-pound bomb on militia members battling Iraqi troops in the southern city of Diwaniya, further complicating efforts to negotiate with the groups.

Militia representatives say fighters often act without consulting their commanders, and in some cases flout orders to stand down. Such disobedience was evident shortly after the Feb. 22 bombing of a revered Shiite mosque in Samarra allegedly orchestrated by Al Qaeda in Iraq. Despite public calls for calm by the national leaders of the two Shiite militias, reprisal attacks in the following weeks left dozens of Sunni mosques smoldering and hundreds of Sunni Arabs dead.

"Let us be honest and transparent: Some of these fighters are acting without orders and rebelling. We are not responsible for their acts," said Sheik Razzaq Naddawi, a representative for anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, founder of the Al Mahdi militia.

"The real Sadr followers are loyal; they listen to their leaders," said Amir Husseini, another prominent Sadr follower. "But this is a fast-growing movement, and some who have joined the Sadr movement recently are not controlled."

Though U.S. officials say that Sadr representatives have occasionally exaggerated the degree of their fighters' independence to provide political cover for the organization, most senior military officials interviewed agreed that Sadr's control over his fighters had waned over the last year.

The cleric "has a measure of control, but when you get down to the bottom of that stack, I don't think he has ultimate control of every entity that operates under his name," a military official in Baghdad said.

An Al Mahdi commander, who requested anonymity because he was not allowed to speak to the media, said that in Najaf, a Sadr stronghold, the cleric had attempted to take a stronger hand by dismissing or demoting several militia brigade leaders in recent weeks.

"Even when Sadr fires the brigade commanders, their soldiers follow them and not Sadr," the commander said. "Now Sadr fires commanders every month, so their fighters will not become too loyal to them. This is the same thing that Saddam [Hussein] did with his army."

U.S. commanders say they are more concerned about Sadr's Al Mahdi army than the Badr Brigade, another leading Shiite militia.

Badr Brigade commanders acknowledge that renegade squads have occasionally taken up arms in violation of orders. But U.S. officials believe that the militia, whose members include veterans of Hussein's armed forces and a decades-long resistance movement against the former regime, has retained a strong command-and-control structure.

U.S. officials are concerned, however, about Badr's strong presence in Iraq's police forces, where militiamen have been accused of operating anti-Sunni death squads.

Sadr's militia rose from Iraq's impoverished grass roots after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion and includes many fighters who have never served in the military or received any formal education. And unlike Badr members, the cleric's followers have engaged in frequent attacks on U.S. and British troops and strongly oppose the U.S. military presence in Iraq.

Confronting either of the militias is a tricky proposition for the U.S. military because the groups are part of the Shiite-dominated government that the Bush administration helped install. Both militias are affiliated with parties in the leading Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance.

The Badr militia is the military wing of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which holds 30 seats in parliament and several Cabinet positions.

Sadr's political movement has an equal number of seats and controls the Health and Transportation ministries. Any broad assault on the militias would undermine the already-shaky political support for the U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

The situation has led Maliki to insist on advance notice from U.S. commanders before American forces venture into militia-controlled areas and to argue for a more negotiated approach to disarming paramilitary groups.

"Our fear is that the Americans will treat Al Mahdi army and other militias the same way that they treat the Saddamists and the terrorists," Maliki spokesman Ridha Taqi said. "We don't want to solve this problem with military force."

U.S. forces have refrained from major strikes on Shiite strongholds such as the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City, a base for militia-affiliated death squads and kidnapping gangs, and have instead used smaller special forces units to target specific paramilitary cells.

U.S. military officials have been circumspect in their descriptions of militiamen, using vague euphemisms such as "illegal armed groups" and "guys with guns" to avoid identifying the politically backed paramilitary forces by name.

In recent public statements, military officials have also taken pains to redefine terms such as militias and death squads, which usually refer to Shiite groups, to include Sunni insurgent groups. And although American commanders said their forces had rounded up dozens of death squads during the Baghdad sweep, they have avoided descriptions of their sectarian or militia affiliations.

Despite daily discoveries of suspected victims of Shiite-affiliated death squads throughout Baghdad, U.S. commanders say they have found no links between captured death squad members and the Iraqi government.

"I'm happy to report to you that we have been capturing these bad guys tied directly to extrajudicial killings, and to my knowledge so far none of them have been tied to the Ministry of Interior," said Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, the commander of the U.S. police training mission in Iraq.

Privately, U.S. commanders say they are tempering their public statements in an attempt to deal with Shiite militias politically and are urging Iraqi legislators to draft laws that will force paramilitary fighters to disarm.

A proposal introduced by Abdelaziz Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, calls for the formation of "popular committees" to handle security in Iraq's neighborhoods.

Hadi Amri, a commander of the Badr militia, said the committees would be assigned to their residential areas to respond to emergencies, provide security and gather intelligence on local threats.

Local volunteers, Amri said, "would be in each street and each house."

DOJ_NMG_0061571

Proponents of the plan say that such localized security forces have worked in the Kurdish region in northern Iraq, the Shiite south and in Baghdad neighborhoods controlled by Al Mahdi fighters, where militia members force residents to register their names and submit to close monitoring. Casey said he would support popular committees as long as they were unarmed.

But there is wide disagreement about whether such forces would simply add another uncontrollable element to the nation's chaotic patchwork of gangsters, revenge squads and insurgents.

A Baghdad University professor, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of retribution by the militias, said Hakim's proposal amounted to semantics.

"It is an attempt to find another name for militias," the professor said. "I do not think the people want popular committees or militias — they want an independent government which respects the law and applies it in a strong and just way."

Iraqi Elections Believed To Have Worsened Divisions, Report Says (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Iraq's political process has sharpened the country's sectarian divisions, polarized relations between its ethnic and religious groups, and weakened its sense of national identity, the Government Accountability Office said Monday.

In spite of a sharp increase in Sunni-Shiite violence, however, attacks on U.S.-led coalition forces are still the primary source of bloodshed in Iraq, the report found. It was the latest in a series of recent grim assessments of conditions in Iraq.

But the report was unusual in its sweep, relying on a series of other government studies, some of them previously unpublicized, to touch on issues from violence and politics to electricity production. Published on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the GAO report was downbeat in its conclusions - underscoring how Iraq's deteriorating security situation threatens the Bush administration's goal of a stable and democratic regime in Baghdad.

"Despite coalition efforts and the efforts of the newly formed Iraqi government, insurgents continue to demonstrate the ability to recruit new fighters, supply themselves, and attack coalition security forces," the report says. "The deteriorating conditions threaten continued progress in U.S. and other international efforts to assist Iraq in the political and economic areas."

The report relied on a number of findings made earlier this year by the United Nations, the U.S. State and Defense departments, U.S. intelligence agencies and other sources to reach its conclusions. Unlike the majority of those agencies, the GAO, which reports to Congress, has no responsibility for forming or executing policy in Iraq.

The GAO said Congress must ask several questions as it considers what to do next. Among them:

-What political, economic and security conditions must be achieved before the United States can draw down and withdraw military forces from Iraq?

-Why have security conditions continued to worsen even as Iraq has met political milestones, increased the number of trained and equipped forces, and increasingly assumed the lead for security?

-If existing U.S. political, economic, and security measures are not reducing violence in Iraq, what additional measures, if any, will the administration propose for stemming the violence?

The report, citing the Pentagon, said that enemy attacks against coalition and Iraqi forces increased by 23 percent from 2004 to 2005 and that the number of attacks from January to July 2006 were 57 percent higher than during the same period in 2005.

A graph showed that the number of attacks rose from around 100 in May 2003 to roughly 4,500 in July 2006. More than half of those were against coalition troops; the rest appear to have been split almost evenly between attacks on Iraqi security forces and attacks on civilians.

The report said that electricity production remains inadequate, with Baghdad residents receiving less than six hours of power a day, on average. Residents outside Baghdad received electricity less than 11 hours a day, on average.

Though the Bush administration has hailed each political milestone in Iraq as another step on the march to freedom, the report cited a Defense Intelligence Agency finding that "the December 2005 elections appeared to heighten sectarian tensions and polarize sectarian divides."

That finding was echoed, the GAO said, in a March 2006 report from the government-funded U.S. Institute for Peace. That report said that the political process had sharpened ethnic and sectarian identities "while nationalism and a sense of Iraqi identity have weakened."

Further, a report by the office of Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte concluded in February 2006 that Iraqi security forces "are experiencing difficulty in managing ethnic and sectarian divisions," the GAO said. The intelligence director's report said many Iraqi troops remain loyal to sectarian and political interests, the GAO said.

Reinforce Baghdad (WP)

By William Kristol And Rich Lowry

We are at a crucial moment in Iraq. Supporters of the war, like us, have in the past differed over tactics. But at this urgent pass, there can be no doubt that we need to stop the downward slide in Iraq by securing Baghdad.

There is no mystery as to what can make the crucial difference in the battle of Baghdad: American troops. A few thousand U.S. troops have already been transferred to Baghdad from elsewhere in Iraq. Where more U.S. troops have been deployed, the situation has gotten better. Those neighborhoods intensively patrolled by Americans are safer and more secure. But it is by no means clear that overall troop numbers in Baghdad are enough to do the job. And it is clear that stripping troops from other fronts risks progress elsewhere in the country.

The bottom line is this: More U.S. troops in Iraq would improve our chances of winning a decisive battle at a decisive moment. This means the ability to succeed in Iraq is, to some significant degree, within our control. The president should therefore order a substantial surge in overall troop levels in Iraq, with the additional forces focused on securing Baghdad.

There is now no good argument for not sending more troops. The administration often says that it doesn't want to foster Iraqi dependency. This is a legitimate concern, but it is a second-order and long-term one. Iraq is a young democracy and a weak state facing a vicious insurgency and sectarian violence. The Iraqis are going to be dependent on us for some time. We can worry about weaning Iraq from reliance on our forces after the security crisis in Baghdad has passed.

The administration emphasizes that there needs to be a political, not simply a military, solution to Iraq. This is of course true. But the violence intersects with politics. Violence is radicalizing. It serves to empower extremists who are aligned with our enemies. So long as we don't succeed in controlling the violence, it will make any political settlement far more difficult.

Indeed, the violence perpetrated by the Shiite militias is directly related to politics. It is part of a power play by the likes of Moqtada al-Sadr to marginalize moderate figures such as Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani. Sistani's recent statement of disgust with Iraqi politics suggests that Sadr's gambit may be working. Sending more American troops at this juncture would not be a simple-minded and clumsy substitution of military force for political finesse. It would be an attempt to influence Iraq's political situation in our favor.

The administration's military strategy has long been based on getting the Iraqis to do the "holding" in the counterinsurgency strategy of "clear, hold and build." That would obviously be ideal. But the experience of the past three years is that the Iraqis aren't yet up to it, at least not in hotly contested areas such as Baghdad. The administration deserves credit for the strides it has made in training the Iraqi army. But for now we have to do much of the holding ourselves for it to be effective. That simply requires more manpower.

If American troops hand neighborhoods over to Iraqis, they are likely to soon deteriorate again -- in the same dynamic we have repeatedly seen of trouble spots being brought under control by American troops only to slide back again when the Americans leave.

One reason to prefer having Iraqis hold secured areas is that indigenous forces, in theory, don't risk creating the kind of nationalist reaction that can be prompted by a foreign occupying army -- i.e., us. But in the current environment of sectarian bloodletting, all signs are that American troops are more trusted and more welcome than Iraqis. Many Sunnis -- confronted by Shiite militias -- now accept our troop presence, and moderate Shiite leaders want us to stay. In fact, the chief fear of Iraqis in Baghdad neighborhoods patrolled by Americans is apparently that we will leave, not that we will remain.

Harvard Law School's William Stuntz recently made the core point powerfully: "The territory over which we fight is among the most strategically important in the world. Victory will place the most dangerous regime on the planet, Iran's fascist theocracy, in serious peril. Defeat will leave that same regime inestimably strengthened. If there is any significant possibility that the presence of more American soldiers on the ground would raise the odds of success, not putting those soldiers on the ground is a crime."

Administration spokesmen have jettisoned talk of "staying the course" in Iraq in favor of "adapting to win." If those words are to have meaning, the administration can't simply stay the course on current troop levels. We need to adapt to win the battle of Baghdad. We need substantially more troops in Iraq. Sending them would be a courageous act of presidential leadership appropriate to the crisis we face.

Even Dating Is Perilous In Polarized Baghdad (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

BAGHDAD -- He was a dashing young computer engineer. She was a shy student at his alma mater. They fell in love over lunch last year in the university cafeteria and promptly became engaged.

As they prepared for a future together, the couple barely discussed a subject that, under Saddam Hussein's rule, amounted to a footnote in matters of the heart: He was a Shiite Muslim; she was a Sunni Kurd.

But now those labels are tearing the couple apart. Barred by their families from marrying anyone of the opposite sect, the couple has erased one another's cellphone numbers and stopped speaking.

"There is no hope in this country anymore for Sunnis and Shiites to fall in love," said Husham al-Gizzy, a 25-year-old engineer, as he buried his face in his hands and recounted the story.

For decades, marriages between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq were as ordinary as the daily call to prayer. But the sectarian warfare gripping the country has created a powerful barrier to Sunni-Shiite romances.

Married couples have filed for divorce rather than face the scorn of their neighbors. Fiances have split up as a result of death threats. And, increasingly, young single Iraqis have concluded that it is simply easier to stick to their own kind when it comes to love and family.

In a country where intermarriage was long considered the glue that held a fragile multi-ethnic society together, the romantic segregation of Sunnis and Shiites is more than just a reflection of the ever more hate-filled chasm between the two groups. It is also a grim foreboding of the future.

"Everyone is just taking sides to prepare for a big civil war," said Adnan Abdul Kareem Enad, manager of Sot al-Jamayaa, a radio station that has aired tales of star-crossed Sunni and Shiite lovers. "You can see the polarization of Iraq in the tensions between Sunnis and Shiites in marriage and dating."

The new taboo on Sunni-Shiite romances is only one of many impediments to love in this war-ravaged country. Religious authorities have forbidden casual dating. Women fearful of the bloodshed have become prisoners in their own homes. Couples have shunned posh restaurants once filled with lovebirds because they fear suicide bombers or kidnappers.

"This is the age of cellphone love," said Omar al-Azzawi, 33, an Internet cafe owner who has a Sunni father and a Shiite mother. "If I marry someone, we'll have to get married on the phone. We'll probably have to make love on the phone, too."

Still, the burgeoning obstacles to Sunni-Shiite romances remain among the most ominous signs of the rapidly deteriorating relationship between the two sects. Although underlying tensions always simmered between Hussein's Sunni government and the country's oppressed Shiite minority, few expected them to flare so violently and so quickly after his government collapsed.

For Hameed Ayad, a 24-year-old Sunni, the disintegration of his engagement to a Shiite classmate came swiftly after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. His betrothed shocked him by expressing newfound pride in once-suppressed Shiite customs such as public self-flagellation and pilgrimages to the holy cities of Karbala and Najaf.

Ayad accused his fiancee of fanaticism and broke off the relationship. But to hear him describe Shiite Islam as a "backward" religion suggests that he, too, has sided with his own.

"Even if she were the last woman on Earth, I wouldn't marry a Shiite," Ayad, a recent graduate in business administration from al-Turath University, said as he picked at a breakfast of scrambled eggs and cucumbers. "You could even put her in a frame of gold, but if I will break this gold, I would find mud inside of her."

Like many young Iraqi men, Ayad is so busy just trying to stay alive that he has given little thought to dating over the past three years. "I cannot guarantee my own life," he said. "How can I get married and be responsible for others?"

So when will it be safe enough in Iraq for him to get married?

"When the rooster will lay eggs," he replied, stone-faced.

For young Iraqi women, the isolation is often more extreme. The relentless carnage in the city so petrified Areej Abbas, 25, that she did not leave her home a single time for more than three years. She had no cellphone. No friends. No guests. All day she watched television.

"I was miserable," she said in a Sot al-Jamayaa studio, where she started working as a science show host this month in her first venture out of the house. "I probably would have committed suicide if it weren't for the satellite television."

Universities remain perhaps the safest place for a romantic rendezvous, though religious Shiites have begun to infiltrate campuses such as Baghdad University, posting signs warning about the evils of dating and promiscuity. Still, high school students now say the primary reason they want to attend university is to meet members of the opposite sex, according to a recent survey by Sot al-Jamayaa.

"It's becoming impossible to meet girls outside of the college," said Enad, the Sot al-Jamayaa manager. "Even older men now are desperate to go back to school if they are single."

But even if soul mates find each other on a university campus, sectarian differences can quickly split them apart. Many young people say it is primarily parents who are driving a wedge between members of mixed couples.

Samar Hussein, now a 27-year-old Shiite civil servant, said her parents initially rejoiced when a Sunni classmate asked for her hand in marriage four years ago. Her older brother and aunt had both married Sunnis, and the family cared little about religious affiliation.

But Hussein's family now worries about the practical considerations of intermarriage. Vast swaths of Baghdad have become no-go zones to members of certain sects. Those who do venture there face abduction or death.

"If a Shiite gets married to a Sunni guy, how will her mother be able to go and visit her?" Hussein asked. "And when the country is divided into Sunni and Shiite areas, there will be a difficult question: Will the women choose to go with their husbands or stay with their families? And the kids? Who is going to take care of them?"

She paused. "It will be a great tragedy," she said.

Hussein's parents forbid her to see the Sunni man, but she continues to trade covert I-love-you's with him on the phone. She will not break a tradition that requires parental approval for marriage, but she hopes their families might one day change. "We will leave it up to God," she said. "Maybe He will plant love between our families and show them the right way."

Many couples -- particularly well-educated, secular city-dwellers -- continue to intermarry. But even when the lovers and their parents consent to the marriage, mixed relationships are often fraught with danger.

Qais Jassim, 26, a Shiite from the Adhamiyah section of Baghdad, spent his wedding night petrified that his Sunni wife's relatives would abduct and behead him. After three months of one-on-one meetings with the woman's father, Jassim had finally persuaded her parents to support their marriage. But her cousins disagreed.

"Leave her alone or we'll kill you," the cousins screamed at him, Jassim recalled.

Such disputes, however, arise only after lonely Iraqi souls manage to find a potential mate, an increasingly daunting proposition in a country with curfews, limited mobility and the constant threat of death squads. Some teenage boys have taken to dialing random numbers in hopes that a girl will answer. Other young Iraqis have tried to connect via ubiquitous Internet chat rooms.

In cyberspace, like almost everywhere in Iraq these days, one of the first questions is often: Are you Sunni or Shiite? Give the wrong answer, and the conversation is over. Manal Hussein, a 34-year-old biology student at Baghdad University, recalled someone in a chat room inquiring about her sect.

"When I told him I was Sunni, he said, 'Okay, bye-bye,' " she recalled.

Each thwarted Sunni-Shiite relationship etches the gulf between the two groups a little deeper and foils another opportunity to produce the next generation of children with mixed backgrounds -- those living testaments to the not-so-distant peace between the sects.

Ayad, the 24-year-old Sunni who said he would never marry a Shiite, fears that Iraq has already begun a free fall into carnage.

He shook his head and pointed at a dirty white ashtray filled with five crumbled cigarette butts. "The future of Iraq will be like this," he said.

Saddam Accuses Kurds Of Sowing Hatred (AP)

By Qais Al-bashir

AP, September 12, 2006

A defiant Saddam Hussein accused Kurdish witnesses at his genocide trial Monday of trying to divide Iraqis by alleging chemical attacks and mass arrests during a crackdown that the prosecution says killed up to 180,000 people.

Three Kurdish witnesses told of brutal repression during Operation Anfal, the 1987-88 campaign against a Kurdish revolt in the final stages of Iraq's war with Iran. Saddam accused the Kurds of helping Iran in the war.

One of the witnesses, a Kurdish-American, said she saw people sickened and dying during a chemical attack and demanded compensation from foreign companies that supplied Saddam with chemicals, supposedly for agriculture.

"All the witnesses said in the courtroom that they were oppressed because they were Kurds," Saddam shouted after hearing the testimony. "They're trying to create strife between the people of Iraq. They're trying to create division between Kurds and Arabs and this is what I want the people of Iraq to know."

The deposed president said the Iraqi people "should not suffer from the guilt that they killed Kurds" and insisted that he treated loyal Iraqi Kurds fairly. Only those who joined the Kurdish insurgency were punished, he said.

Since the trial opened Aug. 21, witnesses have offered grim testimony of entire families dying in chemical weapons attacks. They said survivors plunged their faces into milk to try to end the pain from the blinding gas or fled into the hills on mules as military helicopters fired on them.

Saddam is among seven defendants charged with genocide or other offenses during Operation Anfal. If convicted, they could face death by hanging.

The trial resumed Monday after a nearly three-week break.

Katreen Elias Mikhail, a Kurdish Christian and former militia fighter, testified that four Iraqi planes unleashed a wave of bombs on the evening of June 5, 1987, on the Kurdish town of Qalizewa in northern Iraq.

"I smelled something dirty and strange," she told the court. "People were falling to the ground. They vomited and their eyes were blinded. We couldn't see anything."

"We were all afraid," she said, her voice cracking. "It was our first time seeing bombs falling on our heads."

Mikhail said she had come to court to lodge a personal complaint against Saddam, his cousin and co-defendant Ali "Chemical Ali" al-Majid as well as all those who provided the regime with chemicals used in the attacks.

"I demand compensation," she said.

Witness Ahmed Abdul-Rahman told the court he was rounded up from a village near Sulaimaniyah and imprisoned for four months "where they investigated us, they tortured us and they beat us."

A third witness, Sardar Ali Salih, said Saddam's Republican Guards raided his village in 1987, arresting Kurdish men and seizing sheep, the residents' livelihood.

"While in prison, they beat and tortured us. I stayed there for three months," Salih said. "There were 126 detainees with me. They took 58 and put us in another room. They told us that we would be released, that Saddam ordered our release." The others disappeared, including two of his brothers.

Saddam is still awaiting a verdict on Oct. 16 in the first case against him — the nine-month-long trial over the killings of 148 Shiites in Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt against him there. In that case as well, he and seven other co-defendants could face the death penalty.

The Anfal trial, which began in August, is also likely to take months.

The Bush administration had argued that the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq was needed to unseat Saddam because he possessed weapons of mass destruction and had ties to al-Qaida.

As recently as Aug. 21, President Bush said people should "imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein" with the capacity to make weapons of mass destruction and "who had relations with al-Zarqawi," referring to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq who was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June.

However, a recent U.S. Senate committee report found no link between Saddam and the terror network, and Saddam's alleged possession of weapons of mass destruction was debunked after the invasion, when none could be found.

Yet the Anfal case points to his alleged use of poison gas against Iraqi citizens, a charge often leveled by Washington.

Kurdish survivors say many villages were razed and countless young men disappeared.

They also accuse the army of using prohibited mustard gas and nerve agents. The current trial does not deal with the most notorious gassing — the March 1988 attack on Halabja that killed an estimated 5,000 Kurds. That incident will be part of a separate investigation.

Saddam Says Genocide Trial 'Dividing Iraq' (AFP)

By Jay Deshmukh

AFP, September 12, 2006

Ousted dictator Saddam Hussein has charged that his genocide trial was "dividing Iraq" as Kurdish witnesses told of the horror of gas attacks unleashed against them during the brutal Anfal campaign of 1987-88.

"The whole beginning (of witness testimonies) is aimed at creating a split within Iraq between the Kurds and Arabs," Saddam said in a tirade from the dock as the trial resumed after a three-week recess.

Saddam and six co-defendants including his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid, dubbed "Chemical Ali", face charges including genocide over Anfal which prosecutors say was a systematic campaign of slaughter that killed 182,000 Kurds.

"I want to give a message to the Iraqi people that they should not suffer from this guilt that they killed Kurds. This is shameful," he said.

Saddam, who is also awaiting a verdict in a trial over the killing of Shiite villagers after an attempt on his life in 1982, is charged with genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity over the Anfal campaign.

If found guilty, he faces execution by hanging.

But Saddam, showing flashes of anger, claimed he had on several occasions acted on behalf of the Kurdish minority in Iraq.

"After the Iran-Iraq war ... I made a statement on TV and radio giving orders that no Iraqi security force should arrest Kurds, and if anyone has problems with Kurds, they should complain to Saddam Hussein."

The former dictator also said it was he who agreed autonomy for the Kurds in northern Iraq in 1970, when he was vice president.

"If the Arabs were racist and discriminatory, why would they accept an autonomy for the Kurds," he said, vowing however that "Iraqis will not split".

Saddam's outburst came after three more witnesses testified against him and six co-defendants accused of gassing Kurds and bombing their villages to quell an insurgency that coincided with the last years of the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war.

Katherine Elias Mikhail, once a peshmerga Kurdish guerrilla, described how she was present when first her unit and then a year later her village were gassed by Saddam's air force.

"I saw hundreds of people -- not dozens but hundreds -- and they were vomiting and teary-eyed," she said describing a 1987 attack on a peshmerga base. "People with me collapsed because they had lost their sight."

In late 1988, the planes struck her village.

"We had been frequently attacked by aircraft, but this time the sound of the explosions was not as loud as before and after the explosion there was white smoke," said the woman who now works as a writer in the United States.

Most prominent among his co-accused is Ali Hassan al-Majid, dubbed "Chemical Ali" over his alleged role in gas attacks who said Monday that some villages were burnt because "those who stayed in those villages were servants of peshmergas and Iranians."

Mikhail, who has long since shed her guerrilla fatigues for a business suit, said she lost most of her family to the old regime and her complaint was against Saddam and Chemical Ali and "the international companies who supplied the Iraqi regimes with these weapons".

She was followed on the witness stand by two more Kurds, including Ahmed Abdel Rahman, a farmer who described how troops came through his village in 1987, set fire to his village and drove off their cattle.

"We followed after them and begged them to return our cattle, and they told us that the Iraqi government had ordered them to kill us and loot our livestock," he said, going on to describe his subsequent imprisonment.

The trial resumed on the same day the United States marked the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks on New York and Washington that left close to 3,000 people dead.

On Friday a US Senate report concluded that Saddam had no links with Al-Qaeda prior to the September 11 attacks as US President George W. Bush's administration had repeatedly charged.

Since the genocide trial began on August 21, nine witnesses have given graphic testimony about how their villages had been gassed, their fields destroyed and their families exterminated in brutal death camps run by Saddam's forces.

Monday's session began with a Tunisian lawyer for Saddam quitting the defense team after the judge said foreigners could only work as legal advisors and not attorneys.

The trial has been adjourned to Tuesday.

Hussein Trial Resumes; Sectarian Attacks Continue In Streets (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

BAGHDAD, Tuesday, Sept. 12 — The trial of Saddam Hussein on charges of genocide against Iraq's Kurds resumed Monday, after a nearly three-week hiatus, while sectarian violence continued on Baghdad's streets, including the suicide bombing of a crowded downtown bus that killed more than a dozen people.

At a meeting of Parliament inside the fortified Green Zone, meanwhile, an effort by a group of Shiite lawmakers to promote legislation that would allow Iraq to be partitioned into autonomous regions appeared to lose some momentum on Monday after a rival Shiite bloc dissented.

Also Monday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said in a statement that he planned to make his first state visit to Iran on Tuesday, to discuss security and political issues.

In the trial, Mr. Hussein and six other former officials in his government face charges that they killed more than 50,000 Kurdish Iraqis, during a campaign in northern Iraq in 1988 in which the government used conventional and chemical weapons against civilians. Mr. Hussein also faces the charge of genocide.

He and his co-defendants maintain that the campaign was military in nature, to support Iraqi troops who were trying to suppress Kurdish militias backed by Iran.

On Monday, three Kurdish witnesses described attacks in 1987 and 1988 in which chemical gas attacks in Iraq's mountainous northeast region by Iraqi troops left villagers blinded and desperately ill.

Katrin Michael, 56, a Kurdish woman who said she now lived in Virginia, said she and several other villagers saw Iraqi military planes drop bombs that issued white smoke that smelled of garlic. Villages who did not die from the chemicals developed large blisters, she said.

A second witness, Ahmed Abdel Rahman Ahmed, described Iraqi troops razing his village in September 1987. "They evacuated the village and burned the houses," he told the court, adding that they also stole farm animals, including 100 of his sheep and goats.

Defense lawyers characterized those raids as a necessary reaction to the Kurdish villagers' refusal to leave their homes after being ordered to relocate to a new, restricted area by the Hussein government.

As has become his custom, Mr. Hussein spent part of his day lecturing the chief judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, about what he characterizes as the illegitimacy of the charges against him. At one point, Mr. Hussein accused the Kurdish witnesses of trying to exacerbate the ethnic divisions between them and the country's Arab majority.

"The whole point is to make a split between the Arabs and the Kurds," Mr. Hussein huffed, before being told to be quiet.

In Parliament on Monday, lawmakers aligned with the political movement led by the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr came out against efforts to enact legislation that would allow Iraq to be divided into autonomous regions, with Shiites and Kurds controlling the oil-rich south and north. Sunni Arabs, who would be left holding the barren western and central regions, are vehemently opposed to the legislation.

Baha al-Araji, a Shiite member of Parliament from Mr. Sadr's political movement, which controls about 30 seats in Parliament, said the movement would not support the bill or its reading next week.

"We believe that this draft does not serve the interest of Iraq now," he said in an interview on Monday afternoon.

"It is better to discuss it after the withdrawal of the occupation," he added, referring to the 138,000 American troops in Iraq. "Discussing this subject will increase disharmony with our Sunni brothers, so we should have more time so that Iraqi people can understand the real meaning of federalism."

But other Shiite members of Parliament, mostly from the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful party with close ties to Iran, said they would press a reading of the bill next week regardless of whether other Shiite political parties supported it.

"We will go with them or without them," said Khalid al-Atiya, the Shiite deputy speaker of Parliament, in an interview on Monday evening.

Violence continued in Baghdad and nearby cities on Monday. At 9 a.m., a man wearing a belt of explosives boarded a minibus full of Iraqi Army recruits and blew himself up, killing 13 people and wounding 3 others, an Interior Ministry official said.

Early Tuesday morning, American soldiers from a patrol in the Ghaziliya neighborhood of Baghdad, a religiously mixed area where Sunnis and Shiites have clashed, delivered six headless bodies to Yarmouk Hospital, a hospital official said. They also turned over a seventh body, which was not mutilated and was found in another neighborhood, in northeast Baghdad, the hospital official said.

Outside of Baquba, a city northeast of Baghdad that has fallen into an almost daily cycle of sectarian revenge killings, Sunni insurgents attacked a Shiite mosque with mortars and small-arms fire, killing four guards, a provincial police official said.

The attackers then rigged the inside of the mosque with explosives, which they detonated, razing the mosque, the official said. A gun battle between local residents and the insurgents left three more people dead.

Near the northern city of Kirkuk, four oil refinery workers were killed in an attack as they drove toward south toward Tikrit, the Iraqi police said.

Bomber Attacks Afghan Governor's Funeral (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 11 — A suicide bomber blew himself up Monday at the funeral of the assassinated governor of Paktia Province, killing at least seven people and wounding up to 40. Five of the dead were policemen, and two were children.

The funeral was for Hakim Taniwal, a tribal elder and provincial governor who was killed in a suicide attack outside his office on Sunday. He was buried in his home district of Tanai, in Khost Province, where he had also served as governor after the fall of the Taliban.

"The number of wounded is very high," the provincial police chief, Gen. Muhammad Ayub, said by telephone. "Actually, we don't know how many people were wounded yet."

President Hamid Karzai, who was a close friend of Mr. Taniwal's, denounced the attack as a "heinous act of terrorism" and "an act against Islam and humanity."

"The enemies of Afghanistan, by carrying out a terrorist attack on the funeral ceremony of Hakim Taniwal, showed that they are not only against the traditions and culture of Afghans, but also against Islamic law," Mr. Karzai said in a statement issued by his office. "Enemies of Afghanistan" is the Afghan government's description for Taliban insurgents and other groups opposed to the government.

The attacks on Mr. Taniwal and on his funeral were seen by some here as a message from the Taliban that they are ready to strike in areas outside their traditional homeland, which is in the south, and are showing they can hit where they want.

A Taliban spokesman, Dr. Muhammad Hanif, said the Taliban was responsible for the death of Mr. Taniwal, and identified the suicide bomber as Ghulam Gul, from the Zurmat district of Paktia Province, an area of known Taliban influence. But he denied that the Taliban was behind the bombing at his funeral, saying, "We never do any action at religious ceremonies."

Dr. Hanif was contacted by telephone and was speaking from an unknown location. He is one of two spokesmen who regularly talk to the news media, but it is not known how closely he represents the Taliban leadership. NATO and American military officials have said fissures are showing in the Taliban movement, with some Taliban commanders based inside Afghanistan opposed to suicide bombing and, in one case, a commander refused orders from top leaders to execute a hostage he was holding. The hostage was later rescued by foreign troops.

About a thousand people had gathered for Mr. Taniwal's funeral, including the ministers of the interior, refugees, communications and parliamentary affairs, and other officials, who had flown in from Kabul, said General Ayub, the police chief. The explosion went off around 3 p.m., just 600 yards from the ministers as they were heading toward helicopters to return to Kabul, he said.

None of the ministers was hurt, but the head of police security of Khost Province was among those wounded, he said. An Afghan journalist from Radio and Television Afghanistan was also wounded.

The suicide bomber appeared to be about 15 years old, General Ayub said.

A medic at Khost's city hospital, Muhammad Wali Nuri, said it had taken in seven dead from the attack, five policemen and two boys 10 to 11 years old. The hospital had also received 40 wounded, both police officers and civilians, and sent six of the most seriously wounded to the American military base in town.

Blast Hits Funeral Of Slain Afghan Governor (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 11 -- The crowded funeral ceremony of a provincial governor killed Sunday by a suicide bomber was attacked by another bomber Monday in Khost province, leaving six more people dead and dozens wounded.

Four cabinet ministers escaped injury when explosives detonated among mourners leaving services for Hakim Taniwal, who was governor of Paktia province. It was the third major suicide attack in Afghanistan in four days. On Saturday, a car bomber blew himself up alongside a U.S. military convoy here in the capital, killing 14 Afghans and two U.S. soldiers.

A purported spokesman for the Taliban, which has been battling NATO troops across southern Afghanistan for weeks, asserted responsibility for Taniwal's death but not for the funeral bombing, telling news agencies by telephone that it was against Taliban policy to attack religious ceremonies.

Taniwal was the most senior official to be slain in escalating attacks that have included remote-control and suicide bombings, as well as armed assaults. The attacks appear to be part of an orchestrated offensive by the revived Taliban militia, which ruled most of Afghanistan from 1996 until it was ousted by a U.S.-led military assault in 2001.

The current violence, the most intense since the defeat of the Taliban, has killed nearly 2,000 people this year, according to military reports. In the southern province of Kandahar, where NATO troops have been battling insurgents in two districts, officials said Monday that 92 more Taliban fighters had been killed, bringing the total to 510 in less than a week. Twenty foreign troops have been killed in recent weeks.

President Hamid Karzai called the funeral attack "a heinous act of terrorism that is an action against Islam and humanity." By bombing the gathering of mourners, he said in a statement, the killers showed they were against "not only the tradition and cultures of Afghanistan, but also against Islamic law."

Jamal Arsala, governor of Khost province, said in a telephone interview Monday night that more than 1,000 people were leaving the funeral for Taniwal in his native village of Hisarak when the bomber blew himself up in the middle of the crowd.

"The occasion made it especially sad. There was nothing the security people could do in that large crowd. It hurts me a lot," Arsala said. "It seems like they are going after soft but high-profile targets now, such as governors. Khost has so much potential to become an important economic center. This could take that opportunity away."

Paktia and Khost provinces border Pakistan. Afghan officials have repeatedly complained that Taliban renegades are being sheltered and supported by religious or intelligence groups in the rugged tribal border regions of Pakistan. The Pakistani government has denied the allegations and sent 80,000 army troops to curb extremist violence in the region.

Last week, however, Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, signed a peace agreement with Taliban groups operating in North Waziristan, a tribal region that borders Khost province. The deal requires the Taliban forces to stop attacks on both sides of the border, but critics in the two countries have said they fear it will actually give the Taliban more freedom to infiltrate into Afghanistan and carry out attacks.

Taniwal, 63, a former sociology professor, was a close adviser to Karzai who returned from long exile in Australia in 2002 at the new Afghan president's request to become governor of Khost. Later, he was briefly named to a cabinet ministry and then appointed governor of Paktia last year.

Taniwal died, along with his nephew and at least two other people, when a man wrapped in explosives ran toward his vehicle as he was leaving his office Sunday in Gardez, the capital of Paktia. Taniwal's body was flown to Kabul, and a procession and brief mourning ceremony were held at the Eid Gah, a majestic old mosque in the capital, before the retinue continued on to Khost by helicopter.

Karzai and other senior officials attended the Kabul ceremony under heavy security, along with U.N. officials and prominent Afghans who arrived and left quickly in Land Cruisers. The area around the mosque and the adjacent national stadium was cordoned off by soldiers and police, and no traffic was allowed to pass.

"He was a great person, and he worked hard for the peace process until the day he died," said Abdul Khan Suleimankhel, a member of parliament from Paktia who was at the service, wearing the traditional yellow turban of his region. "This will stop things for a while, but we elders will get together and find a way to keep the process going."

Taniwal was leading efforts in Paktia to persuade Taliban fighters to reconcile with the Karzai government and resolve a variety of tribal conflicts, a mission he had previously undertaken in Khost.

Rasool Amin, a former minister of education, described him as an "enlightened man who had worked hard for democracy all his life."

"He was a friend for 33 years, so this is a great shock," Amin added as he stood outside the Eid Gah. "Something has gone terribly wrong. Most Afghans want peace and progress, but we have been hijacked by extremists."

Justice Department Lawyers Lose Appeal On Overtime Pay (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

There's no dispute that Justice Department lawyers worked overtime and on holidays, and there's evidence the lawyers were "expected and induced" to work extra hours. But that's not enough to win back pay, a federal court ruled yesterday.

Overtime hours must be "ordered or approved" in advance for pay purposes, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit said.

The ruling is the latest in a long-running class-action lawsuit involving more than 9,000 Justice Department lawyers, but it's not the end of the case.

The agency lawyers, represented by Williams & Connolly LLP, will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court, said Robert A. Van Kirk , a lawyer for the firm.

"The Federal Circuit's decision essentially guts the Federal Employees Pay Act and gives federal agencies the green light to disregard the mandatory overtime provisions of the law," Van Kirk said.

The Justice Department would not comment on the ruling. In the past, the department has said that its lawyers are professionals who accept that they will work more than 40 hours a week to carry out their responsibilities.

Yesterday's ruling was the second defeat for the Justice Department lawyers -- many are assistant U.S. attorneys -- at the circuit court. They had prevailed in a federal claims court only to see that decision reversed on an appeal by the department. The lawyers went back to the circuit court in hopes of readdressing certain issues in the case.

The agency lawyers are seeking compensation for overtime, holiday and "administratively uncontrollable overtime," a special pay category. The department has said the case covers the period between 1992 to 1999, but the lawyers think the case could extend to the present.

The back pay at stake is substantial -- a 2001 estimate suggested it could be as high as $500 million. That year, the department successfully lobbied for legislation that it thinks will prevent the use of appropriated funds to pay overtime to its lawyers. That tactic brought criticism from some House members, who said the department was not leading by example and should conduct itself beyond reproach.

Yesterday's ruling, issued by federal Circuit Court Judges Alvin A. Schall , Randall R. Rader and Sharon Prost , focused on precise language in the 1945 federal pay law and in federal regulations. At issue was the court's finding that overtime hours must be approved in advance in writing and that the lawyers were not on a list of Justice Department employees who qualify for uncontrollable overtime -- a pay differential that goes to criminal investigators and others who regularly work long and irregular hours because of their assignments. The court also said an earlier ruling against the lawyers was correct and precluded them from getting holiday pay.

Even though the Justice Department kept two sets of books on the lawyers -- one for pay purposes and one for determining actual hours worked -- the court rejected for a second time the lawyers' argument that the records represented the department's approval of the extra hours.

"These records merely showed that the agency had awareness that attorneys worked extra hours -- not that they had been authorized to receive overtime pay for working extra hours," the court said.

When lawyers asked about overtime, they were told they were not entitled. The department also told lawyers there was no system in place to request overtime, according to the plaintiffs.Fellowship Program

The Commerce Department is accepting nominations for the 2007 Commerce Science and Technology Fellowship Program, known as ComSci, that runs from January through October. ComSci provides opportunities to study national and international policy and management issues related to science and technology.

Full-time career federal employees in a professional or management series at the General Schedule 13 level or above are eligible to apply. The deadline for nominations is Oct. 2. For details, call 202-482-6103 or send an e-mail to Cynthia.Lynn@technology.gov .

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Tension At The Top (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The Justice Department, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a House subcommittee have started their own probes into how Hewlett-Packard Co. investigators obtained private phone records in an attempt to identify a source of company leaks to the media, according to the company and regulatory filings released yesterday.

Last night, the HP board of directors also reconvened to consider ousting its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, who led the company's efforts to identify the source of the leaks from its own board.

The company revealed yesterday in a regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it had been contacted by the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California for information regarding its investigation.

A spokesman for the FBI said the agency also was looking into the methods of HP's investigation. The House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on oversight and investigations has asked HP to submit information as part of the committee's broader look at breaches of private information. Last week, the California state attorney general's office launched its own investigation, and the Federal Communications Commission requested information from AT&T Corp. about the disclosure of the phone records.

How HP's investigators obtained phone records and other private information about its directors and several members of the news media has touched off a storm of criticism and investigations, and has raised concerns that such aggressive tactics are commonplace in the corporate world.

The company, started in the Silicon Valley garage of its founders and incorporated in 1939, is considered an icon in the technology world. But moving its old-line business into the new age divided the company in recent years, a tension that has created one of the fiercest feuding corporate boards.

When Dunn joined the board as a director in 1998, the company was known more for its line of printers than for computers. In 2001, then-HP chief executive Carly Fiorina championed a $19 billion acquisition of Compaq, arguing that buying the maker of personal computers would give the business bigger scale and a broader base of corporate customers. Fiorina clashed bitterly with Walter Hewlett, son of co-founder Bill Hewlett, who sought to keep HP from venturing afield of its profitable printer business. Hewlett had the backing of members of the Packard family, but when Fiorina prevailed and HP bought Compaq, he was dismissed from the board.

Dunn backed Fiorina in that battle but turned against her three years later, calling for the resignation of the brash and charismatic Fiorina as HP faltered after the merger. Fiorina, one of the few female Fortune 500 leaders, resigned. Dunn took over her position as chairman, and former NCR Corp. chief executive Mark Hurd eventually assumed the position of chief executive.

Under Hurd, the company's profit has soared as it cut costs and eliminated more than 15,000 jobs. The company's stock has also made a dramatic recovery during his tenure. When he joined the company in April 2005, its stock was trading at about $22 per share. The stock gained 27 cents per share yesterday to close at $36.36, which is near its 52-week high of $36.73.

This month, however, the company disclosed to the SEC that one of its board members, venture capitalist Thomas Perkins, resigned in May. Perkins is a former HP employee who was best known for co-founding the prominent Silicon Valley venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers.

His resignation came in protest over the methods used to determine which board member had been leaking information to the news media.

In trying to find the leak, the company hired an investigator, who then hired an agency that had its employees pose as HP board members and nine journalists to gain access to their personal phone records -- a practice known as pretexting. HP had determined that George A. Keyworth II had leaked the information. Keyworth was asked to resign but declined. The company said it would not re-nominate him to the board.

Dunn, who was named board chairman after Fiorina was ousted, has become the central figure in the scandal because the investigation was ordered under her watch.

Dunn, 53, the daughter of a Las Vegas showgirl, started her career as a secretary for Wells Fargo Bank and worked up to chief executive of Barclays Global Investors.

During her tenure on the board, she has presided over a number of acrimonious battles at HP. This time, she has publicly denied any knowledge of the methods of investigation and has criticized Perkins, the former board member, after he called for her resignation.

"Tom knew more about the investigation than probably any other director," Dunn told the San Jose Mercury News in an article on Saturday. Perkins advocated going further, including subjecting board members to lie detector tests, Dunn told the newspaper, a claim Perkins denied.

In an e-mail, Perkins also complained to HP general counsel Ann Baskins that minutes from the board meeting did not reflect his dismay at the surveillance tactics. HP's outside counsel, Larry Sonsini, chairman of the law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, also told Perkins in a June e-mail that the investigation and its conduct were legal.

"In corporate scandals, this is as bad as it gets," said Charles Elson, director of the Center of Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. While leaks are undesirable, it was far worse that the company investigated its own board, which is supposed to be independent, and was allowed to criticize management practices, he said. "The chairperson of the board should be held accountable" for such a violation of directors' independence, he said.

H-P's Leak Probe Comes Under Wider Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton In San Francisco And John R. Emshwiller In Los Angeles

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The Justice Department has joined a probe of potentially illegal tactics by Hewlett-Packard Co. in investigating leaks by its board of directors.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California yesterday confirmed that his office and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are probing the "processes employed" in the H-P leak investigation. Separately, a House committee said it is seeking information from H-P about the matter, including the identity of private investigators that H-P has said it used in the investigation, which involved accessing the private phone records of board members and nine journalists.

1 WHO'S WHO IN THE SCANDAL

See profiles2 of H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, former director Thomas Perkins and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. • Complete coverage3

The inquiries were disclosed ahead of the second phase of a closely watched H-P board meeting, which adjourned Sunday and resumed last evening. The directors were expected to discuss the investigation and its potential fallout, including questions about the role of Chairman Patricia Dunn and senior company executives in authorizing and conducting the probe.

The focus of the government inquiries is an H-P investigation that was requested by Ms. Dunn in 2005 and intensified in early 2006. That company probe involved a practice known as "pretexting," in which a person's private phone records are obtained by someone impersonating them.

The Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker has disclosed that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out the inquiry and the firm, still unidentified, hired a second firm that used pretexting to obtain phone records. Ms. Dunn has said she knew directors' phone records were being scrutinized, but didn't realize those records had been obtained improperly.

According to two people close to H-P, one reason for the board's adjournment Sunday was discussion about whether former director Thomas Perkins should be asked to rejoin the board. Mr. Perkins resigned last spring to protest the investigation of the leaks. Since then, the wealthy venture capitalist has suggested that directors remove Ms. Dunn as chairman and put him back on the board, according to these people familiar with the situation.

"He gets his prestige from sitting on corporate boards" and being an H-P board member was very important to him, one knowledgeable individual said. He was surprised when the board accepted his resignation, this person added.

However, Mr. Perkins's spokesman, Mark Corallo, said, "Tom Perkins will not return, even if asked, to the board of H-P. He remains steadfastly loyal to H-P and is motivated only by the company's best interests." As for Ms. Dunn, she has said she will resign if the board requests it. Both people close to H-P said the board has been cool to the idea of Mr. Perkins returning as an H-P director. It is unclear whether the board will ask Ms. Dunn to resign as chairman, director or both.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said a crime was likely committed in the H-P probe, although his office has yet to determine who committed it. A spokesman for Mr. Lockyer's office yesterday said two potential felonies could be involved -- illegally accessing and using computer data and accessing personal-identification information and using it for illegal purposes, such as illegally accessing computer data.

Each of those crimes carries a maximum of three years in prison and a $10,000 fine. A person could be charged with multiple counts of the same crime, which presumably could happen because numerous individuals had their private records accessed.

The state agency could bring civil suits against individuals. The spokesman said there were various possible statutes under which to bring such actions. For instance, someone could be charged with unlawful business practices. Each violation of that statute carries a $2,500 fine.

FBI Deputy Director John Pistole told the Associated Press that the bureau opened its probe yesterday and was investigating two possible crimes: illegal computer intrusion and wiretapping. Under federal law, improperly obtaining personal phone records could be seen as a violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, which attempts to protect consumer information. Regulations of the Federal Communications Commission require companies to keep customer information private.

But federal law may not be completely clear.

Late Friday, leaders of the House Judiciary Committee sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist urging him to move legislation stalled in the Senate that would make pretexting a federal crime. That legislation passed the House in April although a similar bill remains stalled there. In the letter, the lawmakers cited a letter by Larry Sonsini, H-P's outside attorney, reportedly suggesting that using pretexting services wasn't clearly illegal.

"If an attorney of Mr. Sonsini's caliber...believes that pretexting is not already a crime, then the time has come to clearly and unambiguously make such activity illegal," the lawmakers wrote.

On top of whatever federal statutes may have been broken, prosecutors could pile on conspiracy-related charges that could trigger a minimum of five years imprisonment, said Behnam Dayanim, a partner and privacy specialist in the Washington office of the international law firm Paul Hastings.

To put together a case, Mr. Dayanim added, investigators would have to first show records were accessed without proper authorization. Then, they would have to determine how much knowledge each of the parties had that a crime was taking place. H-P might argue that it wasn't aware of what activities were conducted by the private investigators.

The investigators could be asked to cooperate in showing the company was aware of the tactics, in exchange for lighter prosecution, he said. "This isn't a complex case," Mr. Dayanim said. "It will be a matter of proving what was done."

The Securities and Exchange Commission has asked H-P about a disclosure in May regarding Mr. Perkins's resignation. H-P didn't disclose a reason for the resignation, and has said it believes its disclosures about the matter were appropriate. Mr. Perkins has raised questions about that assertion, in view of the fact that he had disagreements with Ms. Dunn and resigned in connection with the investigation.

Mr. Perkins has disclosed that he asked federal prosecutors to look into the probe's tactics, and approached the FTC and FCC. The FCC on Thursday asked AT&T Inc., one of the phone carriers involved in the investigation, about possible improprieties linked to H-P's probe, a person familiar with the matter said.

Meanwhile, House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Rep. Joe Barton (R., Texas) and Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), the panel's senior Democrat, asked Ms. Dunn to identify firms or people hired to obtain directors' and journalists' phone records. "The committee is troubled by this information, particularly given that it involves H-P -- one of America's corporate icons -- using pretexting and data brokers to procure the personal telephone records of the members of its board of directors and of other individuals without their knowledge or consent," the letter said.

House Panel And U.S. Attorney Join H.P. Inquiry (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 11 — As its directors continued to confer on the future of its chairwoman, Hewlett-Packard found itself under increased legal and political scrutiny Monday over the use of private investigators to trace the source of news leaks in the board.

The United States attorney's office in San Francisco said it was looking into the methods used by the investigators, which included the questionable if not illegal tactic of "pretexting" — posing as directors and journalists to get their phone records.

The House Committee on Energy and Commerce, meanwhile, asked the company to identify the consulting firm it hired for the investigation, the subcontractor that carried out the ruses and all of the targets. It also demanded copies of contracts and legal opinions in the matter.

The company's board, which met inconclusively on Sunday, resumed telephone consultations Monday afternoon. Foremost among the topics was the role of the chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, who the company says first authorized the investigation last year.

Ms. Dunn recused herself from parts of the discussion, according to a person with knowledge of the board's deliberations, leaving the company's outside counsel, Larry W. Sonsini, chairman of the powerhouse Silicon Valley law firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, to preside.

Mr. Sonsini and his firm were consulted at various points in the investigation, according to the company. As a result, his role at the board meeting was "an odd choice," said Jeffrey A. Sonnenfeld, a professor at the Yale School of Management who advises companies on corporate governance. "They have a highly conflicted law firm right now," he said.

Hewlett-Packard spokesmen would not comment on the board's deliberations, and Mr. Sonsini has not responded to requests for comment since the upheaval at the company became public last week.

Over the weekend, in a reflection of the high stakes, Ms. Dunn brought in Sitrick & Company, a well-known and tenacious public relations firm specializing in crisis management, to represent her and the company. Michael S. Sitrick, the firm's chairman and chief executive, has represented a number of high-profile clients, including the supermarket billionaire Ronald W. Burkle when a contributor to The New York Post was accused of trying to extort money from him.

One reason for the board's extended talks was reported to be discussion of Thomas J. Perkins, who quit the board in May in anger at Ms. Dunn over the internal investigation. A person with knowledge of the board's deliberations said that Mr. Perkins, a pre-eminent Silicon Valley venture capitalist, sought to return to the board but that members are split on whether he should.

Mr. Perkins's spokesman, Mark Corallo, disputed that report. "Mr. Perkins will not return to the H.P. board, even if asked," Mr. Corallo said, but "he believes in the performance and prospects of the company under the leadership of Mark Hurd."

While Mr. Perkins has been an ally of Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive — Mr. Perkins, like Mr. Hurd, sees H.P. as a growth company — his public airing of his problems with Ms. Dunn has injured the company's image. (Hewlett-Packard's stock, though, has been relatively unscathed since the furor became public last week. It closed up slightly Monday at $36.36.)

Mr. Perkins's insistence that the company acknowledge his reason for resigning in May — and his disclosure of what he had learned about the investigative tactics — led to the current upheaval. He and his lawyer presented information to the federal authorities at the same time that they sent information to the California attorney general and the Securities and Exchange Commission, both of which have indicated they are already conducting inquiries.

Corporate governance experts are split over whether the board should ask Ms. Dunn to step down.

"This is one of the biggest corporate blunders in the past 10 years," said Charles M. Elson, director of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "To get this far off tells you that something was wrong with the board."

Mr. Sonnenfeld said the directors would be wise to keep the board's chairmanship separate from the chief executive position, if only because the chairman can "take the bullets" that might otherwise hit the chief executive. "It keeps Mark Hurd above the fray," Mr. Sonnenfeld said.

Removing Ms. Dunn, he said, will not make the problems go away, but will just shift the focus to Mr. Hurd, who sits on the board. "I wouldn't think he'd want to be in the chair right now," he said.

A big part of the company's problem is that it has been unwilling to speak out. Joseph A. Grundfest, a professor of law and business at Stanford Law School, said the company should be saying two things.

First, it needs to say that pretexting is wrong. "There hasn't been a clear, unambiguous message," he said. Saying that would allow the company to shift the terms of the debate, he said.

"Dunn was also pretexted," he said. "She was as much a victim."

He also said the focus should be on the leaker, George A. Keyworth II, a long-serving board member who was asked to resign but has refused. "This verges on the preposterous," Mr. Grundfest said, adding that he thought the company should even take legal action against him.

"Mr. Keyworth has said, 'You can't trust me, but share confidential company information with me,' " Mr. Grundfest said.

Another public battle may not be the most appealing prospect, but Ralph D. Ward, the publisher of Boardroom Insider, an online magazine on corporate governance, suggested that an outside panel was needed to evaluate the board. "Not Larry Sonsini," he said. "He seems to have been part of the problem."

The panel, composed of governance experts, might help to establish the board's credibility and independence, Mr. Ward said.

Feds Scrutinize HP Probe Of Leaks (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 12, 2006

A congressional committee and several federal agencies are investigating whether Hewlett-Packard illegally obtained phone records of board members and journalists.

HP's board met late Monday to discuss the growing scandal, which stems from an earlier attempt to find out which board member was leaking company information to the press. The internal issue attracted regulatory attention after HP said it hired detectives who pretended to be other people to get their confidential records.

That technique, called "pretexting," falls in a legal gray area but has regulators concerned. HP says it is cooperating with officials.

In a five-page letter Monday to HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, the House Energy and Commerce Committee said it was "troubled" by reports of pretexting.

The letter, signed by two Republicans and two Democrats, asks HP for the names of everyone involved and other data.

The FBI has begun a preliminary inquiry, agency spokeswoman LaRae Quy confirmed Monday. The agency's focus has not been determined, but it could include computer and wire fraud, she said.

The Justice Department has asked HP for information "similar to that sought" by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, who has launched a criminal inquiry.

HP disclosed the department's interest Monday in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing.

The Federal Communications Commission sent a letter to AT&T on Thursday requesting information about phone records that HP may have obtained.

The scandal dates to early 2005, when HP's board was clashing with then-CEO Carly Fiorina. Leaks to the press became a problem, so Fiorina ordered an investigation.

After Fiorina was ousted, Dunn hired a detective firm to continue the search. HP now says the firm used pretexting to obtain the phone records of nine reporters. Former board member Tom Perkins says his phone records were also obtained via pretexting.

Equity analyst Charles Wolf at Needham & Co. says the problems started with the controversial 2002 acquisition of Compaq Computer, which sparked a shareholder revolt and boardroom battle.

Dunn, 53, may have to leave to quell the current flap, Wolf says. Although the scandal is a distraction for CEO Mark Hurd, he should be relatively unaffected because it began before he joined HP in April 2005, says tech analyst Martin Reynolds at researcher Gartner.

HP's stock closed up 27 cents at $36.36 Monday. Equity analyst Bill Fearnley Jr. at FTN Midwest Securities says investors are focused on Hurd's leadership.

Federal Prosecutors Ask For Info On HP Probe; Board Ponders Dunn's Fate (LAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, The Associated Press

AP, September 12, 2006

Federal investigators stepped into the fray surrounding Hewlett-Packard Co.'s possibly illegal investigation of media leaks, as the company's board planned to meet again to discuss the fate of embattled Chairwoman Patricia Dunn.

HP revealed in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing Monday it had been "informally contacted" by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California concerning the company's methods for rooting out who was giving confidential company information to journalists.

The Palo Alto-based maker of computers and printers said it is cooperating fully with the federal inquiry, along with an investigation by the California state attorney general's office, which requested similar information. An HP spokesman had no further comment.

Hewlett-Packard's board adjourned an emergency phone conference Sunday without announcing whether it would oust Dunn for her role in the investigation that may have used illegal means to spy on colleagues and journalists. The board was scheduled to reconvene late Monday afternoon.

Dunn's resignation now seems likely, said Roger Kay, who follows HP as president of Endpoint Technologies Associates, a market research firm. "The right thing to do now is for her to step down, clear the air and let the company carry on," he said.

Dunn, a former freelance journalist who has become one of the most powerful women in corporate America, ordered the outside investigation of fellow board members to determine who anonymously leaked information, especially as it related to the job status of former chief executive Carly Fiorina.

HP hired private investigators who used Social Security numbers and other personal information to impersonate HP directors and journalists. The impostors then tricked phone companies into turning over detailed logs of their home and cellular phone calls.

Although a common tactic among private investigators, the subterfuge -- known as "pretexting" -- tests the bounds of California law.

California's attorney general has said the investigation violated two state laws related to identity theft and illegal access to computer records. It's still unclear, however, whether the company or anyone acting on its behalf will face civil or criminal charges.

A spokesman for Attorney General Bill Lockyer had no comment Monday on the involvement of the U.S. Attorney.

A federal investigation further complicates the situation for HP, experts said.

"It opens the company to more scrutiny on a broader and more powerful level," said Ken Sukhia, a former U.S. Attorney in Tallahassee, Fla.

Martin Reynolds, vice president of the research firm Gartner Inc., said it may be more likely that criminal charges are filed against the private investigator, rather than Dunn or another HP board member. The company has not revealed the name of the investigator it used.

That may be one reason investors have largely ignored the scandal. HP shares rose 27 cents Monday to close at $36.36 on the New York Stock Exchange, near the top end of its 52-week range of $25.53 to $36.73.

"It's a good thing they're not trying to close a difficult merger or negotiate for a new CEO right now," Reynolds said. "But the business of HP and the leadership there is strong enough that this is just not an issue. It's certainly embarrassing, and it's obviously not the best press, but the good news is this is pretty much divorced from the day-to-day operations of HP."

The Federal Communications Commission has also taken interest in the HP investigation, asking AT&T Inc. last week how the company's private investigators managed to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists.

Following the investigation, board member George Keyworth II was identified as the source of the leak, and HP responded by barring him from seeking re-election.

Another HP director, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, resigned from the board in May in protest of the investigators' tactics.

Perkins this weekend called on Dunn to resign.

Dunn told The Associated Press last week she would resign if asked, but said several fellow board members had urged her to remain on the job despite the criminal investigation. She also said the media leaks were an "egregious breach" of the company's standards and that the board of directors fully backed an investigation to root out the source.

The nine reporters whose phone records were compromised are Pui-Wing Tam and George Anders of The Wall Street Journal; Peter Burrows, Ben Elgin and Roger Crockett of BusinessWeek; John Markoff of The New York Times; and Dawn Kawamoto, Tom Krazit and Stephen Shankland of CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com.

Investigators hired by HP also targeted Thomas Shankland, a semiretired geophysicist in Los Alamos, N.M., who is Stephen Shankland's father. The younger Shankland is married to Associated Press reporter Rachel Konrad, who has also covered HP.

Keyworth, the board member who will not be re-nominated, was the former science adviser to President Reagan and director of the Physics Division at Los Alamos National Laboratory, which he joined in 1968. Keyworth has acknowledged leaking information to reporters.

Hewlett-Packard Says Justice Department Joins Probe (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo And Ian King

Bloomberg, September 12, 2006

Sept. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co., the world's second-largest personal-computer maker, said the U.S. Justice Department joined a probe into whether the company broke the law in its investigation of news leaks by directors.

The U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California is looking at the use of fake identities by private investigators to obtain phone records of board members and nine journalists, Hewlett-Packard said in filing today. A U.S. House committee also requested information, and the Federal Communications Commission has asked AT&T Inc. about its involvement in the matter.

The new inquiries add pressure on Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who authorized the probe that California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has already said may result in criminal charges. Hewlett- Packard's board is meeting today for a second day to discuss the scandal and consider calls by former director and venture capitalist Tom Perkins for Dunn's resignation.

``There's no way to spin this from a positive viewpoint," said Chuck Jones, an analyst at Atlantic Trust Stein Roe in San Francisco, which manages $16 billion in assets including Hewlett- Packard's shares. He also owns the shares personally. The problems probably won't affect Hewlett-Packard's earnings performance, he said.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard, which ranks second to Dell Inc. in PC revenue, rose 27 cents to $36.36 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. The stock has gained 27 percent this year.

The company won't provide additional details about the Justice Department inquiry, said Hewlett-Packard spokesman Ryan Donovan.

More Inquiries

The U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee asked Dunn in a letter today to turn over information related to how Hewlett- Packard obtained private phone records. Also today, an FCC official confirmed the commission is seeking information from San Antonio-based AT&T related to Hewlett-Packard's investigation.

Michael Balmoris, an AT&T spokesman, said the company is working with law enforcement officials to catch those who fraudulently obtain access to customer information.

Dunn, 53, ordered the investigations beginning last year in an effort to find out who leaked news about company strategy and the ouster of former Chief Executive Officer Carly Fiorina.

After meeting for ``several hours" yesterday, the board will convene again this afternoon, Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard said yesterday.

`Sharp Conflict'

``This strongly suggests there is sharp conflict among board members and uncertainty as to next steps," said James Post, a professor at Boston University School of Management. ``Some of those directors know she has to go."

Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd, addressing employees on Sept. 8, said the board has a ``long history" of leaking information that needs to be resolved. In an interview earlier that day, Dunn acknowledged that ``there were things not done particularly well, including by me, and certainly not intentionally" as part of a yearlong external probe.

Fiorina, Hurd's predecessor, began an internal review into the source of board leaks in the weeks before her February 2005 ouster after stories about board deliberations appeared in publications including the Wall Street Journal. The internal review failed to yield the source of the leaks, prompting Dunn to initiate an outside investigation in mid-2005.

Outside Counsel

After reviewing private records, Dunn confronted longtime director George Keyworth at the board's May 18 meeting. He admitted to divulging information, was asked to resign and declined. His friend, Perkins, co-founder of venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, objected to the way the investigation was handled and resigned.

Perkins, who quit in May because of the probe, later demanded that a review be conducted into how outside investigators obtained directors' phone records. Perkins was assured by Hewlett-Packard outside counsel Larry Sonsini in a June 28 e-mail that the probe was ``well done and within legal limits."

``I acted not from any ill will toward Ms. Dunn but to protect the best interests of H-P," Perkins said in an e-mailed statement. Perkins's questioning of tactics used in the probe led to Hewlett-Packard's disclosure of possible illegal activity last week. ``The past months and days have shown that those interests are best served if Ms. Dunn would resign from the board."

`Tarnished Image'

Upon further review, Sonsini, of Palo Alto-based Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, couldn't confirm that the investigation complied ``in all respects" with the law. Hewlett- Packard detailed the investigation in a Sept. 6 regulatory filing before learning that reporters' phone records had also been accessed as part of the probe.

``The board needs to get together and repair its terribly tarnished image," said David Beim, professor of finance at Columbia University, in an interview last week. He said Dunn's resignation is one of the options the board has to consider.

Dunn, who is also vice chairwoman of Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco, said on Sept. 8 that she feels she has the confidence of directors and trusts their judgment. She said she would resign if asked by the board.

Privacy Piracy (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Just how easy is it for people to obtain your private telephone records? The scandal at Hewlett-Packard provides a stark and troubling answer.

The computer-maker is in turmoil over Chairwoman Patricia Dunn's use of private investigators to find which of her fellow board members leaked company information to the press. Those investigators found the leaker simply by asking phone companies for the personal calling records of board members and certain reporters.

Dunn denies any advance knowledge of the specific tactic used by the investigators — an unsavory practice known as “pretexting” in which investigators misrepresent themselves as the people whose records are being sought. Even so, a savvy executive should know that hiring people to plug leaks is fraught with peril, as Richard Nixon discovered after he set up his “plumbers” unit.

This unseemly saga is particularly disturbing because HP is one of the nation's most admired companies, one of 30 that make up the Dow Jones Industrial Average. It cannot inspire confidence when the board chairwoman is spying on her own directors.

Aside from exposing dysfunction in the HP boardroom, the episode illustrates just how loose phone companies are with customers' records.

Despite its obvious deceit, however, pretexting might not violate federal law if is not used for identity theft. California, where HP is based, has more stringent laws, and authorities there are investigating whether any of them were broken.

If nothing else, the events at HP should put pressure on telephone companies to make it harder to get sensitive data. They should adopt restrictions that would keep private records out of the hands of unscrupulous poseurs, such as requiring passwords and mailing records only to the customers' listed addresses.

A federal response might be in order as well, both to set standards for releasing sensitive data and to crack down on the pernicious practice of pretexting, which some Internet companies have turned into a for-profit business model.

Perhaps then, people would feel more secure. And perhaps companies like HP would focus more on their customers, and less on themselves.

Dell Delays Briefing, Filing Profit Report As Woes Mount (USAT)

By Byron Acohido

USA Today, September 12, 2006

SEATTLE — Amid rising uncertainty about its strategic course, Dell on Monday delayed filing its quarterly report and postponed a high-profile analysts briefing for the second time in six months.

The No. 1 PC maker also put its stock-repurchase program on hold and noted that the Justice Department has joined the Securities and Exchange Commission in examining its accounting practices. In a statement with few details, Chairman Michael Dell vowed to make things right.

"We will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," Dell said.

Federal regulators are examining whether Dell misstated financial reports "including issues relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items," Dell said. Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of New York has requested to review accounting documents from 2002 to the present.

The Round Rock, Texas-based PC maker's shares dipped 5% on the news, but recovered to close at $21.19, down 2%. Dell disclosed the SEC investigation last month, and has started a parallel internal audit.

Many company watchers were anticipating details about a turnaround strategy at Wednesday's postponed briefing, which was initially pushed back from April. The briefing has not been rescheduled.

"We're in a vacuum here," said Brent Bracelin, senior research analyst at Pacific Crest Securities.

Analysts had been eager to question Dell about last quarter's disappointing results, which included lower-than-expected net income and reports that rival Hewlett-Packard was gaining share. Some analysts viewed that as a low point for Dell, but Bracelin says the company's fortunes could continue to fall.

Dell raced past rivals like HP, Compaq and Gateway in the 1990s. But growth has slowed and profits are under pressure. Senior executives say they've had problems estimating demand and may have lowered prices too much. Critics point to a string of missteps, combined with a dose of bad luck, including:

•Laptop lag. Rival HP has gained ground thanks partly to a hot consumer laptop market, in which buyers prefer to see and hold the product before buying; Dell sells mainly online.

•Poor service. Dell officials will spend $150 million in the current fiscal year on initiatives to shed its reputation for ignoring complaints.

•Bad batteries. Dell was recently forced to recall 4.1 million laptop batteries because they can overheat and cause fires.

Richard Farmer, analyst at Merrill Lynch, called Dell's announcement "an additional overhang for the stock."

Expanding Investigations Increase The Heat On Dell (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The hole for Dell Inc. seems to keep getting deeper.

The computer maker said it would delay filing its fiscal second-quarter report because of a widening Securities and Exchange Commission investigation and its own probe into its financial accounting. Dell also said it has been subpoenaed by the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York over its financial reporting.

The news increases the spotlight on Dell's reporting methods and could spell more trouble for chief executive Kevin Rollins.

When Dell disclosed the SEC investigation in August, the Round Rock, Texas, company said it didn't think the investigation would materially affect its financials; now Dell isn't ruling out needing to restate prior results. The subpoenas from the U.S. attorney, which has requested documents related to Dell's financial reporting from 2002 to the present, hadn't previously been disclosed.

Dell was also forced to take two other embarrassing steps yesterday.

It suspended its share-buyback program until further notice. The company spent $7.2 billion to repurchase 204 million shares in fiscal year 2006, which ended in February. In addition, Dell canceled its financial-analysts' day for the second time this year; the meeting with Wall Street analysts was to have taken place in New York tomorrow.

Yesterday, Dell shares slid 2.1%, down 46 cents to $21.19 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Dell shares have declined by nearly 30% this year.

Analysts said the investigations, along with the company's plunging stock price, increase the pressure on Dell's management, in particular Mr. Rollins and chief financial officer Jim Schneider. Questions may also arise for Dell's independent auditing firm PricewaterhouseCoopers LLC.

"A big part of this is it further undermines management credibility, which is already very low," said Toni Sacconaghi, analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. "Certainly the finger is going to be pointed most squarely at Kevin Rollins and CFO Jim Schneider."

Founder Michael Dell, who remains Dell's chairman, said in a statement that the company was cooperating with the investigators.

"We will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," he said in the statement. The company declined to make any further comment.

The intensifying investigations are the latest setbacks for Dell.

Over the past year, Dell -- the world's largest personal-computer maker measured by units shipped -- has seen its sales and profits slow and competition ramp up from rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co. The company also announced a battery recall, involving millions of laptops, last month, because of a potential fire hazard.

Dell was already being investigated by the SEC for the timing with which it recorded its revenue. Yesterday, Dell said in a statement that the investigations indicated potential issues "relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items." The company said it is working with its audit committee and independent auditors to determine whether it has to restate its prior results.

Companies use accruals and reserves when they sell services but deliver them at a later date. In Dell's case, the company typically sets aside funds from current operations to cover the cost of future warranty claims.

Dell said that in responding to the SEC in mid-August, it discovered information that "raises potential issues" related to the fiscal years before 2006. Dell management then recommended that its board audit committee investigate the matter, according to the statement.

"We have not yet reached any conclusion on materiality as to these issues," said Don Carty, a Dell director who is chairman of the audit committee, in the statement. "We are continuing to investigate the matter fully." The other members of Dell's audit committee are William H. Gray III, former president and chief executive of the United Negro College Fund, and Sam Nunn, a former Georgia senator who is now CEO of the Nuclear Threat Initiative.

While Dell declined to give any other details of its possible financial misstatements, accounting experts said the company could potentially have engaged in "cookie-jar reserves," which have also been seen at Xerox Corp. and Sunbeam Corp.

When using "cookie-jar reserves," a company is in effect creating a rainy day fund by setting up excess provisions on its balance sheet for future expenses that it doesn't truly expect to incur. It can then dip into the jar in leaner times to create the appearance of profit.

In a report in November, accounting expert Albert Meyer, then at research firm 2nd Opinion Research, wrote that he found one "cookie-jar reserve" that Dell created following its fiscal 2005 results. In that instance, Dell repatriated $4.1 billion in foreign earnings in its fiscal 2005.

The repatriation tax charge is 5.25%, meaning the tax provision Dell should have taken would have amounted to $215 million.

Instead, Mr. Meyer said in his report, the company accrued $280 million, resulting in a $65 million "cookie jar." Such a tactic could have added 5% to Dell's earnings-per-share growth rate in fiscal 2006, Mr. Meyer calculated.

"They overaccrued," Mr. Meyer -- now president of money-management firm Bastiat Capital in Plano, Texas -- said in an interview. In his report, he wrote that such a tactic "smells."

While most of the current attention at Dell is on Mr. Rollins, Mr. Dell, who founded Dell out of his University of Texas dorm room in 1984, isn't escaping notice either. In asking for documents going back to 2002, the U.S. attorney's office is scrutinizing a period when Mr. Dell was CEO of the firm. Mr. Rollins was appointed Dell CEO in 2004.

Shannon Cross, analyst with Cross Research, said the news would add "a layer of uncertainty" to the stock, making it harder for investors to buy into Dell.

"I think there are a number of changes that need to be made at Dell, and we need to get a good idea of what the strategy is on an ongoing basis," she said.

Dell's Quarterly Report Is Delayed As Probe Widens (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, September 12, 2006

Dell Inc., the world's largest personal-computer maker, delayed filing its quarterly report and said the U.S. Justice Department had joined the Securities and Exchange Commission in investigating the company's accounting.

The announcement prompted Dell to postpone an analysts meeting Wednesday, where it had planned to present its strategy to revive earnings.

Dell hasn't determined whether it will need to restate results but is suspending a stock buyback program, the Round Rock, Texas-based company said in a statement Monday.

The investigations by the SEC and the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York may sidetrack efforts by Chief Executive Kevin Rollins for a turnaround. Dell missed profit forecasts for two straight quarters, announced the recall of 4.1 million notebook batteries and is struggling to improve customer service after losing orders to Hewlett-Packard Co.

"Confidence in Dell is shaken," said Nirav Parikh, an analyst with Los Angeles-based TCW Group Inc., which holds more than 25.8 million Dell shares. "The company is having to restrategize with a lot going on in the marketplace, and it seems it's having difficulty doing that."

Dell said the investigations indicate possible errors related to so-called accruals and reserves -- estimates of future company obligations -- reported in previous financial statements. The company said last month that the SEC started requesting information in August 2005 relating to revenue recognition.

Shares of Dell dropped 46 cents, or 2 percent, to $21.19 in Nasdaq Stock Market trading.

"We will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," Chairman Michael Dell said in Monday's statement.

The company hasn't reached any conclusion as to how material the issues are. In August, Dell said its own review of accounting found some "potential issues" that are unlikely to have a "material impact" on finances.

The SEC's investigation undermines management's "already fragile credibility," Toni Sacconaghi, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York, said in a note Monday.

"Dell's senior management team has been under fire over the last six-plus quarters," said Sacconaghi, the top-ranked computer analyst by Institutional Investor magazine. Monday's "disclosures that the company also appears to have been remiss in understanding its own financial controls is likely to further unnerve investors."

Analysts also raised concerns about the delay of Dell's financial day, which already had been postponed from April. It will be rescheduled to a later date, Dell said Monday. The company still plans a meeting with reporters today, which will be held by Michael Dell and Rollins.

"Dell pushing out the analyst day meeting from April 2006 initially and now again suggests, in our view, that Dell has yet to finalize a strategy to reaccelerate growth and/or improve margins," said Brent Bracelin, an analyst at Pacific Crest Securities in Portland, Ore.

The U.S. attorney requested documents related to the company's financial reporting dating back to 2002, Dell said. The company said it plans to file its latest report as soon as possible and it is cooperating with the investigations.

Heather Tasker, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, and John Nester, an SEC spokesman, declined to comment. Dell isn't commenting beyond the statement, said Bob Pearson, a company spokesman.

David Nestor, a spokesman for Dell's auditor, New York-based PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, said the firm's policy is not to comment on client matters.

Dell Delays Quarterly Report Due To Accounting Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Slagle, Ap Technology Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

(AP) - DALLAS-Dell Inc. has delayed filing its fiscal second-quarter financial report and suspended its share repurchase program because of an ongoing federal accounting probe. It was the latest in a series of setbacks for the world's largest PC maker.

The Round Rock, Texas, company said it could not file the quarterly report because of "questions raised" by an informal Securities and Exchange Commission investigation into accounting issues and a subsequent internal probe.

The company also said the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York had subpoenaed documents related to its financial reporting from 2002 to the present.

In a statement, Dell said investigations have shown that the company may have misstated prior financial reports, including issues relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items, which may affect previously reported financial results.

Dell shares dropped 16 cents to $21.49 in afternoon trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market. That is near the lower end of their 52-week range of $18.95 to $35.25 and is down 28 percent since the end of 2005.

Dell said it has not yet determined the material impact of any of the accounting issues.

"We are fully cooperating with the investigations and working to resolve any and all issues raised in connection with those investigations as quickly as possible, and we will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," Chairman Michael Dell said in a statement.

The company said it plans to file the second-quarter report as soon as possible but didn't offer a more specific timetable. Third-quarter earnings are scheduled to be posted Nov. 16.

It's believed to be the first time Dell has ever missed a quarterly filing, said spokesman Bob Pearson, who declined to comment beyond what was in the news release.

"This particular news couldn't come at a worse time for Dell given all of the problem," said Tim Bajarin, analyst with Creative Strategies.

Dell grew to prominence on a patented, direct-sales model to consumers and businesses but has been rattled in recent months as it revamps its customer service programs and deals with fierce competition from rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co.

Dell first disclosed the accounting probe in last month's quarterly report, in which revenues plummeted 51 percent.

At the time, Dell officials played down its significance and said they didn't expect it to have any material impact on the company's bottom line.

Also last month, Dell issued a voluntary recall of 4.1 million potentially flammable laptop batteries made by Sony Corp.

Dell also postponed its annual analysts meeting planned for Wednesday in New York. The company will host two Web conferences with Dell and Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins to provide a company update and show new products.

Justice Said To Drop Criminal Investigation Of Freddie Mac (WP)

By Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

After laying dormant for two years, the Justice Department's criminal probe into accounting transgressions at Freddie Mac is apparently over, according to company officials.

"The U.S. attorney's office has not initiated contact with us in well over two years, and it is our understanding that the matter is inactive," said David R. Palombi, a spokesman for the McLean-based mortgage finance company. "Accordingly, we expect no further action in this matter."

The inactivity at the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria also extends to investigations of several former Freddie Mac executives, including chief executive Leland C. Brendsel, president David Glenn and chief financial officer Vaughn A. Clarke.

Sources familiar with the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they did not want to be seen as speaking for the department, said lawyers for the ousted officials have not been contacted by the Justice Department since 2004.

Palombi's statements appear to resolve one of the final issues that have been dogging the company since its accounting problems became public in 2003.

In 2003, Freddie Mac admitted it had improperly managed its earnings through a series of transactions that smoothed out earnings growth. The company reduced its reported earnings by $5 billion between 2000 and 2003, hoping to defer those earnings to later years.

Freddie Mac is still working to produce an up-to-date and accurate set of books. But the company has cleared itself of most of the liability from the matter in the past three years. It has paid a $125 million fine to federal regulators, more than $400 million in shareholder lawsuit settlements, and $3.8 million in civil fines to settle Federal Election Commission charges of improper political fundraising.

But the possibility of a criminal action remained. In recent weeks, the company sought clarification from the Justice Department over whether its long silence meant the case was closed -- particularly after the department issued a statement in August that it had closed its criminal investigation of similar accounting problems at Freddie Mac rival Fannie Mae.

"It is Freddie Mac's understanding that it is the practice of the U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of Virginia neither to issue official notices nor to confirm publicly the conclusion of an investigation," Palombi said.

A spokesman for Chuck Rosenberg, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia said only: "We cannot comment on that issue."

The lack of federal interest in bringing a criminal case is no surprise. Experts on white-collar crime say prosecutions of accounting malfeasance are notoriously difficult and risky, given the complexity of the issues. In Freddie's case, there is the added issue that the company understated, rather than inflated, its earnings.

Brendsel's attorney, Brendan V. Sullivan, and Clarke's attorney, Steven Salky, could not be reached for comment. Glenn's attorney, Thomas P. Vartanian, declined to comment.

The sources familiar with the investigation, however, said none of the attorneys expects further action by the Justice Department in the matter.

Editorial: White-collar Blues (FT)

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Corporate America has had a rough ride since Enron: between Eliot Spitzer, New York attorney-general, and the Sarbanes-Oxley act, US companies have paid a high price for their pre-Enron bad habits (not to mention the bad behaviour of others).

But corporate America's problems have come not only from the scourge of Albany, and the new regulatory burden imposed by Congress. The US Department of Justice has made white-collar crime (rightly) one of its top priorities. But in its zeal to catch corporate criminals, the DoJ has used some dubious tactics that arguably violate the US constitution and may even defeat the whole purpose of its corporate crime crusade - to create a new culture of compliance that encourages companies to do the right thing without having to be prosecuted.

Later today, the powerful Senate judiciary committee will open its own inquiry into the department's hardball tactics, particularly the practice of forcing companies to waive the privilege that normally protects communications with lawyers - including those between whistle-blowers and in-house lawyers. Businessmen have been complaining about this practice for years: they say they cannot risk talking to their lawyers - even to find out how to obey the law - if the DoJ has the power to use that information against them. Last week, a group of top former justice department officials wrote to Alberto Gonzales, the attorney-general, to say the same thing. The group included former attorneys-general with impeccable tough-on-crime credentials, and its criticisms will be hard to ignore.

The crux of the problem is a 2003 policy (known as the "Thompson memorandum") that says prosecutors should decide whether to indict a company partly based on the company's co-operation with the government; and the best way to prove co-operation is to waive attorney-client privilege, and give the government all the information it needs to make its case. Companies have little choice but to turn over the information: an indictment is tantamount to a death sentence.

This is the wrong way to fight corporate crime. Companies need legal advice to be able to obey complex laws; if they cannot get it - without the risk that what they say will be revealed to the government - they may not try to obey the law at all.

Even worse, the tactic defeats a larger purpose: it discourages insiders from reporting wrongdoing, for fear their information may land them in jail - and without that information companies cannot police themselves and catch wrongdoing before it goes too far. The bar, the courts, the business community and now the lawmakers are telling the prosecutors that they are abusing the remarkable power of their office.

The DoJ should rewrite its policy on waiver of attorney-client privilege - before Congress does so for it.

Grasso Seeks New Judge For Trial (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK -- Former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso is seeking a new judge for his pending trial on civil charges brought by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer.

Mr. Grasso's lawyers last week filed a motion to have the case reassigned to a new judge. New York Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos has been handling the pretrial stage of the case and is set to preside over a trial that may start as soon as October.

Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Mr. Grasso alleges that his $187.5 million pay package was excessive for the head of a New York not-for-profit company, which the NYSE was before it went public in March as NYSE Group Inc.

Lawyers for Mr. Grasso at Williams & Connolly LLP filed papers arguing for a new judge on the grounds Justice Ramos held settlement discussions with the parties in which he made statements that could be interpreted as "impairing Mr. Grasso's right" to a fair trial. The filing also stated that -- before the case was filed -- Justice Ramos twice unsuccessfully approached the Big Board to be considered for a board seat.

Gerson Zweifach, a lawyer for Mr. Grasso, declined to comment. A spokesman for Mr. Spitzer's office called the motion "a delaying tactic" designed "to put off a trial."

Mr. Grasso's lawyers also have appealed Justice Ramos's ruling that certain parts of the case be decided at a bench trial instead of before a jury.

Pathmark loss bigger than expected Supermarket chain Pathmark Stores had wider-than-expected losses for its second quarter, in which the grocer had flat sales and increased expenses.

The company based in Carteret lost $8.8 million, or 17 cents a share, for the quarter ended July 29, compared with a loss of $5.1 million, or 12 cents a share, in the year-ago period. Analysts had been expecting a loss of 12 cents a share, according to Thomson Financial.

Sales increased 0.2 percent, to $1 billion, while sales at stores open at least a year increased 0.5 percent. Pathmark said its results were affected by lower gross mar gins at its pharmacy related to Medicare Part D, and higher costs for utilities, workers' compensation, medical and pension bills.

However, Pathmark did benefit from $3.2 million in gift cards that were sold but never redeemed. Additionally, Chief Executive John Standley said merchandising initiatives are connecting with consumers.

Execs accused in bribe Two former executives of a Princeton international telecom munications company approved more than $250,000 in bribes to officials in several African nations, se curities regulators charged in a lawsuit filed yesterday.

The actions of the men, Steven Ott of Princeton and Roger Michael Young of London, while at ITXC violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, the Securities and Exchange Commission charged in the complaint filed in federal court in Trenton. Ott, vice president for global sales, and Young, managing director of the Middle East and Africa, approved $267,468 in bribes to phone company officials in Nigeria, Rwanda and Senegal between 2001 and 2004, the lawsuit alleged.

In exchange, the once publicy traded ITXC landed contracts that earned the company $11.5 million in profits, the SEC said. In 2004, ITXC merged with Teleglobe International Holdings, which was ac quired in February by Videsh San char Nigam.

The men's attorneys both declined to comment, saying they had not seen the complaint.

Last year, ITXC salesman Yaw Osei Amoako was indicted on federal criminal charges related to the alleged bribes.

Standard promotions American Standard named Dale Elliott, the former chief executive of Snap-on Tools, as president of its $2.4 billion global bath and kitchen products business. The Piscataway company also named regional presidents Donald Devine for the Americas and Richard Ward for Asia. In May, John Rietveldt was named president for Europe; all three report to Elliott.

Devine had been president of Jacuzzi Brands, while Rietveldt re cently joined the company from Tarkett, a flooring company. Ward came to American Standards in 2003 from Dell Computer where he was general manager for China.

Utility merger progress Public Service Enterprise Group and Exelon have not made a lot of headway in reaching an agreement with the state of New Jersey to win approval of their $18 billion merger.

"There is a meaningful gap" between what the companies have offered and the state has proposed, Thomas O'Flynn, chief financial officer and executive vice president for Public Service told analysts at a Lehman Bros. energy conference in New York City yesterday.

The deal has won all of the necessary regulatory approvals except from the state Board of Public Utilities which has sought to squeeze more money and other concessions from the two companies than their "last and best" offer submitted last month. The company has offered a package amounting to about $600 million while the state is seeking roughly $820 million.

Neither O'Flynn nor John Young, Exelon's chief financial officer, offered any details on how the negotiations are proceeding al though the former said he agreed with comments made by Exelon in a filing which said the probability of the deal closing w as "no longer more likely than not."

SEC Charges 2 More Ex-ITXC Execs (HC)

By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires

Houston Chronicle, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday said it has filed civil charges against two more former employees of telecommunications company ITXC Corp.

The agency accuses them of approving and in some cases negotiating almost $267,500 in bribes paid to senior officials of government-owned telephone companies in Nigeria, Rwanda and Senegal.

The SEC accused Steven Ott, the former vice president for global sales, and Roger Michael Young, the former managing director for the Middle East and Africa, of violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. The SEC said the men also caused the company to falsely record the bribes as legitimate business expenses.

An attorney for Ott couldn't immediately be reached. An attorney for Young wasn't in the office and couldn't immediately return a phone call.

The civil suit came as Yaw Osei Amoako, a former ITXC regional manager, pleaded guilty in Trenton, N.J., to conspiring to violate the anti-bribery law in connection with payments of bribes to employees of foreign state-owned telecommunications companies. He faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 11, the Justice Department said. The SEC had filed a civil suit against Amoako last year.

ITXC was based in Princeton, N.J. In 2004, it was acquired by Teleglobe International Holdings Ltd., now part of Videsh Sanchar Nigam Ltd. ITXC allegedly earned $11.5 million in net profit thanks to the contracts approved by Ott and Young, the SEC said.

The Justice Department said it had charged Amoako and unnamed co-conspirators with arranging for ITXC to pay $166,000 in commissions to a foreign official at Nitel, a Nigerian government-owned company; $26,000 to Rwandatel, owned by the Rwandan government; and about $74,000 to an employee of Sonatel, partly owned by the Senegalese government.

An attorney for Amoako couldn't be located. Earlier this year, a federal judge put the SEC's case on hold until the resolution of the criminal case.

Capitol's New Bank Examiners (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Four years after enacting landmark corporate-governance laws, the men behind Sarbanes-Oxley are leaving Congress. The retirements of Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D., Md.) and Rep. Mike Oxley (R., Ohio) spell changes next year in the House and Senate committees that regulate Wall Street, banks and finance.

The new leaders of the banking panels will affect how Congress deals with issues such as whether hedge funds should be regulated, whether commercial banks should be allowed to enter the real-estate brokerage business and how the government should treat Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

The broader change will come in the House, which will see a new committee chairman regardless of whether Republicans or Democrats control the chamber after the November elections. On the other side of the Capitol, Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.) will succeed Mr. Sarbanes as the senior Democratic member of the Senate Banking Committee. Should Republicans, as expected, retain a majority in the Senate, the panel's chairman will remain Sen. Richard Shelby (R., Ala.), but the ranking member still influences the panel's agenda. Mr. Dodd is close to the securities and insurance industries, which have significant presences in his state.

Things are more complicated in the House, where as many as five lawmakers could win the top spot on the Financial Services panel. If Democrats win majority control in November, the liberal Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) would inherit the gavel. If Republicans keep their majority, a contest is shaping up between Reps. Spencer Bachus of Alabama and Richard Baker of Louisiana. Two other Republicans, David Dreier of California and Deborah Pryce of Ohio, have outside chances to succeed Mr. Oxley.

There has been no public airing of the qualities each member would bring to the post. It is considered bad form for lawmakers to talk publicly about campaigns for committee chairmanships, particularly before an election that could decide control of Congress.

"The chairmanship of the committee will not be scheduled for a vote until after the election of the next Congress," Mr. Bachus said in a statement. "Until that time, my focus will be on legislative duties and maintaining our majority."

Republican committee chairmanships are doled out by a special panel made up of party leaders and representatives of different regions of the country. Committee members have no formula, but generally make decisions based on seniority, party loyalty, fund-raising, personality and effectiveness.

"The race for the [Financial Services] committee chairmanship will likely be the most closely contested of all the full committees," says Rick Lazio, a former Republican member of the panel who now works for J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. "Both candidates have their strengths and have had positions of leadership in the committee. It's still up in the air."

Mr. Baker, in his 10th term, is a former real-estate agent and broker who advocates overhauling Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, the two congressionally chartered companies that provide funding for home mortgages. More policy wonk than backslapper, he doesn't have many close friends among lawmakers, but wins praise for his knowledge of financial markets.

Mr. Bachus, a former attorney, has less seniority than Mr. Baker and would have scant chance of leapfrogging him but for his fund-raising abilities and political savvy. Earlier this year, Mr. Bachus backed Rep. John Boehner in his successful race for majority leader over Rep. Roy Blunt. He is a supporter of community banks and this year worked with Democrats on legislation to crack down on predatory lending.

Mr. Baker and Mr. Bachus split on a number of financial-services issues. Wells Fargo & Co., Wachovia Corp., Bank of America Corp. and other large banks could get a lift from Mr. Baker's plan to allow banks to compete with real-estate agents in the housing market.

Mr. Bachus opposes the idea and is backed by real-estate agents, who have donated almost $97,000 to him. That is twice as much as the industry has contributed to Mr. Baker, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group that tracks campaign-finance data.

The banking-committee fight is one of several contests to replace panel chairmen who are departing. Due to a combination of retirements and a six-year term limit on chairmanship tenures, Republicans must pick leaders for the Budget, Science, Transportation and Infrastructure, Judiciary, International Relations and Ways and Means committees.

Just a few races are competitive. Rep. Jim McCrery (R., La.), for example, is considered such a favorite to head the Ways and Means Committee that he has donated $10,000 to help his would-be rival Rep. Clay Shaw (R., Fla.) win a tight re-election campaign.

A Democratic takeover would produce wholesale changes at top committee posts. Among Democrats, seniority is a primary factor in determining committee chairmanships. Michigan Reps. John Conyers and John Dingell would take over the Judiciary Committee and Energy and Commerce panel, respectively. California Reps. Henry Waxman and George Miller would inherit the Government Reform Committee and the Education and Workforce panel. Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin would head the Appropriations Committee and Mr. Frank would climb to the helm of the Financial Services Committee.

The new Democratic chairmen would bring a more liberal agenda to Capitol Hill after 12 years of Republican control. Mr. Waxman has made it clear that he would use the Government Reform Committee's subpoena power to investigate the Bush administration. Mr. Miller and Mr. Obey likely would team up to try to increase spending on public education and teacher salaries.

If Mr. Frank became chairman of Financial Services he says his top priority would be creating more affordable housing. He says he already has spoken to Mr. Rangel at the tax-writing committee about lifting tax credits for low-income housing.

Mr. Frank also would like to curb predatory lending, investigate mortgage-pricing differences among minority groups and focus on consumer-protection issues.

Mr. Frank generally supported Mr. Oxley's legislation to overhaul Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Mr. Frank says he would continue to press for the legislation.

Mr. Frank says the biggest shift in priorities under his tenure would be in public housing. "We will want to get back into the business of building subsidized housing," Mr. Frank says.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Probe Of Veco, Lawmakers Led By Justice Dept. (ADN)

By Richard Mauer, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The federal influence-buying case that erupted with fury 10 days ago with searches of a half-dozen Alaska legislative offices is being managed independently of the Alaska U.S. Attorney's office, a U.S. Justice Department official said Monday.

“The whole office is recused,” Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said.

Instead, the wide-ranging investigation is being overseen by attorneys from the Justice Department’s Public Integrity Section in Washington, Sierra said.

The Public Integrity Section has about 25 attorneys, a team that often lives out of suitcases in pursuit of corruption cases as far away as Guam. They’ve prosecuted petty thefts by sheriff’s deputies, the massive frauds of Enron and the high-profile corruption case of Jack Abramoff.

Sierra wouldn't say why the Alaska office wasn't allowed to participate in the case or how many lawyers from Washington were assigned to it. But the case is even off-limits to Nelson Cohen, the new U.S. Attorney for Alaska who just arrived last month from Pittsburgh, he said.

Sierra said it's not unusual that the local U.S. Attorney's office will recuse itself from a sensitive corruption case and wall off its legal, public relations and even clerical staffs from the investigation and prosecutions. Sometimes one or two assistant U.S. attorneys might still be assigned to work with the Public Integrity attorneys, but Sierra said he didn't know if that was the case in Alaska.

FBI agents from Alaska are lead investigators, working the case alongside the prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section, said Eric Gonzalez, spokesman for the FBI in Alaska.

The investigation is being run out of the FBI building on East Sixth Avenue in downtown Anchorage.

If it's anything like the Enron case, Sierra said, the investigation has taken over a sizeable chunk of the FBI building.

Dozens of extra FBI agents were brought in from Outside to execute about two dozen search warrants when the first raids started at legislative offices and elsewhere on Aug. 31. After the initial round of searches and interviews, the Outside agents were sent home, Gonzalez said.

Authorities won't release any particulars, including how many FBI agents remain on the case, Gonzalez said. Other agencies also are involved, including the IRS.

While officials say little, the warrants target the relationships between legislators and the oil-field service and construction company Veco. The company, which has long been generous with campaign donations at the state and federal levels and lobbying in Juneau, has gone so far as to hire sitting legislators, including Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, the son of Alaska's powerful U.S. senator, Ted Stevens. In disclosures he was required to file as a legislator, Ben Stevens has reported that Veco paid him $252,000 over the last five years to serve as a consultant, including $57,000 in 2005. Neither Stevens nor Veco has described what he did for the money. Stevens is one of six lawmakers whose offices were searched Aug. 31.

Perhaps a year ago, the FBI began collecting campaign and other publicly available financial disclosure records on selected legislators, said Brooke Miles, executive director of the Alaska Public Offices Commission. As she remembers it, agents then came back at the beginning of this year for campaign reports and financial disclosure records on all legislators.

Created in 1976, the Public Integrity Section has a number of jurisdictions. It investigates election fraud, misconduct by federal judges, and corruption of elected officials.

U.S Attorney offices prosecute corruption cases, too. The Alaska office prosecuted a dozen officials, lobbyists and businessmen in a massive kickback scandal in the North Slope Borough in the 1980s. But the position of U.S. attorney is a political appointment headquartered in a local jurisdiction, so the Justice Department will sometimes assume control over cases involving powerful local figures.

"Public corruption cases tend to raise unique problems of public perception that are generally absent in more routine criminal cases," the Public Integrity Section wrote in its 2004 report to Congress, explaining why U.S. Attorney's offices are sometimes recused.

"An investigation of alleged corruption by a government official, whether at the federal, state, or local level, or someone associated with such officials, always has the potential to be high-profile, simply because its focus is on the conduct of a public official. In addition, these cases are often politically sensitive, because their ultimate targets tend to be politicians or government officials appointed by politicians. A successful public corruption prosecution requires both the appearance and the reality of fairness and impartiality."

Moses Got Campaign Cash From VECO Before Casting Deciding Vote (AP)

By Matt Volz, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

JUNEAU, Alaska (AP) - Days before an ailing Rep. Carl Moses flew from Anchorage to cast the deciding vote on a contentious oil and gas tax bill, six VECO Corp. executives contributed $3,000 to the Unalaska Democrat's campaign.

Four of the six executives have been linked to an FBI investigation that resulted in raids of six legislators' offices on Aug. 31.

Moses, contacted Monday in Unalaska, denies the VECO campaign contributions had anything to do with his vote and his name has not previously been connected with the FBI raids.

"Don't worry, I'm squeaky clean," Moses said. "I don't accept contributions on that basis."

One of the 20 search warrants executed in the FBI raids links the investigation to the tax bill passed last month by the Legislature and the draft natural gas pipeline contract proposed by Gov. Frank Murkowski and BP PLC, Exxon Mobil Corp. and ConocoPhillips.

The warrant called for seizure of documents concerning any payment, contracts, agreements, gifts or employment provided by VECO or company executives Bill Allen, Rick Smith, Peter Leathard and Roger Chan.

On Aug. 2, Allen, Smith, Leathard, Chan and VECO personnel manager James Slack each contributed $500 to Moses' campaign, according to Alaska Public Office Commission records. Then on Aug. 7, Thomas Corkran, VECO's chief information officer, donated $500 more.

VECO, an oil field services company and a major political player in Alaska, typically supports Republican candidates. The contributions to Moses are among the only donations company executives have given to a Democrat this election year.

Moses faced his stiffest competition in years in a primary election that still hasn't been decided. The outcome of the race between him and Bryce Edwards is still too close to call and appears headed toward a mandatory recount by the Division of Elections.

VECO and Allen, the company's chief executive, supported the net-profits production tax plan proposed by Murkowski, but it faced major opposition in the House of Representatives. Twice before, the tax plan had been rejected. Some lawmakers disliked the structure of a tax based on company profits, some thought the tax rate was too low and others thought it was too high.

On Aug. 10, the bill seemed doomed again. It was the final day of the second special session, when the House failed by a single vote to gather the 21 votes needed to pass the measure. The only legislator missing was Moses, who was recuperating in Anchorage from a pinched nerve.

A lengthy recess was called while Moses boarded a plane and flew to Juneau. That night, the House reconvened and passed the bill. The final vote was 26-14, with several legislators changing to "yes" votes after realizing the matter had been decided.

Moses said he had a big stake in that vote: Funding for a new school in New Stuyahok and millions in power cost equalization fund money was tied to passage of the production tax bill.

With the exception of Rep. Richard Foster, D-Nome, all members of the Democrat-heavy House Bush caucus voted for the measure, with the rural fuel cost subsidy a major incentive.

Moses said he does not plan to return the VECO executives' campaign contributions, as other candidates have already done.

"I accepted it in good faith, and I got contributions from all over the place," he said.

Meanwhile, a retiring legislator who received tens of thousands of dollars in consulting fees from VECO has not responded to reporters' inquiries about those fees for nearly two weeks.

Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, received $30,000 in consulting fees from VECO between 2003 and 2005, according to APOC filings.

Anderson and Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, are the only two legislators to report consulting fees from VECO in that time.

Stevens, the son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, has reported making $252,000 from the company since 2001.

Stevens' office was one of the six raided; Anderson's was not.

A review of Anderson's financial disclosures filed with APOC show that Anderson was paid consulting fees on three occasions by VECO totaling $30,000: "Election/proposition research;" "Consultation on Russian business endeavor;" and "Consulting on community council and government affairs."

Legislators are not required to detail the work they do for their consulting fees.

Anderson's wife, Republican Rep. Lesil McGuire of Anchorage, is running for the Senate seat Stevens is vacating.

Anderson has not returned messages left by phone and e-mail since the raids took place. A legislative aide to McGuire said Monday that McGuire and Anderson were on vacation out of state and could not be reached for comment. Stevens also has not returned repeated calls.

Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said he could neither confirm nor deny Anderson and Moses are part of the FBI investigation.

"We're not confirming any details of the investigation at this point," Sierra said.

VECO has largely been silent on the investigation. The company's only public statement came last week in a press release denying the company had participated in anything improper or illegal.

Leading Developer Portrayed As 'Thief' Or 'Visionary' (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Despite his reputation as a maverick wheeler-dealer whose projects helped revitalize the city, prominent developer Douglas Jemal was "little more than a common thief," prosecutors said yesterday at the start of his trial on bribery and fraud charges.

Government lawyers said Jemal and his company, Douglas Development Corp., used bribes and fraudulent documents to keep an overextended real estate empire alive in the years before the boom in District property prices.

Jemal, his son Norman, who is the company's vice president, and leasing director Blake Esherick went on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington yesterday. They are charged with conspiring to bribe a former D.C. government official with cash, fine meals, trips to Las Vegas and a Rolex in exchange for "sweetheart" contracts with the city. Prosecutors said Jemal's company received inflated profits for leasing property to the city from 2001 to 2004.

All three defendants have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges in a trial that could last up to six weeks. The defense painted Jemal, 63, as a "visionary," and previously said that its witnesses could include Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and Washington Wizards' owner Abe Pollin, who built a sports arena in an area of downtown that is home to many of Jemal's retail properties.

Most of the allegations involve dealings with Michael A. Lorusso, a former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management. Lorusso, who was fired from his city job in January 2003, pleaded guilty to bribery and agreed to aid prosecutors. Lorusso, who is expected to be the key witness in the trial, faces a prison term of 57 to 71 months under federal sentencing guidelines, but prosecutors have said they could seek less time depending on the value of his cooperation.

In his opening statement to the jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark H. Dubester twice mentioned Lorusso's guilty plea to the jury. That drew calls for a mistrial from Jemal's defense attorney, Reid H. Weingarten, who argued that Dubester was trying to taint Jemal on the basis of Lorusso's guilt.

U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina rejected the motion for a mistrial but agreed to tell jurors that they should not take Lorusso's guilty plea to mean that Jemal also is guilty.

The government's case, as outlined by Dubester, will re-create for the jury the economic circumstances that Jemal and his company were facing in 2001. It was a time, Dubester said, when it was unknown whether the developer's numerous bets on the city's rebirth would pay off.

Dubester said he will take the jury through the company's financial records to show that the firm -- saddled with mortgages on empty office buildings and unleased properties -- was overextended in 2001.

Checks to contractors would sit in a pile in the company's accounting department for months, waiting for cash deposits that would allow them to be mailed, the prosecutor said, and some mailed checks did not have the funds to back them up. In 2001, the company racked up $100,000 worth of bank fees for insufficient funds, Dubester told the jury.

It was in this context that on April 26, 2001, Lorusso became involved with the Jemals. Lorusso allowed the developer to pick up the check for a dinner at the Capital Grille, a favorite place in Northwest Washington for Jemal to conduct business. Jemal sized up Lorusso as someone who could help him get favorable deals, Dubester said.

Soon, the Jemals were partying with Lorusso in Las Vegas, and Lorusso was helping the company get leases with the city for properties, including a building at 77 P St. NW and a parcel in Prince George's County that the city used as an impound lot.

While accusing Norman Jemal of paying for Lorusso's Rolex, and Esherick of writing phony documents, Dubester made it clear that he viewed Douglas Jemal as the architect of the alleged conspiracy.

"It was motivated by greed, fueled by ambition and given life in the culture of Doug Jemal's businesses," Dubester said.

Defense attorneys said that the Jemals and Esherick have not violated any laws, but that they were guilty of believing that Lorusso was their friend.

In their opening statements, defense attorneys said Jemal was committed to the city's economic rebirth and worked hard to accommodate the District government's wishes.

They said the deal to put city agencies in 77 P St. NW was worked out with Lorusso's predecessor and that the city desperately needed a new impound lot. And Lorusso turned down many other real estate deals proposed by the Jemals, the defense contended.

Because Lorusso was a friend of the Jemals and Esherick, there was nothing wrong with buying him gifts, as long as it was not in return for public actions, the defense attorneys said. Lorusso returned his friends' generosity by picking up restaurant checks and giving the Jemals fancy sunglasses. And the trips to Las Vegas that prosecutors highlighted were actually business trips to attend conferences, the defense said, and Lorusso paid his own airfare.

Defense attorneys told the jury yesterday that the Jemals and Esherick were being set up by Lorusso.

"Make no mistake about why you are here," said Michelle Roberts, defense attorney for Normal Jemal. "Two words, one man: Michael Lorusso."

Gotti's Got Write Stuff (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 12, 2006

John A. (Junior) Gotti probably could have written an autobiography about growing up around his father's Little Italy social club called "And To Think That I Saw it on Mulberry Street."

But since Dr. Seuss already used that title, the mob scion had to look elsewhere for inspiration to pen a children's book.

Trying to soften their client's image, defense attorneys yesterday told jurors that the mobster - along with a cellmate-turned-illustrator - penned a kiddie book about a lovable pint-sized tiger and a fierce dragon.

Gotti decided to write "The Children of Shaolin Forest," after reading about the Jackson children of New Jersey who had been starved by their adoptive parents.

The book's illustrator, Brian Lindemann, testified at Gotti's latest racketeering trial that John (Dapper Don) Gotti's son advised him to give up the criminal life.

"He pretty much told me to stay away from a lot of idiots on the compound because they'll end up dragging you down with them," said Lindemann, 31, a stickup man and wanna-be mobster who ran with a Queens-based robbery gang dubbed the Giannini Crew.

Defense attorneys gave jurors a peek at pages from the 2004 book yesterday as they argued that he turned a page of his own - renouncing the Mafia life before going to prison in 1999.

On one page, a cute tiger locked in a cage weeps at the site of a steaming cauldron that burns before him.

Another shows a fierce green-and-red dragon. And, finally, there's the same little tiger smiling in a mushroom field warmed by a smiling sun.

But prosecutor Miriam Rocah showed Lindemann etchings found in his phone book in 2004, which didn't include any of the cuddly denizens of Shaolin Forest. In one, Lindemann drew a police badge beside the words "F --- the Police."

Meanwhile, the son of the government's star witness - mob turncoat Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo - disputed witness tampering charges against Gotti.

Prosecutors contend Gotti summoned DiLeonardo's then-teenage son to Ray Brook Prison in February 2003 to get him to persuade his father not to testify against the mob boss.

Michael Ricci, who changed his name from DiLeonardo, said he and Gotti talked about "school, girls and sports. How I was doing."

Ricci, 20, said he made the jailhouse visit after finding out his father was going to cooperate with the feds, meaning he probably wouldn't see him again. He said he was also angry after learning his dad had fathered a child out of wedlock.

Ricci has not seen his father since DiLeonardo entered the federal witness protection program.

"I was very upset, a lot of things running through my mind," Ricci said. "I didn't want people to know who I was in the paper. ... I wanted to live a normal life."

Ex-Schrenko Aides Get 8 Years Each Former State Schools Chief Reports To Federal Prison (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 12, 2006

Linda Schrenko reported to federal prison Monday afternoon while her former lover and deputy superintendent, Merle Temple, was sentenced to eight years and one month in prison.

Another conspirator in the case, Alpharetta computer executive A. Stephen Botes, received an identical sentence to Temple: eight years and one month.

The three were charged as part of a scheme to defraud the government of $600,000 in federal funds earmarked for deaf and honors students.

Schrenko, the former state school superintendent, was sentenced to eight years, and will serve her time in a women's prison in Tallahasee, Florida.

Temple, who has 45 days to report to prison, will fulfill his sentence at a facility in Edgefield, SC, which is close to where he lives.

Temple, 58, of Evans, Ga., told the court he will spend the rest of his life "making spiritual restitution" for his actions.

"I would ask people to look at the total picture of my life and the good I've tried to do, versus what we see here today," he told reporters after the sentencing Monday. "I am just going to press on."

Temple plead guilty in January 2005 to charges of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud in exchange for testifying against Schrenko. Schrenko used some of the money to help finance her unsuccessful campaign for governor and for a $9,300 face lift.

Botes was found guilty of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud charges conviction earlier this year.

Georgia's Ex-top Educator Reports To Prison; Aides Sentenced (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

ATLANTA -- As former Georgia schools superintendent Linda Schrenko began serving an eight-year federal prison sentence Monday, her top aide was handed a slightly longer sentence for helping her in an embezzlement plot.

Schrenko reported to prison Monday afternoon to begin serving a sentence for embezzling about $600,000 in federal education money that funded, in part, a failed 2002 campaign for governor and a face lift.

Merle Temple, Schrenko's former campaign manager and ex-lover, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Clarence Cooper to eight years and one month in prison Monday. He had pleaded guilty in January 2005 to charges of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud.

Another Schrenko ally, computer firm owner Stephan Botes, was sentenced later Monday to eight years and one month in prison for his role in the embezzlement plot. He also is to pay $382,394 in restitution.

His attorney, Brian Steel, said he plans to appeal the sentence.

Temple, 58, of Evans, Ga., told the court he will spend the rest of his life "making spiritual restitution" for his actions.

"I would ask people to look at the total picture of my life and the good I've tried to do, versus what we see here today," he told reporters after the sentencing. "I am just going to press on."

Temple's attorney, John T. Garcia, argued for a lesser sentence because the former aide takes care of his ill wife, who has diabetes and has suffered multiple strokes and several heart attacks. Garcia blamed Temple's actions with Schrenko in part on his obsessive compulsive disorder, and said Temple had lived an exemplary life up until his work with Schrenko.

Federal prosecutor Russell Vineyard argued for a full sentence for Temple, calling his actions "egregious."

"He wanted to be the power behind the throne if Ms. Schrenko was elected," Vineyard said.

Temple told the judge he hopes to serve his time in a federal prison in Edgefield, S.C., about 45 minutes from his house in Evans. He has already paid the $199,500 he owes in restitution.

Botes, who pleaded not guilty to charges that he helped Schrenko steal $614,000 in federal money, continued to maintain his innocence during Monday's hearing, saying he is only guilty of trusting the wrong people.

"I did not control what Linda Schrenko did inside the Department of Education," he told the judge.

Schrenko will spend the next eight years in Tallahassee's Federal Correctional Institution, a minimum-security prison where she'll live in college dorm-style cells and earn 12 cents an hour as an orderly, plumber or other maintenance job.

Temple had been expected to testify against Schrenko as part of his plea agreement.

But in the middle of Schrenko's May trial, she struck a plea deal in exchange for testifying against her co-defendants.

The deal led to the imprisonment of Temple, who was charged with obstruction of justice on suspicion of leaking information to her lawyers. And it was key in the conviction of Botes, who was found guilty of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud charges conviction.

The state's former top educator pleaded guilty in May to charges of embezzling about $600,000 meant for Georgia students. In court, witnesses and prosecutors said she asked friends and family members _ including the staffers in her daughter's dental practice _ to endorse a batch of $590 checks that were later diverted to her campaign.

Schrenko, 56, an educator from suburban Augusta, made history in 1994 when she became the first woman elected to a statewide, nonjudicial post in Georgia. She also was one of the first Republicans elected to such an office in a state that had been dominated by Democrats since Reconstruction.

She was re-elected in 1998, but her bid to unseat Democrat Gov. Roy Barnes fell short when she lost the Republican primary to Sonny Perdue, a state senator who went on to beat Barnes.

Her November 2004 indictment made Schrenko the state's highest-ranking elected official in decades to face such serious charges. She was indicted on 22 counts of money laundering and 18 other counts ranging from conspiracy to fraud, with each count carrying up to 20 years in prison.

Botes and Temple are the last of Schrenko's aides to be sentenced in the case.

Former campaign manager Richard Leonard, 44, of Augusta, Ga., was sentenced Aug. 24 to one year of probation and a fine of $3,000 for trying to dissuade a witness from providing truthful testimony against Schrenko.

Aide Miller E. Finley, 64, of Evans, Ga., was sentenced July 21 to three years' probation and a $4,000 fine for making false statements to federal agents.

Prosecutors Say Trash Pickup Favors Behind Alleged State Payroll Scam (BVND)

By Jan Dennis

The Belleville News Democrat, September 12, 2006

PEORIA, Ill. - A former high-ranking Illinois secretary of state official helped three janitors pocket more than $150,000 in state pay for work they didn't do in exchange for special treatment by city trash collectors in his Springfield neighborhood, prosecutors said Monday.

Cecil Turner received no financial kickbacks in the alleged ghost payroll scheme, U.S. District Attorney Patrick Chesley said during opening statements in Turner's trial in federal court in Peoria.

Instead, Chesley alleged Turner aided in the scheme because one of the janitors - Dana Dinora - also worked for Springfield's public works department, arranging quick pick ups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors.

Defense attorney Michael Metnick told jurors Turner was unaware of the alleged five-year payroll scam he maintains was orchestrated by Dinora, one of three former janitors who pleaded guilty in the scheme and agreed to cooperate in the case against Turner.

Turner, 59, the former director of the secretary of state's physical services division, is charged with four counts of wire fraud that allege he helped the janitors hide the scheme, along with two counts of lying to investigators. He faces up to 20 years in prison on each wire fraud count and up to five years in prison on each count of lying to investigators if convicted.

Metnick told jurors that special trash pickups in Turner's neighborhood were arranged by another city employee, not Dinora, and are common for people with political connections. Turner is vice chairman of the Sangamon County Democratic Party and his wife, Doris, is a Sangamon County Board member.

"While none of us like it, it wasn't done because of Dana Dinora. It was done because of Cecil Turner," Metnick said.

Metnick called Dinora a "con man" with a long record of abusing time off who manipulated Turner after he was appointed to the $98,000-a-year job in 1999.

Chesley told jurors that Turner helped cover for the janitors, yelling at supervisors who questioned unfinished work and ordering them to "leave those guys alone."

"The janitors could not have done it without Cecil Turner. That's what the evidence is going to show," Chesley said.

The three janitors pleaded guilty last month in a scheme prosecutors allege handed them full pay for working only a fraction of their assigned hours from 1999 to August 2005. Dinora, 53, of Springfield, David Medvesek, 57, of Springfield, and Steven Boyce, 58, of Chatham, each face up to 20 years in prison when sentenced Dec. 21.

Chesley said the scheme started slowly, but that Dinora was barely working by 2004 and the other janitors were putting in only half their assigned hours. He said the janitors developed various methods to cover their absences, including leaving notes for other workers that said they were working elsewhere.

Turner and the janitors were fired after an investigation uncovered the scheme last year. Turner was among 20 department heads in the secretary of state's office, overseeing maintenance and janitorial services in state offices, including the Capitol building.

Secretary of State Jesse White has said he is angry the men broke the public's trust but said their firings should signal to employees and the public that corruption will not be tolerated in his office.

His Republican opponent, state Sen. Dan Rutherford, charged Monday that White set the stage for the alleged scam when his office hired Turner despite knowing of his 1976 conviction in a scheme in which veterans' benefit checks were stolen from the postal service.

Rutherford also alleged that White aided the scheme six years ago through moves within the office that he says made doling out jobs, not weeding out corruption, a priority.

"I believe that if Jesse White had been attentive and not been asleep at the wheel that this trial today could have been prevented," Rutherford said during a news conference across the street from the Peoria courthouse.

David Drucker, a spokesman for White's re-election campaign, said White hired Turner despite his criminal conviction because "it happened almost 30 years ago and he had turned his life around."

Drucker also said White's internal investigators uncovered the alleged scam and accused Rutherford of using the trial to bolster his campaign.

"The fact that he's going back six years on this thing is indicative that his campaign is in real trouble," Drucker said.

Turner's trial, which attorneys say could last a week or more, resumes Tuesday morning.

2 Cuban Activists Plead Guilty To Weapons Charge (FLSUNSEN/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 12, 2006

MIAMI -- A prominent Cuban exile who virulently opposes the communist government of President Fidel Castro pleaded guilty Monday to weapons charges arising from seizures last year of machine guns, a grenade launcher and thousands of rounds of ammunition.

Santiago Alvarez, 64, a wealthy developer and key benefactor of jailed Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles, pleaded guilty to a single criminal conspiracy charge. A longtime employee of Alvarez's, 64-year-old Osvaldo Mitat, also pleaded guilty.

Their pleas came a day before jury selection was scheduled to begin for a trial before a federal judge in Fort Lauderdale. Alvarez and Mitat had both faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted on the original six-count indictment.

Under the plea deal, each now face up to five years behind bars when they are sentenced by U.S. District Judge James Cohn on Nov. 14.

``I think both sides believe it's a just result," said Alvarez attorney Kendall Coffey. ``It recognizes that they are enemies of Castro, not the United States. But even patriots are accountable."

Prosecutors did not immediately comment on the plea agreement.

Alvarez is a longtime associate of Posada, a former CIA operative who is accused by the Cuban and Venezuelan governments with masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner in which 73 people died. Alvarez arranged for travel documents for Posada and helped him come out of hiding in Miami in May 2005, even staging a press conference for the Cuban militant.

Posada, 78, is now in U.S. immigration custody in Texas and has been ordered deported from the United States, but no country has been willing to accept him. Posada's lawyers argue that he should be released to his family in Miami.

Alvarez and Mitat were arrested in November after an informant tipped the FBI that a large cooler full of military-style weapons was being transported from apartments in Broward County owned by Alvarez to Mitat in Miami.

Later, investigators discovered more weaponry and ammunition at the apartment complexes and on Guinchos Cay, Bahamas, an island about 12 miles from Cuba that was linked to Alvarez. That island arsenal included grenades, grenade launchers and about five pounds of powerful C-4 plastic explosives.

Prosecutors had said those discoveries showed that Alvarez was actively involved in procuring weapons for an attempt by some Cuban exiles in Miami to topple the Castro government by force.

Documents discovered at Alvarez's office showed that he financially supported Posada during his trial and imprisonment for an alleged Castro assassination attempt in Panama in 2000. Posada was later pardoned by Panama's president.

Florida: Cuban Exiles Avoid Trial With Plea (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Two Cuban exiles who have vehemently opposed Fidel Castro will avoid a trial on weapons charges after each pleaded guilty to a single criminal conspiracy charge. The men, Santiago Alvarez, 65, and Osvaldo Mitat, 64, were scheduled for trial this week and would have faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted. But prosecutors reduced the charges in a last-minute plea deal, and the men now face a maximum sentence of five years. The men were arrested last year after the Federal Bureau of Investigation seized machine guns, a grenade launcher and thousands of rounds of ammunition. They are scheduled for sentencing Nov. 14.

Two Anti-Castro Activists Plead Guilty To Weapons Conspiracy (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, September 12, 2006

Two elderly anti-Castro activists facing weapons charges pleaded guilty Monday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale to one count of conspiracy to possess illegal weapons, which carries a five-year maximum prison penalty. The men face sentencing Nov. 14.

Santiago Alvarez, 65, and his friend Osvaldo Mitat, 64, went before U.S. District Judge James Cohn this afternoon after prosecutors reduced charges. The men were facing a maximum of 20 years imprisonment because initial charges included possession of illegal weapons, in addition to conspiracy.

Machine guns, firearms, a silencer with an obliterated serial number and a grenade launcher were among the weapons the men were accused of stashing in a Lauderhill apartment complex owned by Alvarez.

The conspiracy dated back to November 2004, prosecutors said. The men were arrested a year later. Alvarez helped Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles emerge from hiding in May 2005 before Posada's arrest for entering the country illegally. Posada is still in federal custody in Texas.

At least two dozen family members and friends of Alvarez and Mitat, who worked for Alvarez, were present at today's hearing.

"We're just happy it's over," Santiago Alvarez Jr. said about his father's case.

Francisco "Pepe" Hernandez, of the Cuban American National Foundation, said of Alvarez's decision to plead guilty: ``He didn't have any choice after the judge ruled on the insistence of the government bringing this trial in Broward."

"They realized their chances were slim," Hernandez said, ``and they wanted to spare the community this commotion."

Jose Basulto of Brothers to the Rescue said, ``George Washington would have been proud of these two men as patriots."

Cohn last week ruled that the men could get a fair trial in Broward County. Their attorneys argued that the strikingly different demographics between Miami-Dade and Broward should allow a two-county jury in federal court in Fort Lauderdale.

2 Cuban Exiles Accept Plea Deal (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 12, 2006

In a last-minute plea deal, prominent Cuban exile and local real estate developer Santiago Alvarez admitted Monday he illegally stashed weapons at a Broward County apartment complex and attempted to move them after federal authorities appeared at his office with a search warrant.

Alvarez and co-defendant Osvaldo Mitat each pleaded guilty in Fort Lauderdale federal court to a single conspiracy charge stemming from the Nov. 18 seizure of a white fishing cooler containing machine guns, numerous firearms with serial numbers removed, an unregistered silencer and a grenade launcher.

Prosecutors contended Alvarez, 65, and Mitat, 64, both staunchly anti-Castro Cuban exiles, maintained caches of weapons, including one in the Bahamas, to use in attacks on Cuba. The agreement specifies that the maximum prison term Alvarez and Mitat can receive is five years, far less than they could have received had they been convicted at trial. U.S. District Judge James Cohn set sentencing for Nov. 14.

One longtime friend and supporter said Monday's guilty pleas marked a "shameful day for Cuban patriots."

According to a factual summary of the case agreed to Monday by both sides: Federal agents executed a search warrant on Alvarez's Hialeah office Nov. 18, after intercepting a parcel addressed to Alvarez containing counterfeit Guatemalan identification documents. As the search continued, Alvarez asked an employee to transport a cooler containing weapons from a Lauderhill apartment complex to a location in Miami, where Mitat would pick it up.

The employee, who was an FBI informant, tipped off agents to the exchange. Authorities arrested Mitat as he took possession of the weapons and arrested Alvarez later.

Magistrate Rules In Cuban Militant's Favor In Bid To Leave Jail (AP)

By ALICIA A. CALDWELL

AP, September 12, 2006

EL PASO, Texas -- A federal magistrate judge has agreed that an anti-Castro Cuban militant should be able to leave a federal immigration jail while he waits to be deported.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Norbert Garney issued a 23-page written ruling Monday that Luis Posada Carriles should be set free from the El Paso immigration detention center where he has been held since his arrest on immigration charges last year, Posada's El Paso lawyer, Felipe D.J. Millan said Monday.

Millan said the ruling will now go to a federal district judge. If Garney's ruling is upheld, which Millan believes will happen, he anticipates that Posada could be set free in about 30 days.

"As far as we're concerned, we're on the right track," Millan said of the favorable ruling.

A Department of Justice spokesman said Monday evening that the agency is reviewing the decision.

DOJ_NMG_0061608

The 78-year-old Cuba native and naturalized Venezuelan citizen is wanted in Venezuela on charges that he plotted the deadly 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner from Caracas.

Eric Wingerter, a Venezuelan government spokesman in Washington, said Garney's ruling "is exactly the wrong message to be sending" in time of an increased focused on fighting terrorism.

"We're talking about a guy who blew up an airplane that was holding the most innocent people imaginable," Wingerter said. "If that is not the definition of a terrorist, I don't know what is."

Wingerter said the date of the ruling, the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, was "particularly insulting to the families of the victims.

"If we are serious about fighting terrorism then we need to prosecute all terrorists, not just those opposed to U.S. foreign policy."

Posada was arrested in Miami last year on charges that he illegally crossed into Texas from Mexico.

Last year an immigration judge ruled that Posada should be deported but said he could not be sent to Cuba or Venezuela because of the fear that he could be tortured.

Wingerter said that ruling "is not grounded in facts" and lawyers for the Venezuelan government are continuing efforts to have Posada sent back to face trial

During a brief hearing in federal court last month, Posada asked Garney to let him return to Miami, where his wife and children live, until the U.S. government can find another country to send him to.

Federal authorities have been trying since October to find a country that would accept Posada. Canada, Guatemala, Mexico, Costa Rica and El Salvador have all rejected formal requests.

Posada, a former CIA operative and U.S. Army soldier, has applied for U.S. citizenship. That application is pending, Millan said.

8th Circuit Grapples With Sentencing Guidelines (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 12, 2006

An 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge warned recently that the appellate court may be creating unconstitutional sentencing precedents that violate the spirit of last year's Supreme Court decision in U.S. v. Booker, which gave judges discretion to shape reasonable sentences.

Nationally, circuits have been grappling with how much leeway to give trial judges in fashioning sentences that are either more or less lenient than the traditional guideline range established by the U.S. Sentencing Commission.

The 8th Circuit overturned the 11-year prison term for repeat offender Jeffrey A. McDonald in a methamphetamine case because it was less than half the recommended sentencing guideline range of 22 to 27 years and just one year more than the law's minimum limit.

The court ordered resentencing without such an extreme variance.

This prompted Judge Kermit E. Bye to point out in dissent that, since the Booker decision, the 8th Circuit has reversed 25 sentences below the guideline range while affirming four, yet affirmed 16 sentences above guideline range while reversing just one.

"If we fail to implement the promise of Booker and do not relinquish greater discretion to experienced district court judges whose proximity to sentencing renders them eminently more qualified to appreciate the subtleties of each case, we will find ourselves the architects of a new -- and equally unconstitutional -- de facto mandatory sentencing system crafted from the ashes of the last," Bye wrote in U.S. v. McDonald, No. 05-1617.

Around the country, six circuits have held that sentences within the guideline range are presumptively reasonable. Only the 2nd Circuit declined to create a per se rule on the reasonableness of any sentence within approved ranges. U.S. v. Crosby, 397 F.3d 103 (2005).

Last year, in U.S. v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the portion of the Sentencing Reform Act that made guidelines mandatory, holding that it violated a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury, and converting the 20-year-old guideline system to advisory status.

Bye invited the circuit panel to re-examine its recent sentencing rulings, a challenge taken up by Judge Raymond W. Gruender in a lengthy footnote in his majority opinion.

Seven of the 25 lower sentences were vacated because the sentencing judge did not explain the reason, and may be upheld when properly explained, according to Gruender. Another seven were reductions of more than 100 months and five others gave no prison time when guidelines called for one to five years, he said.

McDonald's attorney, Kevin Cmelik, an assistant federal public defender in Davenport, Iowa, said that his office may seek reconsideration by the entire court. "In this circuit there is a debate building over how right we are in our reasonableness doctrine," he said.

Andrew Kahl, chief of the criminal division in the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of Iowa who argued the McDonald appeal said, the "variance wasn't warranted on the facts presented" in the case. "It was a very extreme drop from the sentencing guidelines."

Woman Missing From Carnival Cruise Ship (MH)

By Andrea Robinson

The Miami Herald, September 12, 2006

Federal officials are investigating the reported disappearance of a passenger who had been aboard a cruise ship that returned to the Port of Miami-Dade on Monday.

The 36-year-old Ohio woman was reported missing from Carnival Cruise Lines' Imagination as it was en route from Mexico.

FBI officials in Miami spent Monday morning interviewing family members who were on the ship. They declined to release the woman's identity.

FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said the investigation is just beginning.

"We're looking into it," she said. ``It doesn't look like foul play at this time."

By early afternoon, she said, Miami-Dade police were searching the woman's cabin, looking for possible evidence.

The U.S. Coast Guard also is assisting in the investigation.

Petty Officer Jennifer Johnson, a Coast Guard spokeswoman, said Carnival called the Coast Guard about 9:30 a.m. Monday to report the woman missing. She said a sea search had not yet been ordered.

"We haven't launched any assets yet. We're working together to determine if that's necessary," Johnson said.

The Imagination had left Miami on Thursday on a cruise to Key West and Calica, Mexico.

In a written statement, Carnival officials said a guest aboard the cruise told information desk workers early Monday that the family could not locate the woman, last seen about 1:30 a.m. Sunday after the ship departed Calica.

The International Council of Cruise Lines, an industry lobbying group, said earlier this year there were 24 reports of people missing during cruises between 2003 and last year. Its findings were based on data from 15 cruise lines.

In July, Elizabeth Galeana, 22, of Naples, apparently fell off a cruise ship and drowned. Her body was found off the coast of Italy last month.

In May, Daniel DiPiero, 21, of Canfield, Ohio, fell off a cruise ship headed to the Bahamas after a night of heavy drinking with friends.

This report was supplemented with material from The Associated Press.

MIAMI -- Authorities are investigating the disappearance of an Ohio woman who was reported missing Monday from a Carnival Cruise Lines ship.

The 36-year-old woman, whose identity was not released, had been on a four-day cruise to Key West and Mexico.

The Miami-based cruise line said relatives last saw the woman early Sunday but did not report her missing until Monday, when the ship returned to Miami. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said, however, that she was not aware of any delay in reporting the disappearance.

"It doesn't look like foul play," said Orihuela, whose agency is investigating the case.

The disappearance from the Carnival cruise ship Imagination was the latest missing person case involving a cruise this year.

Elizabeth Galeana, 22, of Naples, Fla., apparently fell off a cruise ship in July and drowned. Her body was found off the coast of Italy last month. In May, Daniel DiPiero, 21, of Canfield, Ohio, fell off a cruise ship to the Bahamas after a night of heavy drinking with friends.

The International Council of Cruise Lines, an industry lobbying group, reported earlier this year that a review of data from 15 lines showed 24 reports of missing people between 2003 to 2005.

One of the highest-profile cases involving a cruise ship disappearance occurred last summer, when George Allen Smith IV, 26, of Greenwich, Conn., vanished from his honeymoon cruise in the Mediterranean after an apparent late night of drinking. Bloodstains were found on a canopy that covers lifeboats. No one has been charged and no body has been found.

Loaded Gun Found In D.C. Court Cellblock (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, September 12, 2006

Investigators were trying to determine how a loaded handgun got into a cellblock inside District of Columbia Superior Court.

A cleaning contractor found the .25-caliber semiautomatic pistol under a wad of paper in a cell toilet Friday, said Steve Conboy, the U.S. marshal for Superior Court.

It was the first time such a serious security breach occurred at the busy downtown courthouse in at least 10 years, authorities said.

Conboy, who oversees courthouse security, said he does not know how the small pistol was smuggled into the building.

"We're not ruling anything out," he said. "At this point everybody's a suspect."

All prisoners are patted down by deputy marshals before being taken into the cellblock -- whether coming from the D.C. jail, police headquarters or off the street.

But only people who are taken into custody in a courtroom after coming in off the street are scanned by a metal detector, Conboy said.

He said it was not unusual for drugs, makeshift weapons and other contraband to turn up, but finding a gun is far more serious because marshals do not carry firearms when working in the cellblocks.

Conboy said many possibilities could explain how the weapon got into the building.

For instance, a person coming to court for a hearing in a criminal case could have sneaked the gun into the courthouse -- despite the presence of metal detectors -- and ditched the gun in the cellblock after being ordered into custody.

Or the gun could have been smuggled in by an employee or a contractor who has access to the cellblocks.

In 1988 and again in 1994, loaded guns were seized in the cellblocks before they could be used to do any damage, Conboy said.

Court officials noted the potential for tragedy if someone had used the gun in an attempt to escape.

"It's everybody's nightmare," said Superior Court Chief Judge Rufus G. King III.

California Opens Inquiry On Breaches Of Computers (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 11 — The California Highway Patrol is investigating outside breaches of a computer system used by aides to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to store downloaded audio files, a spokesman for the patrol said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0061611

In those files, some of which were leaked to The Los Angeles Times, the governor was heard telling Susan Kennedy, his chief of staff, that Cubans and Puerto Ricans were naturally passionate because of their combination of "black blood" and "Latino blood."

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who is seeking re-election, apologized for the remarks on Friday after they were reported by the newspaper, and he was criticized by his Democratic opponent, Phil Angelides.

"We are looking into the security of the governor's office computer system," said Fran Clader, a spokeswoman for the Highway Patrol, which is in charge of policing state facilities.

Ms. Clader would not provide details of the investigation, but a person associated with the governor said that three times over the last week of August and the first week of September a person or group of people gained access to the governor's staff computers from outside the Sacramento offices. The person spoke on the condition of anonymity because the matter could become the subject of a criminal investigation.

There are no immediate theories, the person said, as to who is responsible for the breach, first reported by The San Francisco Chronicle.

The governor's legal affairs secretary, Andrea Lynn Hoch, issued a statement Monday night saying that an internal audit had revealed some information about the person involved in the breach and that the information had been turned over to the Highway Patrol.

In remarks to Ms. Kennedy and Gary Delsohn, a speechwriter, Mr. Schwarzenegger praised the legislative style of State Senator Bonnie Garcia, who is of Puerto Rican descent, saying: "I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot. They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

On Friday, Ms. Garcia held a joint news conference with Mr. Schwarzenegger in Los Angeles to announce that his remarks had not bothered her in the least, but the governor said that reading the remarks in the newspaper made him "cringe."

Mr. Delsohn records conversations with the governor to use as reference material when he is writing his speeches, but shares them with a limited number of sources, The Chronicle reported.

Some experts on computer security said the person or people who entered the governor's system most likely knew what they were looking for — rather than randomly stumbling across the files — and could have easily stolen the password needed to get them. They said it was likely that the files were not properly secured.

Sondra Schneider, the chief executive of Security University, a company that provides training in protecting electronic assets, theorized that someone sent an e-mail message that compromised the governor's computer system when it was opened, allowing the sender to steal the password.

"Anyone at any time of any day can do that to anyone," Ms. Schneider said. "It happens every minute of the day."

In the case of the governor's office, Ms. Schneider said: "They just had to know that those audio files were in existence. I don't think someone was fishing around on the site looking for it. They knew it was there and it was made available because it was not secured properly."

The governor's press office referred all calls to the California Highway Patrol. David Garcia, a spokesman for The Los Angeles Times, said in an e-mail message that the paper had not been contacted by the patrol.

Governor Schwarzenegger is in a tough re-election battle. He has been known to get into hot water with his remarks, including once calling a group of legislators "girlie men."

17 Charges Filed In Rape Case Linked To Phoenix Killings (WP/AP)

By Chris Kahn, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

PHOENIX, Sept. 11 -- An ex-convict and construction worker was charged with 17 felony counts Monday in two sexual assaults linked to an investigation of a string of serial killings.

Maricopa County Attorney Andrew P. Thomas said that authorities are not calling Goudeau the "Baseline Killer" and that he has not been named as a suspect in 22 other robberies, rapes and shootings that left eight people dead since August 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0061612

For more than a year, a predator known as the Baseline Killer has terrorized the Phoenix area with killings, rapes and robberies. Police continue to try to understand how and whether Goudeau is connected, Thomas said.

The case is one of two serial-predator cases in the Phoenix area in the past year. Police have arrested two men in the other, dubbed the "Serial Shooter" investigation.

At a news conference, Thomas said Arizona's parole board was "naive and misguided" when it granted early release to Goudeau in 2004. Goudeau had eight more years to go on a prison sentence for unrelated assault charges.

"The victims of these brutal crimes deserve justice," he said. "I will do everything in my power to ensure that this defendant never again walks the streets a free man."

Goudeau is accused of attacking two sisters, who were 21 and 23, in September 2005 while they were walking in a park at night. Defense lawyer Corwin A. Townsend said that Goudeau plans to plead not guilty to the charges. And as soon as he gets the chance, Townsend said, he will independently test the DNA evidence that authorities used to arrest Goudeau.

Goudeau's wife also has said he is not guilty.

"This is a huge miscarriage of justice," Wendy Carr said. "And they have an innocent man in prison. This is all a mistake. He shouldn't be in prison for something he didn't do."

The Baseline Killer, so named because the earliest incidents occurred along Baseline Road, has been linked to 23 crimes in the metro area dating to August 2005, including eight killings, 11 sexual assaults of women and girls, and several robberies.

Investigators said they connected the crimes either through forensic evidence or through similarities in the way they were committed.

Government Joining Case Against Drug Maker Over Pricing Allegations (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

BOSTON The federal government is joining in a whistleblower's lawsuit in Boston alleging a drug maker inflated prices for medications and defrauded Medicare and Medicaid.The Justice Department said today it is intervening in the case against Dey (DAU) Incorporated, a California-based U-S affiliate of the German drug maker Merck.The government is joining a complaint by a Florida pharmacy and provider of home drug-infusion services. Ven-a-Care also has brought complaints alleging drug makers defrauded government programs.Officials accuse Dey of reporting prices for drugs that were more than five times the actual sales prices, costing the government more than 500 (m) million dollars in reimbursement.The company had no immediate comment.

Dey Denies Allegations On Drug Pricing (UPI/UPI)

United Press International, September 12, 2006

NAPA, Calif., Sept. 11 (UPI) -- Dey LP, a California drug company, denied Monday that it engaged in wrongdoing in the pricing or marketing of its medicines.

The denials follow word from the U.S. Justice Department earlier in the day that it intervened in a whistleblower suit against Dey.

Justice's complaint alleges that Dey engaged in a scheme to report "fraudulent and inflated" prices for several pharmaceutical products, knowing that federal healthcare programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices.

Dey's denial took aim at the method used by the government in developing its complaint.

"When virtually an entire industry is sued -- as has been the case with the pricing lawsuits that have been filed around the country by dozens of attorneys general -- it indicates that the real issue is not the industry's conduct, but rather the government's own reimbursement system," said John M. Kling, senior vice president-legal at Dey.

N.J. Gets $500K Settlement From GlaxoSmithKline (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0061613

AP, September 12, 2006

(CBS/AP) WASHINGTON New Jersey prosecutors say the state will get nearly $500,000 dollars from GlaxoSmithKline to settle claims it overcharged the government for two anti-nausea drugs.

New Jersey was reimbursed more than $472,000 from a $149-million national settlement with the Justice Department.

The government said Glaxo engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health care providers based on the manufacturers' prices.

The drugs are typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals and are mainly used to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation.

The Justice Department claims the company charged health care providers less for the drugs, knowing the providers would get to pocket the difference, and would be more likely to prescribe them again.

Glaxo admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement.

Big Tobacco's Promises To Reform Go Up In Smoke (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Tobacco companies have spent years trying to look as if they've reformed their old deceptive ways.

But in just the past month, new information has come to light that strongly suggests they are still willing to sacrifice smokers' lives for profits:

•On Aug. 17, a federal judge found that cigarette-makers marketed and sold their lethal products by deceiving the public about the risks of smoking for five decades. The duplicity and manipulation, she wrote, "continues to this day."

•Two weeks later, the industry returned to court brazenly seeking a loophole that would allow it to continue the deception overseas.

•On Aug. 29, Massachusetts health officials reported that the average nicotine delivery in scores of cigarette brands had increased by an average of 10% during seven years ending in 2004. Nicotine is the chemical that hooks smokers and keeps them hooked.

These findings and the industry's own actions suggest that its recent show of good corporate citizenship is as ephemeral as a puff of smoke. They might also prove expensive.

Last month's ruling in the government's landmark tobacco lawsuit could force the industry to remove misleading labels such as "light," "mild," and "low tar" from cigarette packs and marketing as of Jan. 1, imposing major new branding and marketing costs. U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler found that the industry used those terms to falsely portray lower-tar cigarettes as somehow less harmful than full-flavor brands to keep smokers from quitting.

It was a profitable ploy while it lasted. In the 1960s, when the surgeon general first warned of smoking's hazards, cigarette-makers answered the challenge with "low-tar" cigarettes. And smokers began to switch.

To satisfy their addiction, they smoked more or inhaled more deeply. In 2001, the National Cancer Institute reported the tragic result: The "net effect of the introduction and mass marketing" of these brands may have been an increase in smoking-related deaths.

Cigarette-makers "marketed and sold their lethal product with zeal, with deception, with a single-minded focus on their financial success, and without regard for the human tragedy or social costs," Kessler wrote.

Has the industry been chastened by her withering opinion?

Not by a long shot. After the ruling, the defendants sought "clarification" that it did not apply overseas. In essence, they were seeking a green light to mislead people in countries that have been their growth markets.

Massachusetts' nicotine report, meanwhile, raises questions about whether the industry manipulated nicotine levels to hook new smokers. After that report was released, R.J. Reynolds declined comment. Lorillard didn't return calls. Philip Morris disputed the findings and insisted that any variations were the result of the natural process of growing tobacco and making cigarettes.

That's hard to swallow. The industry can "precisely control nicotine delivery levels and provide doses of nicotine sufficient to create and sustain addiction," Kessler found.

Sadly, the public doesn't know what the industry is doing with nicotine or any ingredient. Thanks to industry lobbying and campaign contributions, there is no meaningful regulation. Never mind that tobacco kills 400,000 Americans a year. Until Congress gets serious about regulating cigarettes, Big Tobacco will have the last word.

Nicotine Study Faulty (USAT)

By Michael A. Farriss

USA Today, September 12, 2006

The Massachusetts Department of Public Health recently issued a report based on data from 1998 to 2004 that concluded "the amount of nicotine that is actually delivered to the smoker's lungs has increased significantly." The MDPH report cites Philip Morris USA and its Marlboro brand.

The principal reason the MDPH report seems to show an upward trend for Marlboro is because it did not include the earliest reported data from 1997 and the most recent reported data from November 2005. We believe that when one looks at the Marlboro data from all the years reported to the MDPH (1997 through 2005), there are variations in nicotine yields, both up and down, in different brand packings, but there is no trend in nicotine yields, up or down.

For example, the nicotine yield measured in Marlboro Lights King Size Box, the largest selling cigarette brand packing in the country, went up from 1997 to 1998, down in 1999, up in 2000, down in 2001, up in 2002, down in 2003, up in 2004 and down in 2005. The annual variability, both up and down, ranged from 0.01 to 0.11 milligrams of nicotine. These year-to-year variations occur because of the normal processes of growing tobacco and manufacturing cigarettes.

The MDPH report also links the nicotine measured by a smoking machine to nicotine "delivered to the smoker." Other public health authorities have said one should not link machine smoking to human smoking. For example, the World Health Organization Study Group on Tobacco Regulation concluded that "machine testing protocols are not likely to provide a valid basis for predicting health effects or for making claims about health effects because such protocols do not predict how the products will be used by individuals or at the population level."

We do not believe that the MDPH's conclusions about the trends in nicotine yields for Marlboro are supported by the 1997 through 2005 data. Even so, there are some fundamental conclusions that Philip Morris USA and the MDPH seem to share: Cigarette smoking is addictive, cigarette smoking causes disease and death, and comprehensive federal Food and Drug Administration regulation of the tobacco industry would be good public health policy.

EEOC Seeks Key Testimony In Sidley Austin Age Discrimination Suit (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 12, 2006

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has moved to compel testimony about recent conversations between Sidley Austin partners and a former financial director who signed a 1999 letter stating that the firm had a mandatory retirement policy.

Sidley has denied having such a policy in the face of an EEOC suit claiming the Chicago-based law firm discriminated against 31 partners on the basis of age when it demoted them to counsel in 1999. The EEOC has claimed the financial director's letter "flatly contradicts" the firm's position.

The letter, dated Oct. 21, 1999, and addressed to the Social Security Administration in Chicago, states that "it is the general policy of Sidley & Austin not to permit a partner of the firm to continue as a partner commencing the first of the year following the year age 65 is reached." The letter is signed by William B. White, financial director.

According to the EEOC motion filed last Tuesday in Chicago federal court, White testified at a July 26 deposition that he believed the letter to be an accurate statement of the firm's retirement policy at the time he signed it. But he also testified that, after conversations earlier this year with Sidley partners William F. Conlon and Theodore N. Miller, he realized the letter did not accurately state firm policy.

The lawyer representing Sidley at the deposition, Michael Conway of Chicago's Grippo & Elden, objected to questions about these conversations on the grounds that they were privileged. The EEOC is seeking to compel White's testimony about them.

"This motion presents the classic example of a Defendant seeking to use the attorney-client and work-product privileges to improperly thwart the Plaintiff's discovery into areas that are potentially damaging for the Defendant," the EEOC claims.

The agency argues the conversations are not privileged because White, who is retired but still works at Sidley on a contract basis, was not seeking legal advice from either Miller, who is vice chairman of the firm's management committee and a member of its executive committee, or Conlon, an executive committee member who acts as the firm's general counsel.

"The fact that Conlon and Miller are lawyers does not render every conversation that they have about this case privileged," the EEOC says in its motion.

Conway did not return a call seeking comment but, according to a partial transcript of the July 26 deposition, he justified his objection on the grounds that the partners "were offering legal advice."

"Miller was acting as counsel to the firm in connection with this matter," said Conway. "Having a conversation with White about activities during the scope of his employment I think is privileged."

The EEOC had moved in June to have counsel separate from the firm appointed for White. The firm quickly agreed to the appointment, but the letter received some media attention at that time, including articles in the Law Journal and the Chicago Tribune.

Represented at his deposition by his new counsel, Michael Hannafan of Chicago's Hannafan & Hannafan, White testified that he first became aware the retirement policy stated in the letter was not correct after he read the June 6 article in the Tribune. That morning, he said, firm executive director Timothy Bergen showed him the newspaper and told him he was a "celebrity." Bergen then told him to call Miller.

White later testified that Conlon also had called him about the letter and its possible inaccuracy in February 2006.

In his deposition, White also said he did not actually write the 1999 letter, only signed it. He said the letter was drafted by now-retired partner Wilbur C. Delp, who asked the financial director to sign the letter "so he could put it in his file in case there was a problem with his self-employment tax on his retirement payments."

In the past, law firms have not worried about EEOC scrutiny of their partner retirement policies because partners have traditionally been considered employers exempt from the protection of federal anti-discrimination laws.

In its suit against Sidley Austin, the EEOC has taken the novel position that the demoted partners were employees because they never voted on firm policy and all decisions, including partner compensation, were made by the firm's self-selecting executive committee.

The suit, which is seeking back pay for the demoted partners, could have far-reaching effect on the profession, as many large law firms have adopted similarly centralized management structures in recent years.

Journalist Remains In Contempt Of Court (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal appeals court on Monday upheld the contempt of court citation against a freelance journalist who is refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigating an anarchists' protest he videotaped.

A federal grand jury subpoenaed Joshua Wolf to acquire the 30 minutes of unpublished material, but he refused and was ordered jailed Aug. 1. He was released a month later as he appealed his case.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Monday that a 1972 Supreme Court precedent requires everyone, including journalists, to appear before grand juries if they have been summoned.

"The Supreme Court has declined to interpret the First Amendment to 'grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy,'" a three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court wrote.

Wolf, 24, videotaped a July 2005 protest where anarchists allegedly vandalized a San Francisco police car and an officer suffered a fractured skull after being hit. The anarchists were protesting a G-8 international economic conference in Scotland.

Wolf sold some of the footage to San Francisco television stations and posted it on his Web site, but refused to turn over unpublished material. U.S. District Judge William Alsup found him in contempt of court and ordered him jailed.

Jose Luis Fuentes, Wolf's lawyer, said he would ask the appeals court to allow him to remain free while he petitions the court to reconsider the issue with a larger panel of 15 judges.

Theodore Boutrous Jr., a lawyer for the California First Amendment Coalition and other journalism groups, said he would support those efforts.

Although the incident Wolf caught on video involved San Francisco police, federal authorities investigated because it involved destruction of federally funded property.

Court Panel Denies Blogger's Appeal (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 11 — In a case closely watched by First Amendment advocates, a federal court panel has rejected an appeal by a freelance journalist and blogger who has refused to appear before a grand jury or turn over video he shot of a violent protest last summer.

The decision, filed Friday by a three-member panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, reaffirmed a contempt charge against the journalist, Josh Wolf, who was sent to prison on Aug. 1 by a lower court for refusing to cooperate with an investigation into an anti-capitalism protest here in July 2005.

At the protest, timed to coincide with the Group of Eight Summit of world economic leaders in Scotland, a police officer was injured and an explosive device, a smoke bomb or a firework, was put under a police car.

Mr. Wolf sold some of his film to local television stations and posted parts on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net. Earlier this year, the government subpoenaed Mr. Wolf to testify and to turn over the remaining video, which prosecutors wanted to use to gather evidence for potential arson charges. Mr. Wolf has refused, and in an interview on Monday, he remained defiant. "Nothing the government can do," he said, "will coerce me into submitting to their demands. I intend to appeal this through every measure possible."

Mr. Wolf remained free on Monday, and it was not clear if the decision would result in his returning to jail immediately. His lawyer, Jose Luis Fuentes, said he would ask for a rehearing before the entire court.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, said his office was awaiting an order from the Ninth Circuit "clarifying Mr. Wolf's custodial status."

Mr. Wolf, who has continued to post online updates about his case, said he was not fazed by the prospect of more prison time.

"My cellmates were totally chill and had my back," he said of his recent incarceration. "The fact I only got an hour of fresh air a day was frustrating, but you deal."

After Steps To Desegregate, Plaintiffs Drop Tennessee Suit (NYT)

By Theo Emery

NASHVILLE, Sept. 11 — In 1966, a young black woman named Rita Sanders, fresh out of graduate school, took a job teaching at a traditionally black college here. Angered by the school's inadequate financing and facilities, she sued the state two years later as maintaining an inferior system of higher education for blacks.

Thirty-eight years later, the woman, now Rita Sanders Geier, stood alongside Gov. Phil Bredesen of Tennessee on Monday to announce that the state had met its obligations to desegregate higher education and that she, along with the other plaintiffs and parties, would ask a judge to dismiss the lawsuit.

"The things that we put in place have shown that they are efficacious, and can work and will work," said Ms. Geier, who now lives in Maryland.

The announcement signified the conclusion of a significant civil rights case that sought to erase vestiges of segregation that lingered long after Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 Supreme Court ruling that abolished segregation in public education.

The case perhaps best known for challenging segregated higher education is United States v. Fordice. That landmark 1992 Supreme Court ruling found that Mississippi had maintained separate systems, one for blacks and one for whites, after the official abolition of segregation.

But the Geier case was different. Long before the Fordice decision, the state agreed to merge a University of Tennessee extension in Nashville into Tennessee State University, where Ms. Geier worked. No other state has agreed to such a remedy, said Steve Suitts, program coordinator at the Southern Education Foundation in Atlanta.

Of 19 states with legally segregated systems of higher education, post-Brown lawsuits in only four states — Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana and Tennessee — went to trial. Alabama is the only state where the litigation is pending, Mr. Suitts said.

He said the litigation could have accomplished more, "but I think the fact of the matter is that these lines of cases have done about as much as they can at this point."

The Tennessee case has taken many twists and turns. Six years ago all the parties entered mediation, and a year later they hammered out an agreement that would result in the dismissal of the lawsuit after five years, if all the conditions were met.

On Monday, the parties said the conditions had been met, including appropriating $15.5 million for the Tennessee State endowment, $19.8 million in capital outlays and almost $15 million in financial aid. All told, the state has spent $77 million since 2001 to increase equality and diversity at state colleges and universities, according to Mr. Bredesen's office.

George Barrett, the lawyer for Ms. Geier and the other plaintiffs, said the case did for higher education what the Brown case did for elementary and secondary education.

"We have given to our children, and our children yet unborn, a system of higher education washed clean of the pernicious effects of the sin of segregation," Mr. Barrett said.

John C. Brittain, chief counsel of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, said he was not so sure. He said settlements such as in the Geier case did not do enough for historically black schools.

"I doubt that it's enough, and that it will be sustained long enough to really build up those institutions to competitiveness and comparability," Mr. Brittain said.

Segregated Schools: New Debate, Old Problem (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Ernie Chambers never made it to the Congressional Black Caucus' annual legislative conference last week, but he was the elephant in the room when some of the attendees got together to talk about this nation's racial divide.

They were participants in a workshop whose title, "Is there a rebirth of legal racial segregation?" suggested a wide-ranging exploration of an intriguing topic. But what unfolded was an emotionally charged discussion of the causes and aftereffects of something Chambers did.

The only black member of Nebraska's state senate, Chambers is the co-author of a law that divides Omaha's public school system into three smaller districts — one mostly black, another largely white and the other predominately Hispanic. "When the opportunity came to do something which other people call radical, but which I call very American … I took that opportunity," Chambers said in a videotaped message.

The law, which takes effect in 2008, is seen by some as a throwback to the time when the doctrine of "separate, but equal" was the law of the land — though black children attended schools that were largely "separate," but hardly "equal."

Chambers' plan comes 52 years after the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed school segregation and at a time when many of Omaha's schools are heavily divided along racial lines as a result of housing patterns and a reluctance to use busing to achieve integration. Chambers said his law will give black and Hispanic parents more control over the schools their children attend. More control, he believes, will translate into greater academic achievement.

"I took this step because nothing else has worked," he explains.

Of course, it's unclear whether Chambers' law will produce the desired results — or even whether it will be implemented. The NAACP and the NAACP Legal Defense Fund have filed a federal lawsuit to block it. But Chambers' legislation produced no great sense of outrage among the academics and civil rights activists who attended the caucus workshop. That's because many of them think it will have little effect on racial integration in Omaha or anywhere else.

"Is there a rebirth of segregation?" panelist Charles Ogletree, a Harvard Law School professor, asked. "The answer," he said, "is emphatically no. It never died. … The reality is that far too many of us never moved an inch away from the segregation that we were born into in this nation."

To a large extent, the facts support that harsh assessment. Blacks and Hispanics continue to live largely in racially isolated neighborhoods. These segregated housing patterns and the continuing migration of whites to the suburbs ensure that minorities dominate the student bodies of many urban public school systems. Conversely, suburban whites attend schools that are overwhelmingly white. The panelists heaped the most blame for this situation on the Supreme Court — not white flight.

"The Supreme Court basically rewarded whites who fled to the suburbs, whites who have practiced decades of residential segregation, with a pass from having to be bothered with implementing" school desegregation, said Albert Samuels, assistant professor of political science at Southern University.

What he's talking about is the high court's Milliken v. Bradley decision. In that case, it ruled that a suburban school district can't be forced to become part of a multidistrict school integration plan if it cannot be shown that it was guilty of operating a segregated school system in violation of federal law.

In essence, this 1974 ruling gave whites who flee to the suburbs the cover they needed to perpetuate the school segregation that the high court outlawed 20 years earlier, many of the panelists argued.

In 1935, W.E.B. DuBois, the black sociologist and civil rights activist, wrote that "the Negro needs neither segregated schools nor mixed schools. What he needs is (a good) Education."

Parties Battle Over New Voter ID Laws (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

PHOENIX — Little noticed by voters, a nationwide melee has broken out pitting liberal and conservative groups in a duel over new laws that could determine who wins close elections in November and beyond.

The dispute, which is being fought in disparate and often half-empty courtrooms in as many as nine states, concerns new state laws and rules backed primarily by Republicans that require people to show photo identification in order to vote and, in some cases, proof of citizenship and identification when registering to vote.

One measure prompted the League of Women Voters to halt its voter registration drives in Florida out of fear of facing criminal penalties. That law, and a similar provision in Ohio that threatened voter registration drives by other groups, was blocked in recent weeks by federal courts.

The legal battle reflects a deep partisan divide, with Republicans arguing that the new requirements are needed to prevent voting fraud and boost confidence in election results, and Democrats charging that they disenfranchise seniors, minorities, students and others who tend to vote Democratic.

Hundreds of thousands of votes are potentially at stake in some of the most contested congressional races this year and the 2008 race for the White House, making the court cases the latest battle in a broader war over election policies that has been raging since the 2000 Florida recount.

One example of the skirmishing came late last month in a federal courtroom in Phoenix, where a Navajo leader, occasionally speaking in his tribal language, testified that thousands of his people would lose their right to cast ballots under a new Arizona law that requires voters to present a photo ID or other proof of identity at the polls.

The leader, Leonard Gorman, testified that many Navajo who spend their lives herding sheep in remote areas cannot fulfill the new requirements because they do not drive, nor do they have mailboxes or even the utility bills that are accepted as alternative forms of identification under the new law.

"This is very burdensome to the elders," Gorman told U.S. District Judge Roslyn Silver.

The provision had been approved by Republican lawmakers and vetoed by Arizona's Democratic governor before conservative activists included it as part of a broad anti-immigration initiative passed by voters in 2004.

Gorman was describing a highly localized, narrow slice of the electorate — about 60,000 voting-age adults living on the reservation. But Native Americans tend to vote for Democrats.

And in a closely fought state, the votes of a handful of Navajo could be decisive.

In 2004, President Bush won a neighboring state, New Mexico, by just 6,000 ballots, and his 537-vote margin in Florida four years earlier prompted both parties to develop finely tuned get-out-the-vote procedures designed to enlist every voter they could.

Republicans had great success enacting new laws after 2004, winning voter identification requirements in Georgia, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri and the city of Albuquerque as well as the Arizona law, while adding the voter registration restrictions in Ohio and Florida.

In some states, the legal wrangling has prompted creative efforts to guard against constitutional challenges.

Missouri has deployed mobile units in vans to issue identification to the elderly, responding to complaints that photo ID is costly or hard to obtain for some voters.

Wisconsin's Democratic governor has vetoed voter identification legislation approved by the Republican-led Legislature, and the Michigan Supreme Court is expected to rule soon on the constitutionality of a 1996 state law that has never been enforced but would require photo ID at the polls.

Pennsylvania's Republican-led Legislature approved a voter identification requirement, but it was vetoed by Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell.

Across the country, the strategy on each side is being engineered by national groups that say they are nonpartisan but that are ideologically aligned with either the Republican or Democratic parties.

The leading conservative group is the American Center for Voting Rights, an organization created last year that lobbied for many of the new laws and now coordinates the legal strategy to defend them from challenges. The group's primary lawyer is Mark "Thor" Hearne, a St. Louis-based veteran of the Florida recount in the 2000 presidential race who served as national election law counsel for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign.

The opposing side is somewhat less centralized, with cases being brought by several groups, among them People for the American Way, the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Assn. of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN). These groups share strategy and have formed a coalition called the National Network on State Election Reform.

The Democratic National Committee has supported lawsuits in some states, and officials say the party is intensifying its efforts to combat the new laws. The party's national chairman, Howard Dean, last month announced a drive to recruit 7,500 pro bono lawyers and law students to assist in an "election protection program."

In court so far, challenges to the voter identification laws have met with mixed results. Judges have halted two versions of the Georgia law, but a law has been upheld in Indiana.

Challenges are pending elsewhere.

"With voter ID and registration, this is where the current battles over election practices are now being fought," said Dan Tokaji, an Ohio State University law professor who publishes the election-law blog Equal Vote.

Late last month, Hearne, the lawyer for the conservative American Center for Voting Rights, scrambled to prepare after a Missouri judge scheduled hearings on that state's voter identification law.

He lined up a disabled voter who backs the ID law, a supportive state legislator, and a study by two University of Missouri professors with which he intends to counter his opponents' claims that the law would disenfranchise more than 170,000 voters.

The study, for which Hearne said he paid the professors a "minimal amount," concludes that fewer than 20,000 registered voters lack a photo ID, and of those, about 6,000 would probably turn out to vote.

Hearne said he was inspired to delve into the details of election law after 2000, when on election day he found himself in court arguing against a move by Democrats to delay the closing of some St. Louis polling sites.

"They were arguing for a plaintiff who wound up to be dead. It was a fiction," he said. "I thought I had walked into a John Grisham novel."

DOJ_NMG_0061620

Weeks later, Hearne joined GOP lawyers in Broward County, Fla., examining dimpled chads and other disputed ballots in the presidential contest.

Hearne said he did not coordinate with the Republican Party, and he vigorously denied that his goal was to suppress Democratic votes.

A spokesman for the Republican National Committee, Danny Diaz, said the party was closely monitoring the cases across the country but was not directly involved in coordinating strategy.

Still, the party has advised at least one state on election law. In a March e-mail obtained by The Times, the Republican National Committee's deputy counsel advised an Arizona official that the state was free to require proof of U.S. citizenship for newly registered voters, as the new state law mandates.

The lawyer wrote that the state did not have to follow an opinion to the contrary written by the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, the panel created by the 2002 Help America Vote Act to guide the administration of federal elections.

The Republican National Committee lawyer, Sean Cairncross, wrote to Kevin Tyne, the top deputy to Arizona's Republican secretary of state, advising that the commission ruling was "simply wrong on the facts and the law."

"Good to talk to you," Cairncross wrote atop a list of bulleted arguments against the commission finding. "Here are a few thoughts — please let me know however else I [can] help."

Tyne forwarded the e-mail to state Election Director Joe Kanefield, writing simply, "fyi."

Kanefield said in an interview that the e-mail came because the Republican National Committee had called offering advice, and that Arizona officials had not solicited it.

A party official said the advice was offered to "provide clarity" in an "unprecedented" situation.

In the Phoenix courtroom, opponents of the state law argued that thousands could be disenfranchised by the new identification rules. The state's lawyers said those estimates were inflated.

A lawyer for the state argued that the voting system was vulnerable to fraud by impersonators and noncitizens; lawyers fighting the new law said there was little to no evidence of past fraud.

One of the lawyers for groups challenging the law, David Rosenbaum, pointed out that the law required no identification from people casting absentee ballots by mail, and that whites were over three times more likely to vote that way than were minorities — a clear case of discrimination, he said.

Silver on Monday refused to halt the law before today's Arizona primary, but she asked for more evidence regarding claims that the new registration requirements might violate voters' civil rights.

Lawyers on both sides expect that whatever she rules will be reviewed by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. Ultimately, the Supreme Court is likely to have the final say on that case and others.

Poll pattern

Republican state lawmakers across the country have sought election-law changes they argue would reduce fraud. Democrats and their allies say the measures are designed to suppress the votes of traditional Democratic constituencies such as blacks, the poor and seniors. Here is a sampling:

State: Arizona

Action: Proposition 200, approved by voters in 2004, requires proof of U.S. citizenship when registering and identification when casting ballots.

Result: Voting provisions are being challenged in federal court.

State: Missouri

Action: A new law requires voters to present photo ID. Voters without an ID can use a provisional ballot until 2008, when only seniors, the disabled or those with religious objections to obtaining a photo ID will be allowed to cast provisional ballots.

Result: The law is being challenged in state and federal courts.

State: Georgia

Action: Republicans have tried to require photo IDs at the polls. A 2005 law was ruled unconstitutional becaue of the difficulty and cost of obtaining an ID. A new law passed this year makes free IDs available, with some restrictions.

Result: A judge temporarily halted the law before elections in July. Litigation is pending.

State: Ohio

Action: A new rule set criminal penalties for violating voter registration policies. Critics said this placed a punitive burden on organizations that register voters.

Result: Struck down by a federal judge.

State: Florida

Action: GOP-dominated Legislature passed a law imposing steep fines on voter registration organizations that violate guidelines.

Result: A federal judge blocked enforcement.

State: Indiana

Action: A law passed last year requires most voters to present a state-issued photo ID at the polls. The law was challenged by the Democratic Party and other interest groups.

Result: A federal judge ruled in April that opponents failed to prove it was too burdensome.

State: New Mexico

Action: Last year Albuquerque voters approved an amendment to the city's election law requiring a photo ID when voting in person.

Result: Challenged by the ACLU in federal court.

State: Wisconsin

Action: The GOP-led Legislature has repeatedly approved laws requiring a photo ID to vote, but the bills have been vetoed by Democratic Gov. James Doyle.

Result: Republicans are seeking a state constitutional amendment.

New Help For Overseas Voters (WP)

The Pentagon is counting on an improved Web site to help an estimated 6.5 million Americans -- including U.S. troops at war and others living overseas -- vote in the November elections, and to avoid the problems of the 2000 presidential election.

Officials said this month that the site, for the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program, now includes information on how voters can request and get ballots by fax and e-mail rather than rely on slower postal service. The Defense Department is responsible for the balloting process not only for troops but for all expatriate voters.

The potential voters include all 1.4 million active-duty service members in the United States and abroad, about 1.4 million of their family members, and 3.7 million other Americans living outside the country, said Polli Brunelli, director of the voting assistance program. The total includes about 225,000 troops deployed in Iraq, in Afghanistan and elsewhere around the world.

Michael L. Dominguez, principal deputy undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness, noted the "special challenge of reaching the deployed warrior on the battlefield."

Officials have been working on voting methods, particularly after some troops said they did not vote in the 2000 presidential election because they never received ballots, got them too late or did not know how to request them.

Military voting problems created an uproar in that election when some ballots were rejected in Florida, where George W. Bush's razor-thin margin of victory gave him the presidency after an extended legal battle. Several hundred absentee ballots from troops abroad were thrown out in the state for lack of postmarks, as required by state law, or other flaws such as missing signatures.

The Pentagon had been hoping to do away with some problems by starting Internet voting. But a 2003 pilot program that would have allowed up to 100,000 military personnel and overseas civilians from seven states to vote online was canceled after outside security experts reported that hackers or terrorists could penetrate the system.

In a conference call with reporters, Dominguez mentioned that Sen. Conrad Burns (Mont.), one of the most endangered Republican incumbents, sponsored legislation in which Congress appropriated $2.5 million to help apply Web technologies to the process in which voters request and receive ballots.

ANTITRUST:

Board Members At Bristol-Myers Told To Fire CEO (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou And Barbara Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Directors at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. head into a board meeting today facing heavy pressure to fire Chief Executive Officer Peter R. Dolan and the drug maker's general counsel after a federal monitor overseeing the New York company urged their dismissal last night.

The board, which already was expected to discuss Mr. Dolan's fate at its meeting today after the latest in a long string of missteps, has little choice but to accept the monitor's recommendation. Bristol-Myers is operating under the terms of a deferred-prosecution agreement reached with the U.S. Attorney in New Jersey last year following a three-year investigation into a $2.5 billion scandal at the company involving "channel stuffing," or overloading wholesalers with inventory to meet quarterly sales targets. If the board refuses to fire Mr. Dolan, the company could face charges in connection with the probe.

The Bristol-Myers monitor, former federal Judge Frederick B. Lacey, recommended to a special session of the company's board late yesterday that it terminate Mr. Dolan and Bristol-Myers General Counsel Richard Willard, according to a person familiar with the matter. The meeting was attended by the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey, Christopher Christie, who appointed Mr. Lacey last year in the settlement agreement.

Mr. Lacey made his recommendation after finding Bristol-Myers's actions in pursuing a pact to delay generic competition to the company's best-selling drug, the blockbuster blood-thinner Plavix, violated the terms of the deferred-prosecution agreement, the person said. It wasn't clear what specific actions Mr. Lacey was concerned about, but companies under such agreements are broadly expected to be on their best behavior. The Plavix deal unraveled after the Justice Department's antitrust unit opened a criminal probe into it and the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided Mr. Dolan's office in July.

A spokesman for Bristol-Myers declined to comment last night. Messrs. Dolan and Willard weren't available to comment, the spokesman said.

Mr. Dolan's removal would mark the third ouster of a chief executive of a big U.S. drug company in the past 16 months, underscoring the difficulties facing an industry reeling from an unprecedented number of patent expirations, increasing litigation costs and heightened competition from nimble generic-drug makers. Though still highly profitable, branded-drug makers also face financial pressure from pharmacy-benefit managers, who use their negotiating power and quick access to new generic pills to leverage lower drug prices.

Merck & Co., Whitehouse Station, N.J., last year pushed then-CEO Raymond Gilmartin into early retirement after withdrawing the painkiller Vioxx from the market in 2004. Pfizer Inc., the world's biggest drug maker, ousted Henry McKinnell in late July, replacing him with a former lawyer. As at Bristol-Myers, the stocks of both companies have been battered in the past two years.

Under the terms of its deferred-prosecution agreement, by which it avoided charges of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, Bristol-Myers was supposed to stay out of trouble for two years to avoid an indictment. The agreement, which gave Mr. Lacey unusually broad oversight powers, also forced Mr. Dolan to surrender his chairman title to a senior member of the Bristol-Myers board, James B. Robinson III.

Mr. Lacey, who was appointed to monitor the drug maker for two years through next April, has been attending all the company's board meetings and filing regular reports to Mr. Christie. As part of the agreement, he was given free reign to recommend changes at the company to keep it within bounds.

The board's only recourse if it disagrees with Mr. Lacey's recommendations is an appeal to Mr. Christie. Mr. Lacey briefed Mr. Christie and obtained his backing before speaking to the board about Mr. Dolan, said the person familiar with the situation.

Mr. Dolan's handling of Plavix already had put him on shaky ground with the board. After learning that the company's Plavix cash-cow was under threat from generic competition, he negotiated a deal that would have paid Canada's Apotex Inc. tens of millions of dollars to delay its introduction of a copycat drug. That pact, aimed at settling Apotex's legal challenge of the Plavix patent, unraveled in late July when the Department of Justice's antitrust division opened an investigation into it and state attorneys general rejected it.

In filings to the federal court in New York overseeing the patent litigation, Apotex has alleged that Bristol-Myers struck a verbal side agreement with it during the settlement negotiations that it then hid from regulators. A lawyer for Bristol-Myers has denied this to the court and has suggested that Apotex fabricated the allegation to torpedo the settlement.

In the meantime, Apotex used binding concessions it obtained during the negotiations to launch a knockoff version on Aug. 8, after the deal was rejected by regulators. The generic version quickly conquered 75% of the market, costing Bristol-Myers as much as $600 million in lost sales. The court overseeing the patent case ordered Apotex to stop selling the generic version on Aug. 31, but didn't force it to recall the product already in the distribution channel.

Bristol-Myers pursued the deal with Apotex even though U.S. regulators have been hostile to such agreements on the grounds that they hurt consumers by keeping lower cost versions of life-saving drugs off the market. The Federal Trade Commission has criticized similar deals and has fought one of them all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Bristol-Myers board already planned to discuss Mr. Dolan's future at its regularly scheduled meeting today, even before Mr. Lacey convened a special session yesterday. The board had become worried that the Plavix debacle, coming on top of a series of other controversies during Mr. Dolan's five-year tenure, had so angered shareholders that it was impairing his ability to lead the company effectively. Bristol-Myers shares have fallen nearly 60% since Mr. Dolan became CEO in May 2001.

Nine board members attended last night's special session, according to a person familiar with the matter. No one from management was there, though two lawyers, Mary Jo White and Kenneth Conboy, were on hand to advise the board. After Mr. Lacey briefed board members and issued his recommendation, Mr. Christie spoke to the board and signaled he supported Mr. Lacey's recommendation. The recommendation to fire the two executives "was made from a corporate-governance perspective in the handling of the patent issue over Plavix," the person familiar with the matter said, declining to provide further details.

If Mr. Dolan does go, the board is unlikely to name a permanent successor to Mr. Dolan immediately because it doesn't have a succession plan in place and no executive inside the company is thought to be experienced enough to be CEO, say people familiar with the board's thinking.

Instead, directors might name one of Mr. Dolan's lieutenants to lead the company on an interim basis while they search for a permanent successor. Among the executives the board could appoint to handle the transition are: Andrew Bonfield, the chief financial officer; research chief Elliott Sigal; Anthony Hooper, head of U.S. pharmaceuticals; and Lamberto Andreotti, head of world-wide pharmaceuticals.

Among the potential candidates to succeed Mr. Dolan is Karen Katen, Pfizer's former co-vice chairman and head of human health who lost out in a horse race to succeed Mr. McKinnell, say people familiar with the matter.

Dismissal Recommended For Bristol Chief (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

A court-appointed overseer has recommended that the embattled head of Bristol-Myers Squibb be fired for his recent handling of a patent dispute that led to a criminal investigation, according to a participant in a meeting last evening where the recommendation was made.

If the board takes the action at a meeting today, it would end a troubled five-year tenure for the executive, Peter R. Dolan.

The board appears bound to abide by the recommendation from Frederick B. Lacey, a former federal judge. Mr. Lacey is monitoring the company's behavior under the terms of an agreement the company reached with the federal government last year in hopes of avoiding criminal prosecution for an accounting scandal.

The only reprieve for Mr. Dolan could be granted by Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in New Jersey who is the prosecutor in that case. He has the power to overturn Mr. Lacey's recommendation. But it appeared that Mr. Christie, who was present for Mr. Lacey's meeting last night with most of the company's 11 directors, supported the recommendation to remove Mr. Dolan, according to the participant.

Mr. Dolan, who serves on the board, was not present at the meeting, which was held at corporate headquarters on Park Avenue in Manhattan.

Neither Mr. Dolan nor James D. Robinson III, the chairman of Bristol-Myers's board, could immediately be reached for comment. Tony Plorohos, a spokesman for the Bristol-Myers, said the company would not comment last night.

Mr. Dolan, 50, would become the third chief executive of a major pharmaceutical company to leave ahead of schedule in the last 18 months.

In July, Pfizer's board abruptly replaced Hank McKinnell as chief executive amid shareholder disappointment and questions about Mr. McKinnell's management style.

In May 2005, Merck forced Raymond V. Gilmartin, its chairman and chief executive, to resign. Mr. Gilmartin was forced out in part because of Merck's problems with Vioxx, a painkiller that Merck stopped selling in 2004 after it was linked to heart attacks and strokes.

Mr. Lacey's recommendation about Mr. Dolan stems from Bristol-Myers's conduct this year in a patent dispute involving its blockbuster anti-clotting agent Plavix, according to the person who attended the meeting.

Under the terms of the federal agreement in the accounting scandal, the company was obliged to demonstrate good conduct and improve its corporate governance and remain under supervision by Mr. Lacey at least through the end of this year. In the overseer's view, Bristol-Myers has evidently breached a portion of the agreement by its handling of efforts, along with its marketing partner Sanofi-Aventis, to settle the Plavix dispute with a Canadian generic drug maker.

The Justice Department is thought to be investigating claims that Bristol-Myers tried to conceal portions of a proposed agreement to settle its patent dispute with the Canadian company, Apotex, hiding those details from the Federal Trade Commission and state attorneys general who were reviewing its antitrust implications.

Mr. Lacey also recommended that the board fire Richard K. Willard, who was hired as general counsel last October. Mr. Williard's role in the Plavix case is not publicly known, but it would have been his job to approve the Apotex agreement.

Even before last evening's recommendation, Mr. Dolan's employment status was uncertain before a regularly scheduled board meeting to be held today.

Whatever the merits of the wrongdoing allegations, the court record in the patent case has shown that Bristol-Myers did make significant concessions during the settlement negotiations that paved the way last month for Apotex to flood the market with millions of dollars worth of a cheaper, generic version of Plavix.

DOJ_NMG_0061625

Under those concessions, Bristol-Myers and Sanofi waived their right under federal law to seek triple financial damages if Apotex began selling its generic drug. And they agreed to give Apotex a five-day head start once it started selling the generic, before they would try to block those sales in court.

Those concessions were made as the parties negotiated a settlement under which the Canadian company would agree not to introduce its Plavix competitor until 2011, shortly before the patent is set to expire. Only if regulators refused to accept that agreement were the concessions to take effect.

People involved in Bristol-Myers's negotiations in the patent settlement have since said that the company made the concessions only as an inducement to Apotex to reach an agreement, which they had expected regulators to approve.

But Mr. Sherman of Apotex has said he entered the negotiations only to win those concessions, because he did not think the government would approve the settlement deal. When regulators did reject the deal, Apotex almost immediately began shipping its generic Plavix competitor.

Federal District Judge Sidney H. Stein, who is overseeing the patent dispute, ordered Apotex to suspend the shipments on Aug. 31. But the volume of the generic drug already on the market has forced Mr. Dolan's company to reduce its earnings forecast for the year by as much as 25 percent. Plavix is Bristol-Myers's top-selling drug, with sales last year of $3.5 billion.

Financial analysts had been speculating that the Bristol-Myers directors were under pressure to act.

Earlier yesterday, a Morgan Stanley analyst, Jami Rubin, said that she believed there was a significant chance Mr. Dolan's tenure at Bristol-Myers would be over.

"The decision to settle with Apotex backfired on the company," Ms. Rubin said. "Just given the pressure on most boards of directors today, they've got to act. And I think that the credibility of management has been put into question. I think that means the board of directors will consider whether they want to keep him. I think there is clearly a risk."

Some individual investors had also complained. Dundas I. Flaherty of Malibu, Calif., has seen his 152,000 shares shrink to a third of their peak value. And he blamed Mr. Dolan for many of the company's problems.

The company's stock, which closed yesterday at $23.67, is off more than 10 percent from the period before Apotex began shipping its generic drug and nearly 60 percent since Mr. Dolan became chief executive in 2001.

Mr. Flaherty wrote Mr. Robinson a letter Aug. 9, the day after Apotex announced it would begin shipping its generic version of Plavix.

"I think the right thing to do is show him the door," Mr. Flaherty said yesterday, referring to Mr. Dolan.

Responding to the Justice Department investigation, which included a search on July 26 of Mr. Dolan's Park Avenue office, Bristol-Myers has been saying that neither Mr. Dolan nor any other company official did anything illegal. In court, a lawyer for Sanofi-Aventis and Bristol-Myers argued that the allegations were contrived by Bernard C. Sherman, Apotex's chief executive, in pursuit of his goal to get the generic Plavix on the market.

Bristol-Myers's reduced earnings estimate of 95 cents a share is now below the company's dividend of $1.12, meaning that the company would pay out more to investors in dividends than it makes. Still, Mr. Dolan and other company executives have recently been assuring investors that the dividend is safe for now.

While no clear candidate emerged yesterday for Mr. Dolan's job, the board's options if he left would include installing an interim chief from among current executives or name a caretaker chief from the board.

Mr. Dolan was named chief executive on May 1, 2001, after having served in managerial roles with the company since 1988. His tenure has been marked by a series of difficulties, some that Mr. Dolan said he inherited and others that appeared to be of his own making.

During his tenure, Bristol-Myers has faced the failure of two major experimental products: the blood pressure medication Vanlev and the diabetes drug Pargluva, both abandoned after it became clear they would not be approved by the Food and Drug Administration.

And investors raised questions about other decisions by Mr. Dolan, like his purchase for $2 billion of a 19 percent stake in ImClone, the company that makes the cancer drug Erbitux. Although Erbitux is on the market and considered successful, there have been complaints that Bristol-Myers paid too much for its share.

Yet Mr. Dolan claimed he inherited the major stain on his legacy — the $2.5 billion accounting scandal involving accusations that Bristol-Myers was providing incentives to wholesalers to buy excess inventory. The practice, called channel stuffing, was the subject of a Justice Department investigation that ended last year with the deferred-prosecution agreement.

Under that agreement, Mr. Dolan was forced to relinquish his title as chairman but was allowed to retain his chief executive's job, subject to the discretion of Mr. Lacey.

While some analysts, citing the company's intriguing pipeline of new products, had recently said they believed that Mr. Dolan was turning the company around, the Plavix debacle led many of them to conclude that Bristol-Myers had been outmaneuvered by Apotex.

Bristol Board Urged To Fire CEO, Company Lawyer (MRKTWTCH)

By Marketwatch

Market Watch, September 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s embattled chief executive has one more strike against him Monday night after a federal monitor reportedly urged his board to fire him following a series of lapses, including his failure to delay generic competition for a blood-thinning drug.

Frederick Lacey, a former federal judge, has urged the board of Bristol-Myers to dismiss CEO Peter Dolan along with Richard Willard, the general counsel, The Wall Street Journal reported in its online edition, citing an unnamed person familiar with the matter.

The board scheduled a meeting for Tuesday to consider Lacey's report.

According to the Journal, Lacey reached his recommendation after concluding that the company violated the terms of a deferred-prosecution agreement in pursuing a deal to delay generic competition to the blood-thinner, Plavix.

Calls to officials at the New York-based company weren't immediately returned.

Earlier this month, Bristol-Myers, which co-markets Plavix with Sanofi-Aventis, lowered its expected 2006 earnings, citing sales of a generic version of Plavix. At that time, the company said it expected annual earnings from continuing operations of no less than 95 cents per share, down from its July view of $1.15 to $1.25 a share. See full story.

In June 2005, Bristol-Myers reached a settlement with the Justice Department for $300 million to end a long-running government investigation into its accounting. At that time, the company conceded that it had engaged in questionable practices, inflating sales by $2.5 billion and net earnings by $900 million between 1999 and 2001.

Part of the investigation dealt with allegations of "channel stuffing," or offering financial incentives to wholesalers to stockpile the company's products.

After that agreement, Dolan relinquished his additional title of chairman but remained on the board.

Bristol-Myers shares closed Monday at $23.39, up 0.9%.

Commission Takes Over Germany's Intel Probe (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

European regulators have expanded their antitrust probe against Intel to include charges that the world's largest chipmaker tried to prevent retailers from offering computers powered by rival microprocessors.

The European Commission, which has been investigating Intel's business practices for more than five years, said yesterday it had taken over a probe that was started by Germany's Federal Cartel Office this year.

The investigation centres on allegations that Intel attempted to hurt Advanced Micro Devices, its rival, by cutting off the company's access to the Media Markt and Saturn retail outlets. Owned by Metro, the German retail group, the chains are Europe's biggest computer retailers.

A spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, said the Commission and the German regulator had agreed that it would make more sense for Brussels to take on this probe.

The Commission, he added, was already "looking into a range of tactics used by Intel to limit marketpenetration of AMD".

DOJ_NMG_0061627

A spokesman for AMD said: "We are pleased to learn that DG Competition [the Commission's antitrust arm] is examining Intel's exclusive relationship with Media Saturn Holding. We are confident that DG Competition will conclude what the industry has known for years; that Intel has entered into an exclusivity agreement with Europe's largest computer retailer."

Intel is the dominant force in the global market for microchips, with a market share of about 80 per cent. AMD, its only rival, has said for years that its business has suffered because of Intel's allegedly illegal businesses practices, and has complained to antitrust watchdogs globally. It has also launched a private litigation case against Intel in the US.

As part of its investigation, the Commission raided the offices of Intel and several computer manufacturers last year. The next step would be for Brussels to issue formal antitrust charges against the US chipmaker, a move that could ultimately lead to painful financial penalties for Intel.

A spokesman for Intel said: "We plan to co-operate with the staff of the European Commission. We believe our business practices are lawful."

EU Takes Over German Antitrust Inquiry Into Intel (CNET)

By Dawn Kawamoto, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 12, 2006

Regulators take over a German antitrust investigation of allegations that Intel persuaded a retailer to forgo AMD processors.

European Commission regulators have taken over a German antitrust investigation into allegations that Intel put pressure on a major electronics retailer to forgo using processors from competitor Advanced Micro Devices.

Germany's antitrust agency, Bundeskartellamt, received a complaint from AMD alleging that Intel had abused its dominant market position by putting pressure on major electronics retailer Media Markt to not sell AMD's chips. Because the Commission found similarities with its existing probe into Intel, it took over the German investigation in late August, Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said.

"We have liaised with the Bundeskartellamt...and come to a common understanding that it would make more sense if these charges could be dealt with by the European Commission," Todd said. "Bearing in mind that (the suspected actions) seem to belong to a set of practices that is already under scrutiny by the Commission...a range of tactics used by Intel to limit the market share of AMD."

Intel will cooperate with the EU investigation, as it has done over the past five years, said Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy, who added that the company believes its actions are "fair and lawful."

Last year, the Commission raided several European Intel offices as well as offices of companies that manufacture or sell computers.

Other countries have weighed in with their own investigations into Intel's business practices. Earlier this year, the Korean Fair Trade Commission sought more documents from Intel relating to its antitrust investigation into the chip giant.

And last year, Intel agreed to abide by recommendations from the Japan Fair Trade Commission, which had launched its own probe. The recommendations called for Intel to halt its practice of requiring PC makers to restrict the use of competitors' chips in exchange for monetary rebates. Intel accepted the recommendations but disagreed with the facts underlying the allegations.

EU To Investigate AMD Complaint Against Intel (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby, William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

BRUSSELS -- European regulators expanded a long-running antitrust probe of Intel Corp., agreeing to review allegations the chip maker pressured a unit of German retailer Metro AG not to sell computers powered by Advanced Micro Devices Inc. chips.

AMD, based in Sunnyvale, Calif., filed a complaint over the summer to the German antitrust office, the Bundeskartellamt, alleging Metro's Media Markt unit signed exclusive agreements with Intel to sell personal computers using only Intel chips. After an investigation, German antitrust authorities handed the matter over to the European Union regulators, who will decide whether to pursue it.

"The commission is concerned that Intel has been putting pressure on Media Markt not to stock computers that include AMD chips," European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said.

Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy said the Media Markt complaint isn't new and was included in U.S. litigation AMD filed against Intel in 2005. "We have been cooperating with regulators and intend to continue to do that," Mr. Mulloy said. "We believe our business practices are both fair and lawful."

A spokesman for Metro's consumer-electronics unit declined to comment.

Since 2001, EU regulators have been investigating whether Intel uses its dominant market position to discourage retailers from buying computers and other products powered by AMD chips. Last year, the commission searched Intel's offices in Europe for evidence of alleged illegal anticompetitive behavior, such as offering loyalty rebates to customers.

If regulators decide Intel broke European antitrust rules, the commission would issue a "statement of objections" outlining its specific concerns. Recent success in the marketplace by AMD prompted the commission's top antitrust civil servant, Philip Lowe to suggest the case had lost some urgency.

Yesterday, commission spokesman Mr. Todd said AMD's recent increased sales didn't augur an end to the probe. AMD spokesman Jens Drews said he believed regulators would disregard AMD's recent market gains and focus on whether Intel had used illegal anticompetitive practices.

How Hartmut Pilch, Avid Computer Geek, Bested Microsoft (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

BRUSSELS -- A proposal here to create a new European patents court has the support of Microsoft Corp., Siemens AG and many other giants of Western industry. But can it survive an attack from Hartmut Pilch?

A 43-year-old linguist from Munich, Mr. Pilch speaks Chinese, Japanese and an artificial language called Lojban intended to eliminate ambiguity and promoted by some programmers. He is the unlikely leader of a movement of self-styled computer geeks out to sink a patents plan they say would stifle software programmers.

"Patents on software mean any programmer can be sued at any time," says Mr. Pilch, a simultaneous translator who writes computer programs for his own use in his leisure time.

In July last year, heeding appeals posted on the Web site of Mr. Pilch's lobbying group, about 200 programmers descended on the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France, waving signs demanding the right to freely exchange computer code. "U.S. Software Patents Go Out," read a banner, in English, held aloft by two young Frenchmen.

The Parliament was poised to approve a law extending American-style software patents to Europe, the most lucrative consumer market outside the U.S. A technology industry group had hired a boat to cruise the river outside Parliament with a banner urging the lawmakers on. The programmers rented canoes and paddled out to the boat to unfurl their own banner: "Software Patents Kill Innovation." The president of the Parliament later called the incident a "naval battle."

The unhappy result for the big technology companies: A panicky Parliament suddenly backed off a law the industry giants had spent several years and millions of euros lobbying to enact. "It was the sheer volume and number of people," said Parliament member Sharon Bowles of Britain, a patent attorney and industry ally. The surprise winners: U.S. software companies Red Hat Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc., the only large companies that had taken public stands against the software patents law.

Today, the battle has shifted to an effort to create a special patents court that would handle appeals cases from all over Europe. Companies like Microsoft support the idea in large part because many national courts currently reject software patents, bucking rulings by the European-wide patent office.

Mr. Pilch wants to maintain the antisoftware patent status quo, and so do the European programmers and students who belong to his group, the Foundation for a Free Information Infrastructure. Known as FFII, the organization is committed to the idea that basic computer language should be as free as human speech.

Mr. Pilch calls his mission vital to keeping Europe free from the lawsuits over digital rights that he claims increasingly hamper innovation in the U.S. Software around the world already is adequately protected from theft by copyright laws, he says.

Mr. Pilch's opponents liken FFII to a bunch of communists who don't want companies to profit from what they create. "They do sound closer to Karl Marx than Adam Smith," said Mark MacGann, executive director of the European Information & Communications Technology Industry Association, which represents Philips Electronics NV, SAP AG, Microsoft and more than 70 other companies backing software patents.

Mr. Pilch counters: "That's not true. I want to make money, too." He admits, however, that he became so absorbed in lobbying last year that he forgot to bill clients in the small translation business he operates out of a run-down office in Munich.

Mr. Pilch began FFII in 1998, as little more than a Web site. As news spread, he began getting small donations from like-minded programmers and small businesses. His growing cadre of volunteers, however, struggled to remember the Lojban words, such as "Cnino" ("news") and "Penmi" ("events"), that Mr. Pilch used to name FFII email lists.

"It would have been easier just to call them 'news' and 'events,' " says German university student Andre Rebentisch, who helps administer the lists. Still, more than 200 people eventually registered to help maintain FFII's member-edited site.

In 2002, the European Commission, the executive arm of the European Union, proposed the law that drew FFII's ire. It aimed to elevate the European Patent Office and its pro-software patent policies over the national courts. The EU's argument: A simpler, more unified patent system would make Europe's economy more competitive. Mr. Pilch's FFII put out a statement saying the proposal "paves the way to a global control of the information society by multinational -- mostly U.S." technology companies.

In April 2004, as the debate heated up, several hundred FFII demonstrators marched around European Union offices in Brussels in yellow "No Software Patents" T-shirts. They hoisted banners slamming Microsoft. Some demonstrators wore Che Guevara-style berets meant to symbolize a revolution against the Redmond, Wash., company's dominance of software markets. A Microsoft spokesman declined to comment.

Buoyed by $61,000 in grants from the Open Society Institute, the philanthropy of billionaire George Soros, FFII sent an army of students to lobby EU lawmakers. "Sometimes they would just burst in the door and demand to see you," says Ms. Bowles, the pro-patent member of Parliament. "Some of them didn't seem to understand the concept of making an appointment."

Mr. Pilch spent so much time lobbying that he began showing up exhausted for his day job in Munich. Japanese and Chinese clients were furious, says his Chinese-born wife, Wang Tao. Because he was forgetting to bill for his work, money was tight. The couple's two small children hardly ever saw him. "The marriage almost broke up," Ms. Wang says.

The grass-roots show of force worked. At the 2005 meeting in Strasbourg, pro-industry members of Parliament abandoned the proposed software law. "They produced a whole movement," said German Parliament member Klaus-Heiner Lehne, who led the unsuccessful push for the law. "Industry was sleeping."

FFII has reorganized to fight the proposal for a patent court. Prodded by his wife, Mr. Pilch has ceded day-to-day control of the group to Pieter Hintjens, owner of a small software business. Mr. Hintjens, a Belgian, was elected president at an FFII board meeting and keg party in Brussels last November, which, he says, "lasted until the beer ran out."

In July, the EU held a hearing in Brussels on the new patent court and related proposals. FFII activists packed the room, applauding loudly when speakers criticized the court. His group still is short of cash, Mr. Hintjens says. But he believes the movement has an asset even more vital than money: "a burning, true, almost religious conviction that we are right."

Hot Seat To Protect Its Box-Office Turf, Ticketmaster Plays Rivals' Tune (WSJ)

By Ethan Smith And Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Reselling sports and concert tickets online has become a multibillion-dollar business for eBay Inc., StubHub Inc. and other middlemen. Now the concert and sports industry -- and Ticketmaster, which sells the majority of seats -- are fighting to take back some of that money.

A division of Barry Diller's IAC/InterActiveCorp, Ticketmaster is overhauling the way it sells tickets, embracing new methods that it long shunned. It is now running auctions to sell seats for roughly 30% of this year's major music tours -- including Pink Floyd's Roger Waters, Barbra Streisand, Madonna, B.B. King and Melissa Etheridge. Ticketmaster also is letting customers resell some seats at its Web site. Since that lets fans sell tickets far above face value, Ticketmaster has joined the fight against state antiscalping laws, reversing its earlier position.

Journal reporter Ethan Smith talks about how Ticketmaster is defending itself against the rise of online ticket-reselling services.2

Concert promoters, performers and sports teams stand to win if the new methods at Ticketmaster reduce scalper sales -- and return some of the proceeds to their own coffers.

Ticketmaster, which for 15 years has held a near-monopoly over the market for ticketing major live events, is battling competition from online rivals that can easily resell tickets at whatever price the market will bear. The result is a marketplace in the throes of upheaval, confronting a pricing system that everyone agrees is dysfunctional.

Tickets for live events are frequently either overpriced -- leading to potentially disastrous sales shortfalls -- or underpriced, opening the door for scalpers. "We're in an industry that prices its product worse than anybody else," says Ticketmaster Chairman Terry Barnes. People in the concert industry estimate that only 45% of tickets made available to the public end up being sold.

Last year, the number of concert tickets sold in the U.S. fell, although prices and overall ticket revenue continued to rise. The average price of a ticket to the 100 top-grossing shows hit a record $57 in 2005, according to Pollstar, a trade magazine, up nearly 9% from 2004's average of $52.39. In 2005, the number of tickets sold fell to 67.4 million, down nearly 7% from 72.2 million in 2004.

Prices for Barbra Streisand's coming tour, for example, are setting records, with top-tier seats carrying face values of $750 through Ticketmaster. Sales have been slow, with excellent seats going unsold in Atlanta, Columbus, Ohio, and other cities. That, in turn, has undercut Ticketmaster and Ms. Streisand's efforts to sell some of those seats at auction for even higher prices.

At the same time, sales of seats by resellers has thrived, thanks to the Internet. By some estimates, the U.S. secondary market reached $5 billion in 2005 -- nearly equal to the face value of all the tickets sold by Ticketmaster that year.

"The Internet has opened up the world of reselling tickets to anybody," says Arthur Fogel, chairman of concert-promotion giant Live Nation Inc.'s music division. That rankles Ticketmaster, concert promoters and musicians, who generally haven't benefited financially from this extra revenue. "That secondary-market money, we think belongs in the industry," says Ticketmaster's Mr. Barnes.

Ticketmaster began exploring auctions and other sales methods in 2003 as a way to address the disequilibrium. "On one hand, there is a small percentage of tickets, say 5% to 10%, that are priced well below their market value, and end up being resold on the secondary market for huge profits," says President and Chief Operating Officer Sean Moriarty. "And on the other hand, over 50% of tickets go unsold."

Ticketmaster now makes auctions available as an option to concert promoters, venues, performers and sports teams. For any given show, clients decide how many seats to put up for auction -- and set the opening bid prices. The bidding process is similar to that of Web auctioneer eBay. A fan enters the maximum he or she is willing to pay, along with a credit-card number, and can follow competing bids online.

When country stars Tim McGraw and Faith Hill played a concert last month at Phoenix's U.S. Airways Center arena, ticket prices ranged from $49 to $125. Marcus Ridgway, a 36-year-old real-estate developer from Mesa, Ariz., paid $700 on a Ticketmaster auction for a pair of seats close enough to touch the country stars as they strutted on a catwalk.

Performers also argue that they -- not brokers -- should participate in any windfall from resold tickets. Mr. McGraw spent the summer on the road with his wife and fellow star, Ms. Hill. The duo largely financed the tour, which required a staff of 122 traveling with 22 trucks and 13 buses. After watching scalpers resell $125 seats online for $1,000 or more, manager Scott Siman declares: "We would like to tap into that profit instead of somebody else."

Ticketmaster's early efforts suggest even limited auctions can help offset scalping activity. Jim Guerinot, a manager, says his client Nine Inch Nails auctioned fewer than 10% of the tickets on a tour last summer but saw a significant decrease in online reselling. "We watched eBay and [scalping activity] was way down," he says.

Ticketmaster also is pushing its own resale program. Launched in 2002, "TicketExchange" has proven most popular for sporting events, letting season-ticket holders unload seats they won't use.

In 2005, Ticketmaster customers resold 329,000 tickets this way, up from 83,000 the year before. Ticketmaster and the promoter, venue or team share an undisclosed percentage of the sale price, while the seller keeps the rest. Ticketmaster allows reselling on TicketExchange only when its clients agree.

Ticketmaster's revenue jumped to $950 million in 2005, up almost 24% from 2004, partly as a result of strong sales in Canada and higher sales from recent acquisitions in Sweden, Finland and Australia. The bulk of Ticketmaster's revenue comes from fees it adds on top of the face value of tickets, accounting for 30% or more of the final cost. It is the cash cow for parent company IAC. For the quarter ending June 30, the company's ticketing division had $295 million in sales and produced $69 million in operating income, the bulk of IAC's total operating income of $81 million.

Fighting Back

Ticketmaster's online rivals are fighting back, boasting that they offer a wider range of tickets in the resale market. A leading combatant is StubHub, founded in 2000 amid the tech crash by two students at Stanford University's Graduate School of Business who began devising a business plan as part of a school competition. The company expects ticket sales to hit $400 million this year -- double that of 2005 -- and to take in fees of 25% of sales, or about $100 million.

StubHub says it can maintain its edge by letting fans buy and sell any ticket for any event through its site. It pockets a fee from both buyer and seller. Ticketmaster only resells tickets when it has a resale contract with the artists, teams or venues. "In the secondary market, success is driven by relationships with the fans, whereas Ticketmaster's focus is about locking up deals with venues," says Chief Executive Jeff Fluhr.

Branching out, StubHub recently staged an auction for every seat in the house for an INXS concert at the 650-seat Lobero Theater in Santa Barbara, Calif., with the band's cooperation. Seats went for an average $50, with one pair fetching more than $500 each (a price that included an opportunity to meet the band) and a few going for just $3.

The National Hockey League's Web site has a link to StubHub for people seeking tickets to league games -- despite the fact that most NHL teams are Ticketmaster clients.

Susan Cohig, the NHL's group vice president for club services, says the StubHub link is just a paid advertisement. She adds that the league is in talks with StubHub, Ticketmaster and others about establishing an official secondary market for NHL tickets. "We have to look at how to better service our fans," she says.

Legal Barriers

The legal barriers to reselling tickets are starting to erode. Florida in June overturned a law against reselling a ticket for more than $1 above face value. Eleven states still have strong antiscalping laws, like the one Florida did away with, and nine others have weaker ones. Even in states and municipalities where such laws remain on the books, they are enforced inconsistently at best and have done little to slow the growth of the online secondary market.

Now that Ticketmaster is slugging it out in the secondary market, it has joined in lobbying for the repeal of states' antiscalping laws -- a 180-degree change from its earlier efforts to make such laws stiffer. StubHub says it also is lobbying to repeal "antiquated" state laws.

Still, StubHub ran afoul of such a law at June's NHL Stanley Cup finals in Raleigh, N.C. Police found two company employees distributing tickets from a hotel near the stadium and charged them with violating a law prohibiting the resale of tickets for more than $3 above the face value. The charges are pending. StubHub contends that its employees didn't break the law, since the company was merely allowing buyers to pick up tickets they previously had purchased online. StubHub, like eBay, says it places the burden of legal compliance with its users.

Ticketmaster executives acknowledge that the complex new marketplace has its perils for the culture of concert-going. Artists, Mr. Barnes says, still want their fans to feel that they can wake up the morning a concert goes on sale, and log on -- or line up -- to luck into a great seat: "They want to be careful not to kill the Saturday-morning dream."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Was Manure-to-Power Venture Just Bull? (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire And William Heisel

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

As he sold investors on an improbable plan for turning Inland Empire cow manure into electricity, W. Patrick Moriarty had an answer for everything.

DOJ_NMG_0061632

With a folksy delivery, the Orange County businessman promised cutting-edge technology, a respected engineering firm and tax-exempt financing to extract methane gas from mountains of manure and use it to generate enough power to light a small city.

"He told me categorically that we would get our money back with interest and that the project was as good as gold," said Shmuel Erde, a Beverly Hills lender.

What Moriarty and his business partner, Wayne Stephens, didn't tell Erde and numerous others who altogether invested more than $10 million was that their company, Chino Organic Power Inc., had no licensed technology, no equipment, no permits — not even a guaranteed supply of manure.

Although manure-to-electricity plants have been used on a small scale to turn water-polluting cow waste into power, they are not particularly cost-effective and have never produced close to the amount of electricity Moriarty envisioned, documents and interviews show.

Another thing Moriarty didn't tell Erde and the others was that he had gone to prison in the 1980s in what then-U.S. Atty. Robert C. Bonner called "the most significant corruption case in recent California history."

Not surprisingly, the lofty energy plan has come crashing down, followed by a bankruptcy and accusations from angry investors, a number of whom have filed lawsuits alleging fraud by Moriarty and Stephens, a San Bernardino County businessman.

In interviews with 20 investors, many said they now believe the entire operation was a ruse to enrich the two.

A Times review of permit applications, court records and corporate documents shows that the Chino Organic Power plant never progressed much further than the sales pitch.

Both Moriarty and Stephens have acknowledged in recent interviews that their plan never got off the drawing board. But they said they didn't defraud anyone, and they insisted that the electric plant would have worked if it hadn't been hampered by an uncertain energy market and litigious investors.

"I am absolutely very sorry if anyone, including me and Wayne, lost money — especially me," said Moriarty, 75.

Moriarty grew up in Washington state and moved to Orange County in the 1950s to expand a fireworks business he had started as a teenager. By the 1980s, Moriarty and his associates contributed nearly $600,000 to California politicians, about half of it illegally laundered to mask the source of the funds.

He used money, free vacation housing, special investment deals and patronage jobs to buy support from politicians for legislation to benefit his fireworks firm, Anaheim-based Pyrotronics Inc., and to gain support for the Commerce Casino, which he helped found.

In a scandal that ultimately produced 10 convictions, Moriarty pleaded guilty to seven mail fraud counts in 1985.

He was sentenced to seven years in prison but served 29 months after the U.S. Supreme Court limited prosecutors' use of mail fraud charges as a means of fighting corruption.

That led to a deal in 1988 in which five of the original counts against Moriarty were dropped; the two remaining counts related to kickbacks Moriarty paid to a bank official.

The roots of Chino Organic go back to 1989, when Stephens and a group of friends founded Chino Resource Recovery Inc. and set out to build a power plant fueled by cow manure. They, too, soon ran into legal troubles.

Moriarty entered the picture in 1996, introduced to Stephens by a mutual acquaintance. Soon, Moriarty became Stephens' partner in a new firm, Chino Organic Power, with a far more ambitious business plan that called for more than $150 million in tax-exempt financing and a strategy for taking the company public, according to records and interviews.

An experimental, alternative energy source was now touted as an electric utility projected to generate 85 megawatts, enough for all the homes in Chino and Chino Hills, with power to spare.

Industry and academic experts cannot cite any manure-to-electricity plant in the country that is producing more than 2 megawatts. "It's a huge, almost unbelievable plan," said Norm Scott, an agricultural engineering professor at Cornell University who has worked on such projects.

Moriarty and Stephens told investors they needed short-term loans for engineering and other development work that would be repaid once government agencies issued the bonds, the investors said in interviews.

They allege that Moriarty was a master at creating the appearance of a can't-miss project, gathering documents, letters and newspaper articles touting relationships he had with engineers, agencies and two officials who would go on to help sell the project.

The first was Bob Feenstra, head of the area's dairy industry lobbying group, the Milk Producers Council. He was Moriarty's link to the raw material: wet cow manure.

In a 2003 lawsuit filed by Erde in Los Angeles, the Beverly Hills lender alleged that Moriarty never told investors that Feenstra was a handsomely paid consultant.

A February 1999 letter from Stephens to Feenstra, now part of the court record, describes the $10,000-a-month consulting arrangement, and company checks obtained by Erde's attorneys show that Feenstra was paid more than $200,000 from 1999 to 2002. Chino Organic also bought a $4-million "key man" life insurance policy for Feenstra that shows he was poised to become its general manager.

Feenstra responded in a court declaration that he was never paid to attract investors and said he never misled anyone. He resigned from the Milk Producers Council in October.

Moriarty's other important relationship was with Richard Atwater, the chief executive of the Inland Empire Utilities Agency, which runs water and sewer lines and had an obvious interest in keeping manure from polluting the groundwater.

"Atwater became extremely important to the deal," Moriarty said. "It was an absolute home run for them and for us."

In 2001, Atwater signed an agreement supporting Chino Organic's purchase of property near the agency's headquarters for $8.8 million. If Chino Organic defaulted on its loan to buy the property, the agency would buy the property instead.

But the purchase guarantee was never approved by the agency's board and was meaningless, Jean Cihigoyenetche, the utility's attorney, told The Times.

"Atwater didn't have the authority to sign that agreement and bind the board to that," he said.

Atwater responded that he got approval from the board in a closed meeting, but he could not produce documents to show that such approval was granted. He said he had done nothing improper through his involvement with Moriarty.

"All I said was that renewable energy is a good idea with merit," he said. "I don't provide investment advice."

Investors suing Moriarty and Stephens allege that they used the document to entice investors, saying it showed they had support from an important agency. Moriarty also told investors he was in escrow on the land, an old dairy farm, they said.

But a $10,000 check Moriarty wrote to Inland Empire Escrow in December 2000 securing the land bounced, meaning he never controlled the site, according to Linda Cooper, the president at Inland Empire Escrow.

"It looks really good once you have a property in escrow, and you have receipts saying you deposited this much money, whether the checks bounce or not," she said.

Despite his criminal record, Moriarty continued gathering investors from Southern California to Michigan.

Moriarty persuaded Erde to raise money by arranging a meeting with Feenstra and Atwater, who vouched for the project, Erde said. He ultimately brought in more than a dozen other investors who together sank more than $1 million in Chino Organic.

Reaching back to his troubled past, Moriarty also tapped Newport Beach lender Edgar Pankey for $3 million. Pankey had been involved in a number of projects with Moriarty in the 1980s, including the Commerce Casino and the Bank of Irvine.

Moriarty and Stephens also pitched Chino Organic to several contractors and engineers who invested funds and expertise.

Dave Olson, a La Jolla consulting engineer whom Chino Organic hired to help launch the project, became an early believer. He made a $45,000 personal loan and wound up contributing more than $400,000 in consulting services from 2000 to 2002. Olson said he decided he didn't like the way the business was being run and quit.

"When you're in the industry long enough, you smell the real credible guys and the not-so-credible guys from a mile away," Olson said. "These guys weren't credible. They were greedy."

Absent from Chino Organic's ledgers were expenditures that could have brought the project closer to fruition, records and interviews show.

In January 2000, the company compiled a list of more than a dozen permits it might need. But no applications were filed for air quality, water quality or even basic building permits, according to officials at those agencies.

The licensing agreement Chino Organic said it had secured from a British engineer for methane gas extraction technology was never executed. Beyond the absence of land, technology, engineering or a purchase agreement for any electricity produced, the project lacked something even more basic: manure.

Even with Feenstra's ties to the dairy industry, it's not clear that dairy farmers in the area would have paid to haul wet manure to Chino Organic's electric plant. Geoffrey Vanden Heuvel, a veteran dairy farmer and Milk Producers Council board member, was among several major dairy farmers who told The Times they were never approached by Feenstra to contribute manure.

The first sign many investors had that something was seriously amiss with the project, they said, came when checks Moriarty sent them as partial repayment of their loans bounced. More than 60 creditors received bounced checks from Moriarty or one of his companies, according to financial records reviewed by The Times.

From 1999 to 2004, Moriarty bounced at least 150 checks, many to Chino Organic investors, those records show.

As he raised money from investors, Moriarty moved money freely from Chino Organic's account to other accounts he controlled, including one from his old fireworks company, Pyrotronics, according to checks now in court records.

The checks drawn on those accounts show he mingled personal and business expenses, which he acknowledged in the interview.

For example, Erde gave Chino Organic a check for $200,000 in November 1999. A day later, subpoenaed bank records show, $100,000 from Chino Organic was deposited into the Pyrotronics account. Moriarty then wrote a check for $832 to his wife and a check for $2,000 to himself.

Overall, while Moriarty wrote nearly $1 million in checks to others that bounced, he wrote just as much in checks to himself, his family members and for cash that cleared.

Responding to allegations by investors who lost money on Chino Organic, Moriarty told The Times that he covered most of the bounced checks, but he did not provide bank statements as confirmation. As for the checks to himself and his family, he said he was drawing the money out of the company accounts as if it were his salary.

"All the money that I put into that company is far more than any money that I took out to pay my rent or to make a car payment or anything else," Moriarty said.

To boost investors' spirits, Chino Organic would occasionally send out newsletters rife with misinformation. In March 2001, a newsletter said, "Ten Million dollars has been made available to Chino Organic Power, Inc. by the State of California, for this project."

The state agency in question? "The California Green Energy Department." There is no such department, and state officials said no state funding was ever guaranteed for the project, a fact Moriarty and Stephens acknowledged in the interview.

In 2002, anger among lenders reached a boiling point. They began filing lawsuits against Moriarty and Chino Organic — lawsuits that Stephens and Moriarty blame for the company's failure.

The estate of Moriarty's late associate, Edgar Pankey, alleged that Moriarty had covered "unauthorized, improper and excessive business and personal expenses" using Chino Organic funds. Moriarty responded in court that Pankey stalled the project. A judge agreed with Pankey's claim and awarded the family $3.8 million in 2004. The judgment has not been paid.

Erde, who had invested about $600,000, filed suit in 2003, saying he had been defrauded. The case is pending. Moriarty says Erde has been paid back everything he was owed.

A third group of lenders filed suit in March in Santa Monica. They, too, say they were defrauded and are asking for $5 million in a pending case. Moriarty has not responded, and the court is expected to enter a default judgment against him this week, a court official said.

William Sandors, a Los Angeles chauffeur among the Santa Monica plaintiffs, lent Chino Organic $74,000 at a time when his mother needed at-home nursing care. When the promised payoff never came, he sold stocks, cashed in his 401(k) and borrowed against his house.

"When it finally started crashing down, I couldn't sleep at night," Sandors said. "I would end up just sleeping on the floor because, for some reason, it felt good to be on solid ground."

The Chino project, in any event, is dead.

Stephens filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection in 2005. But Moriarty, ever the optimist, said last week that he intended to keep fighting to build some version of a manure-based power plant in California.

"It's still a good project," said Moriarty, sipping a screwdriver at a Laguna Beach bar. "There are a lot of people who I got into this deal who I am responsible for, and I want to make sure they get their money back. Maybe we won't be able to build it in Chino, but there are still dairies in other places and there's still manure that needs a place to go."

Tribes Opposed To Michigan Federal Court Nominee (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON Seven American Indian tribes in Michigan are asking federal lawmakers to block the judicial nomination of a lawyer who has represented groups opposed to the expansion of casino gambling.In letters to Democratic Senators Debbie Stabenow and Carl Levin, the tribes wrote that Robert Jonker's work indicates a bias against Indian tribes and raises questions about his fitness to serve as a federal district judge.Jonker was nominated in June for a vacancy on the U-S District Court for Michigan's Western District. His hearing before a Senate panel has not yet been scheduled.The 46-year-old environmental and commercial attorney counters that he never argued a point that he didn't believe was well-founded in law.

Mob Figure Sentenced In Racketeering Case (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

Hai Waknine gets a 10-year term after admitting to extortion in helping an Israeli crime group launder embezzled funds.

An Israeli-born mob figure known for holding court at the hippest of Westside clubs — with wads of cash, magnums of Cristal and an array of high-end strippers and Russian blonds — was sentenced Monday to more than 10 years in prison for racketeering.

Hai Waknine, 34, abruptly pleaded guilty during his trial in June to using extortion and threats of violence to help an Israeli crime group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds.

The case against Waknine stemmed from ongoing federal probes into Israeli rings that traffic the club drug Ecstasy and launder the proceeds. Several of Waknine's associates have been convicted of Ecstasy trafficking.

Waknine and his older brother Assaf, who grew up in Van Nuys, have been on the Los Angeles Police Department's radar since they were teenagers.

Detectives questioned Hai Waknine for six hours in the killing of a teacher at Grant High School in the San Fernando Valley in 1989 and have been watching him ever since. The slaying of Hal Arthur remains unsolved.

Waknine was convicted of "second-degree coercion" in New York as part of a kidnapping attempt connected to collection of a debt owed to an L.A. jeweler.

Prosecutors had planned to introduce evidence and testimony that Waknine was widely involved in extortion, particularly within the Israeli community. He kidnapped his targets, aimed handguns at them and threatened their families, according to court documents filed by the U.S. attorney's office. One witness, convicted Ecstasy trafficker Alex Maimon, was expected to testify that "individuals in the jewelry district to whom money was owed, hired Waknine to collect the money using any means necessary."

"That was Waknine's role, a shakedown collections guy," said Assistant U.S. Atty. Thomas P. Sleisenger, who prosecuted the racketeering case. "There are a lot of people in the Israeli community who will sleep better tonight because he is behind bars."

During his sentencing Monday afternoon, Waknine asked for leniency. But citing his extensive criminal history, U.S. District Judge Manuel Real gave him 13 months in prison beyond the 108 months that prosecutors were recommending.

Waknine, standing slump-shouldered at the lectern in chains and a green T-shirt, twitched and shook his head as Real detailed his sentence. His mother sniffled. Behind her, the courtroom was standing-room only with Waknine's friends and family as well as FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents and undercover officers.

The racketeering charge that Waknine pleaded guilty to involved money embezzled from an Israeli bank that members of the Jerusalem Network, an organized crime group, wanted to hide in the United States. Waknine helped them by setting up loans to Eli Hadad, a Miami real estate developer; Yosef Atia, a Miami Ecstasy trafficker; and Viken Keuylian, a Beverly Hills Lamborghini dealer, prosecutors said.

When the debtors could not immediately repay the loans, Waknine extorted them and assessed penalties. Keuylian, for instance, was lent $950,000. Waknine demanded as repayment $2 million even after Keuylian bought him a $175,000 Ferrari 360.

The federal investigation into Ecstasy trafficking and Israeli organized crime in Los Angeles is ongoing.

A regular visitor during Waknine's trial in June was former Ohio State football star Maurice Clarett. When Clarett was arrested on weapons charges in August — allegedly wearing a bulletproof vest and carrying three loaded handguns and an AK-47-style assault rifle in his car — he told his attorney he was scared of Waknine.

Law enforcement sources say Waknine had let Clarett live in his beachfront condo in Marina del Rey and drive his choice of luxury cars in return for a cut from the player's professional football contract. When the football contract fell through, the sources say, Waknine began demanding payment.

Waknine's attorney did not return calls seeking comment.

Cocaine Ring Busted, Feds Say (NOTP)

New Orleans Times Picayune, September 8, 2006

Nine men -- including four from Metairie, two from LaPlace and one each from Kenner and Destrehan -- have been indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine powder and crack cocaine, the U.S. attorney's office said Thursday.

Among those charged in the Aug. 31 federal grand jury indictment, which was unsealed this week, was Henry Gloston, 25, of Houston, who is accused of running kilogram-size shipments of the drugs from Houston to William Lang, 32, also known as "Tussy" or "Hood," of Metairie, one of the local defendants, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

Lang would sell the cocaine powder and crack to other defendants for distribution in Metairie and nearby, Letten said in a press release.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration's regional top agent, William Renton, the investigation has dismantled "a significant cocaine distribution organization, from wholesale and street level distributors operating in Metairie and Kenner to the Houston, Texas, source of supply."

As part of the investigation, Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies made undercover drug purchases from an additional 24 people, resulting in state warrants for related drug-trafficking crimes, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Twenty-two of the 33 defendants were arrested in a roundup early Thursday morning, the U.S. attorney's office said.

It is unclear how many of the 22 were among the nine indicted on federal charges. Those nine face a minimum federal prison term of 10 years and a maximum of life imprisonment, Letten said. Each also faces a fine of up to $1 million, and forfeiture of any proceeds the government can prove they made from the drug distribution conspiracy, the U.S. attorney's office said. Several of those indicted also face additional federal drug charges, including possession with intent to distribute cocaine powder and/or crack cocaine, the prosecutors' office said.

The investigation was the work of the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, composed of the DEA, the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and State Police narcotics agents.

The roundup was the work of the Gulf Coast High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area Task Force, assisted by the sheriff's offices from Jefferson and St. John the Baptist parishes.

Besides Lang and Gloston, those indicted were Allen Hunter, 25, of Metairie; Ricky Bozeman, 32, also known as "Slick," of Kenner; Timothy Ivey, 34, also known as "Tee," of Destrehan; Lendell Wallace, 23, also known as "Pop," and "Papa Smurf," 23, of Metairie; Darrius Brooks, 20, also known as "White," of Metairie; Lamont Williams, 31, of LaPlace; and James Wallace, 39, of LaPlace.

Each was charged with conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute cocaine powder and crack cocaine, Letten said.

Wests Enter Guilty Pleas, Face Years In Prison (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel, September 12, 2006

A Market Square businessman-turned-convicted pot peddler faces as much as nine years behind bars when sentenced later this year.

Scott West, 41, pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court to charges he conspired with his older brother, James Michael West, and others to push more than a ton of marijuana along a pipeline that ran from Arizona to Tennessee, Georgia and North Carolina.

He also admitted pumping millions of his brother's drug money into his Market Square ventures, using the dirty cash to buy several buildings on Market Square and launch businesses such as the Preservation Pub, Oodles Uncorked and World Grotto.

In a plea deal negotiated between his attorney, Donald A. Bosch, and federal prosecutors David Jennings and Hugh Ward, the entrepreneur faces a penalty range of 87 to 108 months - if he qualifies for something known as the "safety valve."

That is a provision in federal law designed to give first-time offenders a break from minimum mandatory sentences in drug cases.

"Whether or not he qualifies for the safety valve" is yet to be determined, Jennings told U.S. District Judge Thomas Phillips.

Also pleading guilty Monday was West's wife, Bernadette Trent West, 47. She entered a guilty plea to conspiring to launder drug money. As a result of a plea negotiated by her defense attorney, David Eldridge, she faces a penalty range of 46 to 57 months.

Scott West was ordered jailed Monday. His wife remains free on bond.

Phillips has set a Dec. 1 sentencing date for Scott West and his wife. His brother and sister-in-law pleaded guilty a few weeks ago and also face sentencing later this year.

Jennings told Phillips that the U.S. Attorney's Office has agreed to allow the Market Square businesses operating in the buildings owned by the Wests to continue to operate pending a sale of the properties.

"The U.S. Attorney's Office will take no action that will negatively impact the businesses to try to accomplish a seamless transfer to a new owner," Jennings said.

The Wests were subdued at Monday's hearing, answering rote questions about their educational levels - Bernadette West has a master's degree in art education and her husband a bachelor's degree in English - and their mental states.

They listened as Jennings detailed a marijuana pipeline headed up by Mike West for a decade that funneled tons of the illegal drug from Mexico through Arizona and, ultimately, Tennessee and other Southeastern states. Scott West knew about his brother's drug trade and occasionally peddled some of the drug, Jennings said.

But it was his brother's dirty money that Scott West was most interested in, according to the prosecutor.

"Scott West knew his brother was obtaining multiple kilograms of marijuana from his source of supply in Arizona," Jennings told Phillips. "Both of these defendants knew that the proceeds Mike West was investing in Market Square were derived from drug trafficking."

Although Scott West dabbled in the drug-dealing market, his wife did not, Jennings said.

"Do you agree that's what you did?" Phillips asked Scott West.

"Yes, Your Honor," he responded. "I plead guilty, Your Honor."

"Are you pleading guilty because you are, in fact, guilty?" the judge queried.

"Yes," Scott West answered.

DOJ_NMG_0061638

Eldridge issued a statement after the hearing on behalf of Bernadette West, writing, "This is a terribly sad day for Bernadette West, but she readily acknowledges that it is her own conduct that has resulted in this day coming and deeply regrets her actions."

Her husband, through Bosch, wrote that he accepts "all responsibility for my own illegal actions."

"My enthusiasm and ambition for projects clouded my judgment in a devastating way," he wrote. "I sincerely apologize to my friends and supporters for breaching their trust and confidence by allowing my ends to justify the means."

Long known for his waist-long ponytail, Scott West appeared in court Monday with his hair shorn. He explained he donated his locks to a charity group that weaves wigs for cancer patients.

Scott West said his sister, Paula West McAnally, plans to buy Earth to Old City and Preservation Pub. Although he did not identify her by name, Jennings said in court that authorities have "absolutely no evidence" that McAnally was involved in her brothers' crimes.

Scott West said his parents will continue to operate Oodles restaurant, while Suzie Dew will run World Grotto. The plea agreement makes clear, however, that the federal government will sell the buildings in which those businesses are operating. The new building owner can decide what will become of those businesses.

The West brothers and their wives came under the scrutiny of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Internal Revenue Service when a courier for Mike West was nabbed in January as he delivered more than $300,000 to alleged supplier Phillip A. Apodaca in Arizona.

DEA Agents Dave Lewis and Michael Davis and IRS Agent Brian Grove led the probe against the Wests.

Pot Growers Sentenced To Federal Prison (AP)

AP, September 11, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- Prison terms were handed down for two defendants convicted in unrelated cases involving marijuana cultivation, federal prosecutors announced Monday.

Daniel Barton, 31, of Carlsbad, who managed a substantial marijuana "grow" operation at a residence in Valley Center, was sentenced to 37 months behind bars.

Barton pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge stemming from the cultivation of 532 marijuana plants. He admitted that the entire Valley Center residence was used to cultivate marijuana plants from August 2003 to July 21, 2005, when DEA agents executed a search warrant at the location.

In the second case, Christopher DeMatteis, 29, was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison after pleading guilty to a conspiracy charge involving 555 marijuana plants. He admitted that he was the caretaker and operator of a substantial marijuana "grow" operation in Oceanside, which was owned by his brother and co-defendant, Eric DeMatteis, who also pleaded guilty.

2 Ex-Teammates Of Cycling Star Admit Drug Use (NYT)

By Juliet Macur

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Two of Lance Armstrong's eight teammates from the 1999 Tour de France have admitted for the first time that they used the banned endurance-boosting drug EPO in preparing for the race that year, when they helped Armstrong capture the first of his record seven titles.

Their disclosures, in interviews with The New York Times, are rare examples of candor in a sport protected by a powerful code of silence. The confessions come as cycling is reeling from doping scandals, including Floyd Landis's fall in July from Tour champion to suspected cheat.

One of the two teammates who admitted using EPO while on Armstrong's United States Postal Service team is Frankie Andreu, a 39-year-old retired team captain who had been part of Armstrong's inner circle for more than a decade. In an interview at his home in Dearborn, Mich., Andreu said that he took EPO for only a few races and that he was acknowledging his use now because he thought doping was damaging his sport. Continued doping and denial by riders may scare away fans and sponsors for good, he said.

"There are two levels of guys," Andreu said. "You got the guys that cheat and guys that are just trying to survive."

The other rider who said he used EPO spoke on condition of anonymity because he said he did not want to jeopardize his job in cycling.

"The environment was certainly one of, to be accepted, you had to use doping products," he said. "There was very high pressure to be one of the cool kids."

Neither rider ever tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs, but both said they felt as if they had to take EPO to make the Tour team in 1999. Andreu would not say specifically when he took the drug, and the second rider said he did not use EPO during the Tour. Anti-doping experts say the benefits of taking EPO, the synthetic hormone erythropoietin, which boosts stamina by bolstering the body's production of oxygen-rich red blood cells, can last several weeks or more.

Both of Armstrong's former teammates also said they never saw Armstrong take any banned substances.

Armstrong, who turns 35 next week, has long been dogged by accusations that he doped before and after his remarkable recovery from cancer, a comeback that made him a transcendent cultural figure and a symbol to cancer patients and survivors worldwide. He has repeatedly denied using performance-enhancing drugs and has aggressively defended himself in interviews and through lawsuits, even more than a year into his retirement.

Multiple attempts to interview Armstrong for this article — through his lawyers, his agent and a spokesman — were unsuccessful. His agent, Bill Stapleton, wrote in an e-mail message yesterday that Armstrong would not comment because he was attending a meeting of the President's Cancer Panel in Minneapolis.

Armstrong once said that cycling had no secrets and that hard work was the key to winning. Recent events and disclosures, however, demonstrate that cycling does, indeed, have secrets.

Dozens of interviews with people in the sport as well as court documents in a contract dispute between Armstrong and a company called SCA Promotions reveal the protective silence shared by those in professional cycling. A new picture of the sport emerges: a murky world of clandestine meetings, mysterious pills and thermoses that clink with the sound of drug vials rattling inside them.

This year's Tour began with a doping investigation that implicated nearly 60 riders and ended with Landis's testing positive for synthetic testosterone. He became the third of Armstrong's former lieutenants to fail a drug test after setting off on his own career as a lead rider.

"There's no doubt that cyclists have bought into the institutional culture of cheating, and that's a big, big problem for the sport," said Steven Ungerleider, a research psychologist, antidoping expert and consultant for college, Olympic and professional sports organizations. He described that culture as "a mob psychology."

A Widespread Problem

In his 12 years as a professional cyclist, Frankie Andreu was a domestique, a worker bee whose job was to help a top rider like Armstrong win.

He said his introduction to performance-enhancing drugs came in 1995, when he and Armstrong were with the Motorola team. He said some of the team's riders felt that they could no longer compete with some European teams that had rapidly improved and were rumored to be using EPO.

Motorola's top riders asked their doctor, Massimo Testa, about the drug's safety because more than a dozen young riders in Europe had died mysteriously of heart attacks. Some cyclists had linked those deaths to rumored EPO use.

Dr. Testa, now a sports medicine specialist at the University of California at Davis, said in a telephone interview that he had given each rider literature about EPO, in case any of them decided to use it on their own.

Dr. Testa said he urged the riders not to take the drug, but he wanted them to be educated.

"If you want to use a gun, you had better use a manual, rather than to ask the guy on the street how to use it," he said. "I cannot rule out that someone did it."

One of Armstrong's teammates, Steve Swart, has admitted using EPO while riding for Motorola. He discussed his time with the team in the book "L.A. Confidential: The Secrets of Lance Armstrong," which was published in 2004, only in French.

The book's allegations that Armstrong doped prompted the lawsuit between Armstrong and SCA Promotions, which was settled out of court in February. Because of Armstrong's suspected drug use, SCA withheld a $5 million bonus after he won the 2004 Tour de France. Armstrong and Tailwind Sports, the company that owned his cycling team, sued SCA for the money.

Testimony in the case was never supposed to become public. A confidential settlement awarded Armstrong and Tailwind Sports the bonus, and $2.5 million in interest and lawyers' costs. The Times obtained the legal documents in July.

In testimony in the case, Swart, a retired rider from New Zealand, said top riders on Motorola discussed EPO in 1995. He testified that Armstrong told teammates that there was "only one road to take" to be competitive. In a sworn deposition, Swart said the meaning of Armstrong's comment was clear: "We needed to start a medical program of EPO."

EPO, cortisone and testosterone were common in European cycling, Swart said in a telephone interview. He said using cortisone, a steroid, was regarded as "sucking on a candy stick." Cyclists acquired the drugs from European pharmacies and took them in private, Swart said. "You basically became your own doctor," he said.

He said signs of drug use were widespread at the 1994 and 1995 Tours, when there was no testing for EPO.

"Everyone was walking around with their own thermos, and you could hear the sound — tinkle, tinkle, tinkle — coming from the thermoses because they were filled with ice and vials of EPO," Swart said. "You needed to keep the EPO cold, and every night at the hotel, the guys would be running around trying to find some ice to fill up their thermos."

'It Was for Lance'

In the weeks before the 1999 Tour, Andreu's wife, Betsy, found one of those thermoses in her refrigerator. She was furious.

"I remember Frankie saying: 'You don't understand. This is the only way I can even finish the Tour,' " she said. " 'After this, I promise you, I'll never do it again.' "

Betsy Andreu said she grudgingly watched her husband help Armstrong traverse the mountains at the Tour that year. Later, she said, she was angry when her husband said he had once allowed a team doctor to inject him with an unidentified substance.

To this day, she blames Armstrong for what she said was pressure on teammates to use drugs. Her husband, she said, "didn't use EPO for himself, because as a domestique, he was never going to win that race."

"It was for Lance," she said.

Three years earlier, she and Frankie, who were engaged at the time, visited Armstrong at an Indiana hospital after he received his cancer diagnosis. Last fall, under court order to testify in the SCA Promotions case, the Andreus said that they had overheard Armstrong tell doctors he had used steroids, testosterone, cortisone, growth hormone and EPO.

Armstrong testified that no one at the hospital had asked him if he had used performance-enhancing drugs. He testified that Betsy Andreu had lied because "she hates me," and that Frankie Andreu had lied because "he's trying to back up his old lady."

Frankie Andreu, once Armstrong's close friend and roommate, testified that he never knew if Armstrong was doping. But once, he testified, he saw Armstrong sorting "little round pills" on his bed before a race. "He talked about that he would take these at different parts during the race," Andreu said under oath, adding that he did not know what the pills were. Armstrong testified that they were caffeine.

Johan Bruyneel, the longtime director of Armstrong's team, did not respond to an interview request through a team spokesman.

In a news conference he held at this year's Tour, Armstrong said his opponents in the SCA case were "crushed — totally crushed" upon cross-examination.

Sean Breen, one of Armstrong's lawyers, said the opposing witnesses were not credible. In the case of Betsy Andreu, Breen said, "Like her testimony, I think her motives are completely unexplainable." He added that Frankie Andreu's dismissal as a rider on the United States Postal Service team after the 2000 season might have been one reason for their testimony. (Andreu returned to the team the next year as the team's American director.)

Armstrong has said he never tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs. He tested positive for cortisone at the 1999 Tour, but he was not penalized after producing a doctor's prescription for a skin cream he said he used for saddle sores.

At this year's Tour, Armstrong said he was tired of dealing with doping accusations.

"Why keep fighting lawsuits when my time needs to be spent being a dad, being a philanthropist, being a fan of cycling, being a guy that just wants to have fun?" he said.

Pat McQuaid, president of the International Cycling Union, the sport's governing body, said the union's lawyers would review the SCA Promotions case after they prepared files on the riders implicated in the Spanish doping scandal that preceded this year's Tour. In May, the Spanish police raided several apartments in Madrid and seized steroids, hormones, EPO, nearly 100 bags of frozen blood and equipment for treating blood. The Tour began in July with nine riders being barred from the event after they were implicated in the investigation.

Cleaning Up the Sport

Armstrong has kept his distance from cycling's recent troubles.

He is training for the New York City Marathon in November. In a few weeks, Armstrong will celebrate the 10th anniversary of his cancer diagnosis, and he has a new line of apparel from Nike commemorating the date.

At the same time, some of his former teammates and rivals are struggling.

Ivan Basso of Italy, Jan Ullrich of Germany and Francisco Mancebo of Spain — who finished second, third and fourth when Armstrong won the 2005 Tour — were all implicated in the Spanish scandal. Government and sports authorities continue to investigate them.

One of Armstrong's former lieutenants, the 2004 Olympic champion Tyler Hamilton, was also named in the Spanish investigation. His two-year suspension for blood doping in 2004 ends this month, but his future remains uncertain. The cycling union said it would seek a lifetime ban for Hamilton if he were found guilty of wrongdoing in the Spanish case.

Another former lieutenant of Armstrong's, Roberto Heras of Spain, tested positive for EPO last year. He is serving a two-year suspension.

Landis, meanwhile, could be stripped of his Tour title. The United States Anti-Doping Agency is expected to decide whether to charge Landis with a doping violation sometime in the next week, according to Landis's lawyer, Howard Jacobs.

All of those cyclists have denied using performance-enhancing drugs, but antidoping officials hope that will change, if those athletes have, indeed, doped.

Travis Tygart, general counsel for the United States Anti-Doping Agency, says he encourages athletes to be honest. "Those who stand up will hopefully influence other competitors in the sport to be clean," he said.

Ultimately, Frankie Andreu said, only riders can clean up cycling.

"There's always going to be the guy who denies and denies that he's ever used something," he said. "Nobody really knows what that guy is really doing when he goes home and closes the door."

Weapons Come From Many Sources (MHCA)

By Julia Reynolds And George B. Sánchez

Monterey (CA) Herald, September 12, 2006

For years, Salinas police have said that most of the guns used in local crimes in the city were stolen individually during residential burglaries. Police reports indicate that there have been no significant robberies of local gun stores, and most firearms acquired in the city are bought legally.

But over the last 20 years, the city has also had several notable episodes of organized gun trafficking, as the following cases show.

One unexpected source of cheap handguns was the Santa Ana Police Department. In the 1990s, it was not uncommon for police departments to sell confiscated weapons to gun dealers. In 1993, an Assembly analysis found that most of the weapons sold were the type used for hunting or collection value and were not cheap "Saturday Night Specials."

But one exception was a sale by the Santa Ana Police Department through a Modesto broker of 25 small pistols to Justin Davis, proprietor of the now-defunct JKD Shooting Sports in Salinas for $30 each. Davis told a reporter he bought the .25-caliber pistols because a factory had temporarily stopped making them.

"The police are just partners in the recirculating of these weapons onto the streets of California after these weapons have been taken away," then-Sen. Tom Hayden, D-Santa Monica, complained at the time.

Salinas police Cmdr. Kelly McMillin said officers later learned that an employee of JKD was illegally selling firearms in Salinas.

"He was dealing guns out of a truck," McMillin said.

Also in 1993, a United Parcel Service supervisor used his position to funnel guns to a Salinas gang.

Nelson Baligod, then 24, was a supervisor at a Salinas UPS facility who posed as an employee of local gun shops when he ordered 17 handguns from national distributors.

Some of the weapons were used in bank robberies, convenience store holdups and shootings, an agent at the San Jose office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told the San Jose Mercury News.

Surprise for dealer|

The investigation began when Salinas police detective Ken Wynne traced a crime weapon to a King City firearms dealer and learned the dealer never ordered the gun.

When Baligod ordered the guns, he provided the names and license numbers of local firearms dealers. He had the orders shipped COD but intercepted the shipments and paid for them, never delivering them to the unknowing gun sellers. Baligod pleaded guilty to federal firearms violations.

One source that has helped flood Salinas with firepower is the Nuestra Familia prison gang, which for decades has held a strong base in the city.

Paul Salcido, a Nuestra Familia member who was convicted of murder and attempted murder, testified before a federal grand jury in 2001 that NF members in Salinas were buying brand new guns in the manufacturer's packaging.

Salcido testified that there were "a lot of individuals coming from Arizona that were purchasing guns from drug dealers down there.... They would come to us and ask us, 'Do you want to buy any weapons?'"

"If it was fresh out of the box, it'd be $250. If it was just like a floater gun, not brand new or nothing like that, it'd go for maybe $100 or maybe $150."

Salcido added that he never threw out his own guns after using them in a crime.

"Me, personally, I never discarded. I always gave it to another individual."

Melted or buried|

Asked where the guns are now, Salcido said he believed they were later buried or melted down.

Brothers Michael and Jerry Esteban were the subjects of a joint investigation by the FBI, ATF and Salinas police.

An attorney for the Monterey County District Attorney's Office said Esteban was one of the largest single-source suppliers of guns to Norteños in Salinas for the last seven years.

In 2001, Nuestra Familia "regiment commander" Armando Santa Cruz was in charge of arming a crew of young gang members who sold heroin in the city's Chinatown district. According to FBI reports, Santa Cruz bought North China Industries SKS rifles from Esteban, also known as "Shackles," and described by federal agents as affiliated with the Sons of Samoa street gang.

To fulfill an order for his Nuestra Familia boss, Santa Cruz obtained two SKS rifles from Esteban, the FBI reported. The guns were delivered in the parking lot of a Rohnert Park restaurant in exchange for $1,000 cash.

Unfortunately for Santa Cruz, his Nuestra Familia boss was also working undercover for the government. The FBI had secretly videotaped the SKS delivery, and Santa Cruz was charged in state and federal courts for racketeering, gang activity, gun and drug trafficking, as well as a murder conspiracy case in Salinas.

Records show at least one of the rifles was first sold at a Texas gun shop seven years earlier.

Esteban worked delivering grocery items to stores in Monterey and San Benito counties. The court received more than a half dozen letters from friends and relatives characterizing him as a responsible community member.

Rifles and handguns|

In a 2003 indictment, federal prosecutors said Esteban was found in possession of a silencer, ammunition and 11 weapons, including an Israel Military Industries UZI 9 mm pistol, a North China Industries MAK-90 rifle, a Ruger Mini-14 .223-caliber rifle, a Smith & Wesson Highway Patrolman .357-caliber pistol, an Israel Military Industries Desert Eagle .44-caliber pistol, and other rifles and revolvers.

In 2004, after initially pleading not guilty in a San Jose federal court, Esteban agreed to a federal sentence of 10 years for selling the Smith & Wesson revolver and $4,400 worth of methamphetamine.

"The types of weapons -- silencers, machine guns, AK-47s, firearms with obliterated serial numbers -- as well as multiple pounds of narcotics purchased by an ATF undercover agent and confidential informant underscores the significance of removing this criminal from our community," ATF spokeswoman Marti McKee said.

A study by the bureau found that 53 percent of Salinas crime guns picked up by police were first purchased from legal firearms dealers in Monterey County, and a third were bought from licensed dealers within 10 miles of the city.

Arms change hands|

But a full 81 percent had changed hands at least once, the report said, "and could have been legally transferred, straw purchased, otherwise trafficked, stolen or a combination."

When crime guns are bought legally, criminals sometimes use what's called a "straw buyer," someone without a criminal record, often a wife or girlfriend. That's the name that shows up on the required background check and dealer record of sale, or DRS.

"Straw purchases are still common," said Salinas police commander McMillin. "Salinas police review all DRSes. They go through them looking for names SPD recognizes, like women who are girlfriends of gang guys."

Although Salinas crime guns change hands often, ATF analysts were surprised at what they call a short "time to crime," the time elapsed between the original sale and the first criminal act. Nearly a quarter of the guns had a time to crime of less than three years, and 11 percent had a time to crime of less than a year from their retail sale.

McMillin said that report, though published in 2002, paints a picture that still holds for today's illegal gun market.

With the number of shootings holding above 300 year after year, Salinas will keep having illegal gun problems, McMillin said, "as long as guns are free in our society."

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Fails On Welfare Reform (HILL)

By Dick Morris And Eileen Mcgann

The Hill, September 12, 2006

The decision by the Republican leadership not even to try to pass immigration reform before the election smacks of punting when they should have gone for a touchdown. America is begging for tough immigration reform and looking to the Republican Party to exercise its traditional role of leadership in law and order issues. But even without a real threat of a Democratic filibuster, the Republican Party has tripped over its own feet and given up its attempt to meet the needs of the country and of its constituents.

The Republican failure to pass immigration reform despite controlling both houses and the presidency reminds one of Hillary's inability even to get healthcare reform reported out of committee despite enjoying a similar advantage in 1994.

Republican voters are not likely to forgive GOP ineptitude and failure. With a 30-vote margin in the House and 10 in the Senate, they will find the lack of action inexplicable.

The release this week of "Border War," a film produced by the conservative grassroots group Citizens United, brings the issue home in a way that voters in general and Republicans in particular will not forget. One can only hope that congressional Republicans who have failed the country will watch the movie and reflect on their missed opportunity. The film will have very wide distribution, by DVD and in at least 125 theaters throughout the country. (Disclosure: We are working with Citizens United on a film due out this spring on our old friend Hillary Rodham Clinton but we had no involvement in "Border War".)

With more than 10 million illegal immigrants in the U.S., the GOP failure to pass a bill is hard to understand.

A compromise was practically begging to be reached. Republican voters supported the Senate bill's earned path to citizenship and did not see it as amnesty. They know it is not feasible to return ten million people to their countries of origin, and they get it that a democracy cannot have a permanent lawless class living in its midst.

On the other hand, the Republican base and the rest of the country strongly support a border fence. And cracking down on employers who hire illegals is wildly popular on both sides of the political divide.

One cannot help but compare the cowardly refusal to work out a deal on immigration with the bravery on the part of President Clinton and Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss) in negotiating a welfare reform deal. In 1996, the two leaders got together to pass one of the most significant bills since World War II.

The Citizens United film documents how our porous border invited coyotes to exploit would-be immigrants and invites human trafficking. It emphasizes the risk to the immigrant and to the country of a border that can be breached, but only at great danger to those who try it.

But the Republican Party was scared by its talk radio acolytes into inaction. So fearful were they of aroused Hispanic-Americans on the one hand and angry white males — and females — on the other that they forgot their duty to lead and to compromise for progress.

Whether or not the Republicans keep control of Congress in the 2006 election, their numbers will be reduced. The chances of a good immigration reform bill will decline proportionally. A splendid opportunity will have passed, and will not soon return.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including Rewriting History, a rebuttal to Living History by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Keep The Immigration Debate Civil (LAT)

By Arnold Schwarzenegger

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

BY NOT FINISHING comprehensive immigration reform this year, Congress left behind a poisoned debate that will continue to fuel a growing anger in our country.

Latino leaders, meeting in Los Angeles last week, were already debating whether they should continue marching in the streets, disrupt the economy or register voters. At the same time, people who are angry about the federal government's failure to stop illegal immigration have introduced local measures to take away housing, jobs and even medical assistance from noncitizens in their communities. On both sides, people are demanding to be heard.

Now Congress has walked away from the debate, at least for this year. So it's up to the rest of us to tone down our rhetoric and listen to the voices on all sides. As both an immigrant to this country and a proud American citizen, I have a unique perspective on this debate. I also have some advice.

To the immigrant rights activists I say: Change your message. When I came to America, I wrapped myself in the flag because I wanted to be a part of the American dream. I worked hard, learned English and followed the laws. I learned the customs and culture of my new country. I spent time with English-speakers just so I could hear them talk and learn the language from them.

Being an immigrant is like being a guest in someone's house. Your hosts go about their daily routine. You can sit on the couch and do your own thing, or you can ask, "What can I do to help? How can I be a part of this household?"

What people see today when immigrant rights activists march in the streets carrying Mexican flags and angry signs is that you do not want to join America's house. The message that sends is that you do not want to learn our language or our culture. Unlike the message sent by the masses of Irish, Italian, German and Asian immigrants, whom Americans now proudly call our "melting pot," these images suggest that Mexican immigrants do not want to make that effort.

I do not believe that this is the message most Mexican immigrants — legal or illegal — wish to send. I believe that most Mexican immigrants are as proud to be part of America as I was. They are some of the hardest working and strongest believers in the American dream. So my message to you is: Carry your home country in your heart, but carry the American flag in our streets.

To those who believe illegal immigration is reaching a crisis level in this country I say: Tone down the rhetoric. I myself have said things that caused division even when that was not my intent. Words can be weapons. We must be careful to distinguish between legal and illegal immigration, between those who break our laws to do us harm and those who break our laws to find freedom and prosperity in the greatest nation on Earth. It is hypocritical for Congress to condemn people for coming here illegally when the federal government has been unwilling to do what it takes to stop them from coming in the first place.

Now that they are here, what do we do? Amnesty is not the answer. Congress granted amnesty in 1986 and promised it would end the problem. It didn't. Amnesty only made it worse. You don't reward people for breaking the law. And you don't grant someone the rights of citizenship simply by virtue of how long they have been in this country illegally — that makes a mockery of the law and penalizes those who waited years and followed the rules.

But it is not realistic either to round up 12 million people and send them home. Many have families here now, children and grandchildren who are citizens. Splitting them up would be inhumane. Some say it would cost as much as $250 billion to even try. Who would pay for that? It is simply not realistic.

The answer, as I have repeatedly said, is, first, to secure the border to stop the problem from getting worse. Second, we must create a temporary-worker program so people can come here legally to work. We should also lift the cap on work visas for industries such as technology, engineering and agriculture so immigrants can be hired when there are not enough U.S. workers. And we must create a path to legal status for those living in the shadows illegally. They must pay a fine for breaking our laws. They must learn English and become part of our culture. They must pay back taxes and pay for healthcare and education rather than expect American taxpayers to pay extra when some cannot even afford healthcare or college for their own children.

Unfortunately, we must wait for Congress to return next year to take up the critical issue of comprehensive immigration reform. Meanwhile, we must do all we can to stop the problem from getting worse and to maintain a civil debate about illegal immigration.

Arizona Primary Will Test GOP Immigration Strategy (HILL)

By Amy Sherman

The Hill, September 12, 2006

The House's final immigration field hearing planned today in Washington coincides with the Arizona primary, and political analysts are watching the elections closely to see how immigration resonates with voters.

In Arizona's open 8th congressional district, conservative GOP candidate Randy Graf and moderate Steve Huffman are squaring off to replace outgoing Rep. Jim Kolbe.

Graf press secretary R.T. Gregg said House Republicans' immigration hearings over the August recess have helped focus attention on an important issue for the district.

"It was good that members of Congress came to this district that is most affected by illegal immigration to see first hand the effects of illegal immigration," he said, "particularly given the lack of attention our current Congressman from this district has given this most pressing problem."

Gregg also criticized the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) for pouring money into the district to benefit Huffman. Last week alone, the NRCC spent $122,000 on an ad campaign designed to benefit Huffman.

"[Immigration] is on the minds of voters...," he said. However, Gregg argued that "intervention by power brokers in Washington has tended to cloud the issue...[the question becomes] whether the seat is for sale."

Huffman's campaign did not return a call for comment by press time.

TAX:

Glaxo To Settle Tax Dispute With IRS Over U.S. Unit For $3.4 Billion (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews And Jeanne Whalen

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Pharmaceutical giant GlaxoSmithKline PLC will pay the U.S. government $3.4 billion to settle a nearly two-decade-long dispute over how to tax dealings between the British company and its American subsidiary, in a case that underscores the Internal Revenue Service's resolve to confront corporate tax avoidance.

The settlement, which the IRS said was the largest ever, covers taxes the agency said Glaxo owed for 1989 through 2005 because the company's American unit improperly overpaid its British parent for drugs, mainly the antiulcer blockbuster Zantac. It said those overpayments reduced the company's profit in the U.S., thus lowering its U.S. tax bill.

The Glaxo settlement could help bolster the IRS's crackdown on corporate taxpayers. It follows a string of tax-shelter victories the IRS has racked up in court in the past year against such companies as General Electric Co., Black & Decker Corp. and aerospace-products maker Coltec Industries Inc.

Glaxo's decision to settle the dispute, which was headed for a trial in U.S. Tax Court in February, was particularly sweet for the IRS because it has a poor track record of winning disputes involving the accounting practice at stake in the Glaxo case. That practice, called "transfer pricing," is the art of attaching a monetary value to trademarks, patents, research and other intangibles that one arm of a multinational company transfers to another.

Transfer pricing determines how costs are distributed between the far-flung arms of a multinational company, and thus what profit is booked in what country. Higher costs cut into profit, lowering a company's tax bill, while lower costs do the opposite.

"Over the past 10 to 20 years, the government has brought a good number of transfer-pricing cases and come away with clear victories in very few of them," said Philip R. West, a tax partner at law firm Steptoe & Johnson in Washington.

Disputes over transfer pricing tend to be among the biggest fights between the IRS and corporate taxpayers, and they are of growing importance since more than 60% of world trade occurs inside multinational companies. Every country wants to maximize the tax revenue on goods and services produced within its borders, and every company has an incentive to book profits where taxes are lowest. That has bred a slew of disputes between companies and tax authorities over the proper pricing.

Julian Heslop, Glaxo's chief financial officer, called transfer-pricing disputes among the toughest issues for corporations to resolve with tax authorities. "It's probably the most complicated area of taxation in the world. It's not like buying a TV, where there is a market price," he said. "There isn't a market price within a company. There's quite a range of what might be acceptable."

Symantec Corp., a Cupertino, Calif., software maker, is currently in a $1 billion transfer-pricing Tax Court dispute with the IRS involving an Irish subsidiary of Veritas Software Corp., a company it acquired in 2005. The IRS is arguing that licensing fees paid by the subsidiary to Veritas in the U.S. were too low and that Veritas credited the U.S. business with too much of the cost of developing some technology. That wound up increasing the income of the subsidiary in Ireland -- a lower-tax country -- at the expense of income in the U.S., lowering the company's overall tax bill. Symantec has sued the IRS in U.S. Tax Court.

Motorola Inc., the Schaumburg, Ill., cellphone and telecommunications-equipment maker, is in a dispute with the IRS that could result in additional taxes of roughly $800 million, largely related to transfer pricing, according to company disclosures.

"The settlement of this case," said IRS Commissioner Mark Everson of the Glaxo case "sends a strong message of our resolve to continue to deal with this issue going forward." Chief IRS counsel Donald Korb added that it showed that "our lawyers can go up against the best firms the private tax bar has to offer...and achieve quite successful results."

Glaxo said that, despite the settlement's massive size, it won't have any significant impact on the company's reported earnings. Glaxo had set aside £2.3 billion ($4.3 billion) to cover tax disputes. Mr. Heslop, the company's chief financial officer, said a significant amount of that sum related to the U.S. dispute. He said the company was confident it would prevail in the case but settled because of the time and cost of litigation, which had been expected to last two to three years, including the inevitable appeals.

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Glaxo's American depositary shares were up 17 cents at $55.25.

The majority of transfer-pricing cases are settled out of court. The trickiest involve, as the Glaxo case did, the value of intangibles, such as brand names. A Toyota automobile made in Japan, for instance, is worth more in the U.S. than the sum of its steel, rubber and electronics, because the Toyota brand name adds value. Attaching a price figure to that value can be a contentious affair.

In an attempt to simplify transfer-pricing guidelines, the IRS changed its rules in the 1990s. The Glaxo case, which dates to 1989, fell under old rules, which gave companies more leeway in determining prices.

Under the current rules, "I would be astonished that a company would take as far-out a position" as Glaxo did under the old ones, said H. David Rosenbloom, a Washington lawyer with Caplin & Drysdale. "Their auditors would be hanging off the ceiling."

Under the new rules, which came into widespread use in the late 1990s, a company must document a "reasonable" calculation for its transfer pricing; in the past, the burden was on the IRS to prove the calculation inaccurate. In addition, the IRS now has the power to levy a 40% penalty -- in addition to taxes owed -- if it wins a dispute, another reason for companies to avoid resisting the IRS as long as Glaxo did.

In addition, the IRS today often avoids levying penalties, beyond taxes owed, if companies can show they made a good-faith effort to come up with a meaningful price; in the past, the IRS had little option but to examine a company's books in detail and try to discern if an appropriate rationale was used to determine the internal pricing.

In the Glaxo case, the company contended the value of drugs it sold in the U.S. was in the research and development done in Britain, and that that justified the high price the British parent charged the American unit for the drugs. The biggest chunk of profit at issue stems from Zantac, which was the world's best-selling drug from the mid-1980s to the mid-1990s, at one point accounting for half of the company's total revenue. Glaxo paid taxes in Britain on the Zantac profit but less than it would have paid had the profit been assigned to the U.S.

The IRS argued that marketing efforts by Glaxo in the U.S. were critical to Zantac's success, and thus more of the income should have been attributed to the American unit -- and subject to U.S. tax. The IRS said the company has conceded more than 60% of the amount at issue in court. Glaxo said the net cash cost of the settlement would be $3.1 billion, including federal, state and local taxes; interest, and deductions for the taxes paid.

In its 2005 annual report, Glaxo said a transfer-pricing dispute it was discussing with British tax authorities for the years 1995 to date could also lead to litigation. A Glaxo spokeswoman yesterday said the British dispute wasn't related to the case settled in the U.S.

Internal Revenue Service, Glaxo Settle Biggest Tax Dispute In History (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mary Dalrymple, Ap Tax Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Drug giant GlaxoSmithKline agreed to pay $3.4 billion (â,¬2.67 billion) in the largest tax settlement in IRS history, resolving a dispute from the 1980s over the multinational company's U.S. profits.

The disagreement concerned how much of the profits from certain drugs, particularly the ulcer and heartburn medication Zantac, should be attributed to U.S. subsidiaries of GlaxoSmithKline PLC and, therefore, subject to tax.

GlaxoSmithKline Holdings (Americas) Inc. agreed to pay $3.4 billion (â,¬2.67 billion) to settle taxes owed from 1989 through 2005, the Internal Revenue Service said Monday. After deductions for state and local taxes, the company will pay $3.1 billion (â,¬2.44 billion) in cash. Glaxo said it had set money aside for the dispute, and the settlement will not have a significant effect on its reported earnings.

The company also said drug prices for customers will not be affected.

As part of the settlement, Glaxo abandoned its claim for a $1.8 billion (â,¬1.42 billion) tax refund. Glaxo spokeswoman Patty Seif said the IRS had rejected the company's refund claim and held that Glaxo owed $8.3 billion (â,¬6.53 billion) for taxes due from 1989 through 2000.

That case had been scheduled for trial at the U.S. Tax Court in February.

Seif said the company calculated it could have owed $14 billion (â,¬11.01 billion) to $15 billion (â,¬11.8 billion) in taxes through 2005 if the IRS had prevailed in court.

The company said it was confident of its position but that "in view of the size of the potential financial exposure, as well as the continued level of resource being applied to the case, GSK concluded that it was in the best interests of its shareholders to reach this settlement, thereby removing the costs and uncertainty of future litigation."

The IRS has been looking more closely at multinational tax practices and the complex transactions that cross borders in the globalized economy. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson this summer told a Senate committee investigating offshore tax abuses that the complexities of globalization and cross-border transactions "create opportunities for aggressive tax planning."

IRS Chief Counsel Donald Korb said Monday that a "key focus" for tax collectors is transfer pricing, the issue involved in the Glaxo dispute, as one area where some multinational companies could take advantage of the global economy to move some profits to a country with lower or no taxes.

Transfer pricing describes the practice within companies for setting a price on goods, services and property when moving them among subsidiaries of a multinational company.

The questions in the Glaxo case concerned how much profits should be attributed to the U.S. based on sales and marketing done in the U.S. and intellectual property owned by the British parent corporation, as well as activities in other countries.

"We have consistently said that transfer pricing is one of the most significant challenges for us in the area of corporate tax administration," Everson said. "The settlement of this case is an important development and sends a strong message of our resolve to continue to deal with this issue going forward."

Former Tyco Tax Officer Is Charged With Filing A False IRS Return (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The former top tax official at Tyco International Ltd. was charged with filing a false tax return for the company that failed to report more than $170 million in income.

Raymond Scott Stevenson, who was vice president in charge of taxation at the manufacturing-and-services conglomerate until 2003, pleaded not guilty before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla., to a felony fraud charge. He was released on $100,000 bail.

According to the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, of Delray Beach, Fla., directed a "series of transactions" designed to reduce Tyco's state tax liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in capital gains under federal tax code. The capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the Internal Revenue Service's criminal division. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson "left off" the $170 million, Ms. Michaud said. Mr. Stevenson's attorney, Carl Schoeppl, was traveling and unavailable for comment.

The transaction may have been related to one of the company's acquisitions, Tyco spokeswoman Sheri Woodruff said. She declined to elaborate. Mr. Stevenson, who worked in the company's Boca Raton, Fla., office, was fired from Tyco in 2003 after five years with the company, Ms. Woodruff said.

She declined to say why he was dismissed. Tyco, which is registered in Bermuda but operates from West Windsor, N.J., has been cooperating with the IRS on an investigation into Mr. Stevenson for at least two years, she said. Ms. Michaud said the investigation is continuing.

Mr. Stevenson was hired under Tyco management led by former chief executive L. Dennis Kozlowski, who left Tyco in June of 2002 and last year was convicted along with former finance chief Mark Swartz of looting more than $150 million from the giant conglomerate. Both men are in prison and have said they plan to appeal.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP, Dems Take Contrasting Approaches To Ethics Reform (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

USA TODAY's view on government corruption rightly chastises Republicans for their failure to pass the reforms necessary to break the links between Congress and special interests. But by failing to draw a distinction between the policy positions of the two parties, the editorial unfairly implicates Democrats in the Republican ruse to block real reform. In fact, there are real differences between the two parties' plans ("Scandal? What scandal? Congress ducks ethics reform," Our view, Government corruption debate, Wednesday).

This past spring, Democrats voted in favor of a true reform bill, the Honest Leadership & Open Government Act, which would ban gifts and travel from lobbyists and the organizations that retain them; prohibit official travel on corporate jets; extend the ban on former members' lobbying to two years; require greater disclosure of lobbyist contacts; mandate fair and open debate in the Congress; and impose tough new standards to end waste, fraud and abuse.

House Republicans, in contrast, put forward only a sham of a proposal, which USA TODAY has rightly called an "anemic excuse" for reform. The Republican bill would not even put an end to the lobbyist financed gifts and travel that are at the heart of the Republican culture of corruption that has plagued Washington.

Democrats stand with the American people and public watchdog groups, such as Common Cause, in support of strong anti-corruption laws. Republicans side with former majority leader Tom DeLay, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the special interests such as Big Oil and the prescription-drug companies that line their pockets and fund their congressional campaigns.

Unfortunately, Republicans have turned this Congress into the most corrupt and closed in history. Democrats want to take Congress in a new direction, to make it the most open and honest in history.

Navy Officials Tried To Fire Chaplain Prior To Charges (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

Internal e-mails indicate that the Navy was moving to fire an outspoken chaplain even before he was charged with disobeying an order.

Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, whose court-martial is scheduled to begin today in Norfolk, yesterday said the e-mails given to his defense team prove that the Navy was plotting to fire him after he had complained publicly about a commander censoring his sermons.

"They were firing me not because I wore my uniform in front of the White House," said Lt. Klingenschmitt, who, despite being ordered not to, participated in a protest of a Navy policy limiting chaplains to "nonsectarian" expressions outside worship services.

"They were firing me eight days before that, because I was a whistleblower to Congress. I was not only punished for quoting the Bible in the chapel, I was punished for exposing that to Congress and the newspapers. It's reprisal, and I'm asking Congress to investigate."

A week before the event, in a March 22 e-mail, Vice Adm. John Harvey, the Navy's top personnel officer, sent an e-mail to Adm. Michael Mullen, the chief of naval operations. In it, Adm. Harvey endorsed a recommendation from Lt. Klingenschmitt's command at the Norfolk Naval Station that the chaplain be "involuntarily" released -- in other words, fired.

"Today, I positively endorsed and forwarded ... the request from [Naval Station, Norfolk, to] involuntarily release chaplain Klingenschmitt from active duty due to lack of career potential," Adm. Harvey wrote to Adm. Mullen.

"This officer is the individual who conducted a hunger strike in front of the White House several months ago and has engaged in other actions concerning [Department of Defense] and Navy religious ministry policies. Klingenschmitt's [commanding officer] has documented a compelling case that this officer has little career potential."

Lt. Karl Lettow, a Navy spokesman at the Pentagon, said the recommendation to fire the chaplain was never acted on by Navy civilian leaders. He said the Navy does not typically comment on correspondence between senior officers.

The Navy charged the chaplain after his March 30 public appearance with former Alabama Chief Justice Roy Moore, who led the protest. He will appear at a special court-martial, facing a jury of three to five officers.

Part of his defense is a Jan. 6 memo from his commanding officer on his request to wear his uniform during public worship. The commander cited Navy regulations that permit the wearing of uniforms when "attending or participating in a bona fide religious service or observance."

Lt. Klingenschmitt said he considers the Moore press conference as an "observance" because he was there to pray.

Lt. Klingenschmitt, a member of a small breakaway evangelical Episcopal denomination, began butting heads with his superiors after he delivered a memorial sermon aboard the cruiser USS Anzio in 2004. He says he was abiding by his faith when he preached the Gospels, including John's admonition that eternal life goes only to those who believe in the son of God.

The ship's captain did not think the sermon was inclusive and counseled Lt. Klingenschmitt, who deemed the move harassment and censorship.

"They want to take a black Magic Marker to my Bible and tell me I can't read the Scripture in the chapel," he said this summer. But a Navy investigation found his complaint "without merit."

Digging Us Out Of The Deficit With Holey Math (WP)

By Allan Sloan

DOJ_NMG_0061650

Next month, the White House and its congressional allies will be taking victory laps when the deficit for fiscal 2006 is announced. The stated deficit for the year, which ends Sept. 30, will be $260 billion or so. That will be down $58 billion from 2005 and a whopping $77 billion below what the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted in January. The White House says this is happening largely because tax revenues have surged, which they have. It sure sounds great.

But let me share a dirty little secret with you: The real federal deficit isn't $260 billion. It's more than double that. And when you calculate what I consider the real deficit -- hold on to your hats, it's $558 billion -- you come out with slightly more than last year's real deficit, which I put at $551 billion. Revenue surge, shmevenue surge. Things are getting worse, not better.

That $558 billion is better than the $635 billion implied in January's CBO numbers. But it's nothing to crow about, considering that not long from now, baby boomers will begin to retire en masse and put huge pressure on the budget.

We know that numbers in Washington tend to be big and are sometimes murky. But how can the official deficit be only $260 billion while my calculation is $558 billion? Am I taking strange pills? Drinking funny water? Nope. It's the difference between Washington Math -- the unique way the federal government accounts for itself -- and real-world math.

Here's the deal. The stated deficit is the difference between the cash the government takes in and the cash it spends. That's $260 billion, the number most analysts use to measure the deficit. But Uncle Sam will also borrow almost $300 billion from federal trust funds: $177 billion from Social Security and $121 billion more from "other government accounts," such as federal-employee pension funds. About $78 billion of this total comes from the Treasury taking Social Security's cash surplus this year and spending it. Most of the rest comes from the government paying what it owes the trust funds -- primarily for interest on their $3.6 trillion of Treasury securities -- with IOUs, not cash. (All my numbers, by the way, are based on public budget documents.)

If a company tried to keep books this way, its accountants would scream faster than you can say Sarbanes-Oxley. But we're playing by the rules of Washington Math.

I readily concede that if you want to measure the deficit's effect on financial markets, using $260 billion makes sense. After all, that's how much the government is borrowing from "public investors" such as banks, foreign governments and you and me. But if you want to see how much deeper the fiscal hole is getting for taxpayers present and future, which is how I think we should measure the deficit, you have to include the almost $300 billion of trust-fund IOUs. Unless, of course, you expect Uncle Sam to default on his promises.

I've written about the differences between Washington Math and real-world math since the Clinton administration. The budget situation was improving then and got to be pretty good -- though not as good as the Clintonistas wanted us to believe -- thanks to fiscal responsibility, a surge in revenue and partisan gridlock that reined in spending.

Now things are heading the wrong way. Not enough people seem to care that we're hocking ourselves to the eyeballs and borrowing heavily from foreign lenders, such as Asian central banks, whose future national interests may differ from ours. "There's a disconnect from reality," says Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), a longtime deficit hawk who is one of the few people who calculates the budget shortfall the way I do. "It's utterly reckless," Conrad told me. "The debt load and our growing obligations to foreign creditors are weakening us. We're running risks we shouldn't run."

I agree. So when the budget victory song is sung in Washington next month, I'll curb my enthusiasm. If you're worried about our country's financial future, you'll curb yours, too.

A note about my Johnson & Johnson column ("J&J's Advantage in Pfizer Purchase: Taxes," Aug. 8): I can tell from readers' responses that I didn't make my point about J&J's purchase of Pfizer's consumer-products business as clearly as I should have. So let me try again. My problem isn't with J&J's tax savings on the deal -- it's with J&J's lack of disclosure. The tax savings are perfectly fine. But J&J hasn't disclosed anything about the savings, which by my math reduce the effective cost of the $16.6 billion deal by more than $4 billion. J&J hasn't told Wall Street about this and wouldn't discuss it with me for that column. Even for an enormous company such as J&J, $4 billion-plus is bigger than a Band-Aid. 'Nuf said.

The Milberg Effect (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Cornerstone Research released a study this summer showing a huge drop in securities class-action suits, and a common explanation has been that this is a result of new rules designed to keep the corporate community on the straight and narrow: No wrongdoing, no need for lawyers.

Well, not exactly. Lawsuits are certainly down, but a closer inspection of the numbers shows that the drop-off directly correlates with the decline in filing by one law firm: Milberg Weiss. Long the nation's premier class-action generator, the entire firm and two partners were indicted in May of paying off their class-action plaintiffs.

According to Cornerstone, a research firm that tracks litigation, law firms filed 179 class actions last year. The first six months of this year saw only 61, a rate that would result in about 123 class actions for the year -- or a decrease from 2005 of 56 suits. Meanwhile, according to publicly available press releases, Milberg Weiss filed 91 of last year's suits. Yet in the first six months of this year, having come under prosecutorial scrutiny and lost many lawyers, the firm has filed only 17. At this rate, Milberg would tally about 34 suits for the year -- or 57 fewer than 2005.

These numbers are more than a coincidence, and should put to rest the assumption that Sarbanes-Oxley or better corporate governance standards are producing fewer causes of legal action. Securities lawyers have long understood that most class actions have little or no substance but are manufactured by the plaintiffs bar to pad their own pocketbooks.

Milberg Weiss has been a master of "strike" suits, which involve suing companies for the crime of a falling stock price in the hope of forcing a settlement. In the Justice Department's indictment, Milberg plaintiffs are said to have bought certain stocks in anticipation of suing when the share price fell on some negative news. Milberg is accused of funneling millions of dollars of kickbacks to these individuals in return for their serving as a lead plaintiffs in class-action suits.

The numbers should also provide all the evidence Congress needs to conclude that the only real way to rein in America's runaway legal system is with tort reform that allows redress of genuine wrongs but limits the ability of lawyers to game the system. Milberg Weiss may be in the dock, but it's only a matter of time before other firms take up the slack.

Economists' Inflation Estimates Up (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, September 12, 2006

BOSTON — Inflation will rise faster than previously thought through the end of the year while economic growth will be slower, a group of prominent economists said Monday, painting an especially hazy outlook.

The National Association for Business Economics said inflation expectations rose significantly in its survey of 50 members conducted in August from its last poll released four months ago. Instead of expecting so-called core inflation, which excludes often-volatile food and energy costs, to rise 2.3% in the second half of 2006, the economists' median forecast is for the index to rise 2.9% in the third quarter and 2.7% in the fourth quarter.

At the same time, the group lowered its forecast for economic growth and job creation through the middle of next year.

“There's a lot of uncertainty out there,” Wachovia economist John Silvia says.

The inflation projections from the NABE members were far above the range of what most Federal Reserve officials, including Chairman Ben Bernanke, have said is their informal inflation comfort zone, of between 1% and 2%.

But 60% of the NABE respondents said they believed the Fed would leave interest rates — its inflation-fighting weapon — unchanged through the end of the year as they watch previous rate increases filter through the economy.

Rajeev Dhawan, director of the economic forecasting center at Georgia State University, says while inflation may be above 2%, what is important is that it is projected to slowly decline. That allows the Fed to stay on the sidelines, he says.

After raising interest rates 17 times in two years, Fed policymakers last month left their target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs economywide, at 5.25%. That is the highest level in almost six years.

Fed officials are widely expected to leave rates untouched when they meet Sept. 20. But a number of policymakers have stressed they may need to raise rates again to halt inflation.

Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan on Monday noted the "breadth and persistence" of gains in inflation in recent months and called higher inflation a "key risk" to the economy. But in a speech to NABE members, she said she expected inflation to ease in coming quarters as growth slows.

St. Louis Fed President William Poole, meanwhile, stressed the importance of the Fed being pre-emptive in fighting inflation.

"We have to have a policy that is as tight as it needs to be, but not more so … that will work these inflation rates down over a period of time," he told reporters here.

NABE Economists Expect Slowdown But No Recession (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The U.S. economy will post below-trend growth the rest of 2006 and into 2007, but an outright recession is unlikely, according to a survey of economists released Monday by the National Association for Business Economics.

Meanwhile, productivity should slow and inflation rise, according to NABE, but the Federal Reserve is nevertheless expected to keep interest rates steady through the end of the year and cut rates in 2007.

Speaking to the NABE Monday, Federal Reserve Bank of Boston President Cathy Minehan cautioned that inflation remains a risk, and that the Fed should remain "quite vigilant" in containing that risk even as the U.S. economy slows. (See the full text of Minehan's remarks1.)

Ms. Minehan's forecast suggests that the central bank can continue to keep rates unchanged while it surveys the economic scene. The Fed last month kept the federal funds rate at 5.25%, the first pause since the Fed began its credit-tightening campaign in mid-2004.

Regarding inflation, St. Louis Fed President William Poole said the Fed's credibility is "essential" to stable long-term inflation expectations, and "the cost of restoring credibility makes clear the reason for not losing it."

In prepared remarks, Mr. Poole repeated his support of an inflation target. He noted that he has in the past offered a "personal" objective of "zero inflation, properly measured." (Read the full text of Poole's remarks2.)

But Mr. Poole also added that Fed agreement "on an inflation objective, which some might express as a "comfort zone of 1-2% inflation" is more important than which precise specification is selected." Mr. Poole also urged greater transparency in order to reduce "asymmetries of knowledge."

"Because a full rational expectations equilibrium requires complete knowledge on the part of the private sector of central bank thinking and analysis, Federal Reserve research findings should be distributed widely," Mr. Poole said.

The U.S. economy grew at a 5.6% rate in the first quarter and 2.9% in the second. Economists generally think the U.S. economy can expand in the 3.25% range without putting pressure on inflation.

But recession is unlikely, with the NABE panel pegging just 10% odds of a recession beginning this year and a 25% chance in 2007. The biggest threat, cited by 46% of survey respondents, is higher energy prices, followed by rising interest rates and declining home prices.

Gross domestic product is projected by the 50 forecasters surveyed by NABE to expand 2.6% in the second half of 2006. For 2007, the NABE panel cut its forecast to 2.8% from the 3% rate it expected when last surveyed in May. The latest survey was conducted between Aug. 9 and 24.

Subtrend growth should lead to less hiring, with NABE cutting its payroll growth forecast through the end of 2007 by 0.3 percentage point to 1.1%. That should push the jobless rate up to 4.9% next year from its current 4.7% level.

"Given the importance of high employment, a period of sustained excessive unemployment may create doubts about future policy and this uncertainty is a manifestation of impaired credibility," Mr. Poole said.

"There is a fine balance here," Mr. Poole added, noting that when joblessness rises, "policy makers need to be able to explain in credible fashion why the problem is not a consequence of a monetary policy mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0061653

Productivity will be less of a factor in limiting price pressures than it has been in the past, according to NABE. Survey respondents cut their 2006 productivity growth forecast to 2.2% from the 2.5% forecast in the May survey. Productivity next year is expected to rise just 2.1%.

Meanwhile, unit labor costs are expected to climb 2.7% this year and 2.3% next year, up from the 1.9% rate expected for both years in the May NABE survey.

But the Fed won't respond to higher inflation and labor costs by raising interest rates, according to NABE, with the median forecast for fed funds at 5.25% through the end of 2006.

One "obvious concern" to the economic outlook, Ms. Minehan said, is housing. While she's "comfortable" with forecasts for a "moderate downturn" in residential building, Ms. Minehan cautioned that recent data, including "gloomy assessments' by home builders, "remind me that this assessment could well be optimistic."

"There are clear risks to the baseline housing outlook," she said, citing the effect of higher mortgage rates on borrowers, particularly subprime borrowers.

Trade Picture Brightens (WSJ)

By Justin Lahart

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Today's trade report will probably show a whopper of a deficit for July, something that always gives investors a fright about holding U.S. dollar assets. But dig a little deeper, and it looks like a shift in the nation's trade is happening.

Economists polled by Dow Jones Newswires are looking for a July trade deficit of $65.5 billion, up from June's $64.8 billion and prospectively the third largest monthly deficit ever.

Oil prices were ticking to new highs in July. That meant upward pressure on the value of imports and the deficit. The U.S. shortfall in oil accounts for 30% of the total trade deficit. According to the Labor Department, prices for imported petroleum products were 4.7% higher in July than they were in June.

But oil prices have dropped sharply since July, which could bring the import figure back down. Meanwhile, away from oil, imports were already looking subdued in July. Belle Morales, vice president of sales and marketing for Inglewood, Calif., logistics company Dynalink Systems, says her firm saw a 10% decrease in inbound cargo volume for July and August from a year earlier.

July is usually the beginning of the peak shipping season, when holiday orders start streaming through ports to retailers. It may be the peak season was merely delayed. Rising European demand has some Asian suppliers racing to keep up, making it harder to fill U.S. orders. It might also be that supply-chain improvements made U.S. retailers comfortable placing holiday orders later in the year, Ms. Morales says.

But maybe retailers are pushing back orders because they're afraid consumers aren't going to spend much this holiday season -- a real worry with the values of homes softening.

Even as imports slow, continued growth in Asia should keep U.S. exports strong, says Investment Technology Group economist Robert Barbera. Those exports will help boost economic growth, a plus at a time when other engines of growth seem to be slowing.

Taken together, it spells a better trade picture in the months ahead, a silver lining for investors who worry about financing the mammoth trade shortfall. The dark cloud is that weary U.S. consumers might be behind much of it.

Rising Inventory Of Unsold Homes Is Likely To Put Pressure On Prices (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

A continued rise in inventories of unsold homes in August is likely to put more downward pressure on home prices in parts of the U.S.

Inventories of homes in 18 large metropolitan areas across the country expanded by 4.7% in August from a month earlier, according to data compiled by ZipRealty Inc., a real-estate brokerage firm based in Emeryville, Calif. The data are based on single-family homes and condos included in local multiple-listing services of homes for sale.

The biggest increases -- 16% in the Dallas area and 13% in Seattle -- came in markets that have been relatively strong recently. A sharp rise in inventories in those areas is likely to help restrain price increases. Other sizable increases came in Orlando, Fla. (8%), San Francisco (6.1%) and Miami (5.6%).

Of the 18 metro areas, only two showed lower inventories. Boston was down 1.5% and Washington, D.C., 1.6%. Prices have declined modestly in both areas over the past year. For instance, the median home price in the northern Virginia suburbs of Washington was $459,000 in August, down 8% from a year earlier, according to Metropolitan Regional Information Systems Inc., a data-tracking firm in Rockville, Md. Such price declines are likely causing some people who can't get the price they want to take their homes off the market and wait for a recovery.

Home sales have plunged over the past year in many areas where prices had soared over the preceding five years, notably in California, Florida, Arizona, Massachusetts and the Washington, D.C., area. Many potential buyers are waiting for prices to come down further. The persistent weakness in these markets has prompted many housing experts to say prices will have to decline more to revive sales.

Sellers gradually seem to be realizing that they will have to lower prices, says Patrick Lashinsky, a senior vice president at ZipRealty. "There's finally some realism getting into the picture."

Ivy Zelman, a housing analyst at Credit Suisse Group in Cleveland, estimates that prices of newly built homes in San Diego, Sacramento, Calif., Phoenix, northern Virginia and southwest Florida already are down as much as 10% to 15% from a year ago. That estimate includes "concessions" from builders, such as upgraded kitchens or help with closing costs, which are disguised price cuts. But Ms. Zelman still sees more price declines ahead. "We believe that the housing market is still in the early innings of a hard landing that will likely take several years to develop," she says.

Even the National Association of Realtors, normally very bullish on home prices, now predicts a drop in median prices for the nation as a whole. David Lereah, chief economist for the Realtors, forecasts that prices will decline modestly in the next few months. After that dip, he says, prices are likely to resume rising, but at a slower-than-normal rate.

Dow Ekes Out Gain After Early Slide As Oil, Gold Retreat From Lofty Heights (WSJ)

By Shefali Anand

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

With positive news about oil and gold, investors pushed a seesaw trading session upward enough for stocks to close slightly higher.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 4.73 points, or 0.04%, to close at 11396.84. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.1%, or 0.62 point, to 1299.54. The technology-stock-laden Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.3%, or 7.46 points, to 2173.25.

Oil fell for a sixth straight day, to the lowest close in more than five months. Crude-oil futures contracts guaranteeing October delivery slid 64 cents, or 1%, to $65.61 a barrel, at the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gold declined on the Comex division of Nymex, by $19.60 a troy ounce, or 3.2%, to $590 -- its lowest close since June 29. (More on the oil and gold slides.1)

Despite the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' decision to leave its production quota unchanged, and signs that oil-rich Iran may continue diplomatic talks with the West, some traders say that may not be enough for the oil-price decline to continue.

"The market could work its way higher in the next week or so," said Jeff Grossman, president of commodities trading firm BRG Brokerage. He said traders will be watching crude-oil inventory figures, due tomorrow.

Stocks began the day with a decline -- the Dow industrials were down almost 50 points at one point, but recovered on hopes that inflation may be under control. St. Louis Federal Reserve President William Poole's comments about a "robust" economy and controlled inflation "seemed to really put a spring in the market," said Jon Brorson, head of growth equities at Lehman Brothers Asset Management.

Stocks of energy and material companies slumped. Dow components Alcoa, Exxon Mobil and Caterpillar slipped 5.3%, 2.8% and 2.7%, respectively.

Dell fell 2.1% on news that it would delay filing some financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission, as a previously announced SEC probe and its own investigation of its financial accounting could affect results.

Other technology stocks were among the gainers. Dow component Hewlett-Packard rose less than 1%, as its board continued to try to resolve issues raised by the company's investigation into leaks to the media. Shares of Freescale Semiconductor rose about 21% on news that it may be purchased by a private-equity consortium.

Traders at the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq observed a minute of silence, at 9.29 a.m. and 10:29 a.m. EDT respectively, to mark the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. On the Big Board, where 2.55 billion shares traded, 1,459 stocks rose and 1,775 fell.

Bonds declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.803%. The 30-year bond fell 11/32, to yield 4.945%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.59 yen, up from 116.90 yen, while the euro rose slightly against the dollar to $1.2702 from $1.2671.

Average Gas Price Falls 11 Cents A Gallon In A Week (USAT)

By James R. Healey, Usa Today

USA Today, September 12, 2006

$2 gas could be possible

Gasoline prices continue to tumble, almost free-falling toward levels not seen in five months.

The nationwide average for regular was $2.618 a gallon, the Energy Information Administration reported Monday. That was 10.9 cents lower than a week earlier.

"The reason prices are going down so far so fast is that they shouldn't have been that high in the first place. Two reasons they were: fear and speculation," says Mike O'Connor, president of the Virginia Petroleum, Convenience and Grocery Association. It represents gasoline distributors who operate about 4,000 stations.

O'Connor says $2 gasoline "is more likely than unlikely" if the Gulf of Mexico isn't hit by hurricanes and if there isn't a flare-up of tensions in oil-producing regions.

In many metro areas, prices averaged less than $2.30 Monday, according to AAA. And only in Hawaii was the statewide average more than $3.

AAA reported a U.S. average Monday of $2.624 per gallon for unleaded regular, down 1.6 cents over the weekend. Hawaii, burdened by high shipping and distribution costs, averaged $3.284, down 1.1 cents.

High prices of spring and summer attracted more imported gasoline than usual, contributing to the above-average supplies that now are keeping prices down. "We had record levels of gasoline imports for a while, more than 1 million barrels a day just of gasoline," says Neil Gamson, analyst at the EIA.

Falling prices are cheering gasoline retailers as much as motorists.

"When it was $3, I was paying 9 cents a gallon in credit card fees. It's a percentage (of the price). The retailer pays that; the customer never sees that. There were many times I was close to breaking even or even losing money," says Jinger Duryea, president of C.N. Brown in South Paris, Maine, which operates 90 convenience stores that sell fuel. "The first part of the year has been abysmal. We're all breathing a sigh of relief."

EIA plans to issue a short-term energy forecast today that will predict gasoline prices. That will suggest how low prices will go and how long they will stay there. EIA's previous short-term forecast was for an average $2.72 per gallon for all of this year, and $2.67 next year.

Although motorists worried that once the $3 barrier was pierced, prices never would fall much, the current drop-offs are logical, Gamson says: "The driving season is over. There's plenty of gasoline in inventory and crude oil prices have been dropping a lot. It's mainly market fundamentals."

OPEC Sets Stage To Cut Output Should Oil Prices Keep Falling (WSJ)

By Steve Levine, Bhushan Bahree

DOJ_NMG_0061656

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

VIENNA -- The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries decided to let its production fluctuate rather than adhere to its formal quotas, allowing the cartel to curb output quietly should oil prices continue their recent swoon.

As expected, the cartel didn't change its official oil-production target of 28 million barrels a day. More important, though, OPEC has effectively agreed to ignore those quotas for now.

Senior OPEC officials said oil marketers from member countries would base their sales of crude on demand from customers. The cartel will seek to avoid pushing more oil than needed by markets -- implying it would seek to avoid discounting, a necessary step to shore up prices should demand weaken.

"It's up to our marketing people now to decide how much will be produced and sold," the head of one delegation said. "We have agreed to neither push oil in the market nor hold back" needed supply, this official said.

The move comes amid slowing demand for crude and concerns that weakening world economic growth might further undercut it. The Energy Department said yesterday that the average U.S. price for regular gasoline has fallen about 42 cents a gallon since the beginning of August and stands at about $2.62 a gallon. (See related article.1)

The cartel has been selling about 500,000 barrels a day less oil than the 28 million barrel upper limit. Some OPEC members are unable to produce up to their quotas, while others are exceeding theirs to meet demand.

The cartel may pursue the oil-output model followed by Saudi Arabia in recent years. As OPEC's largest exporter, the kingdom has produced more than its quota when buyers needed extra oil and has eased off as demand has weakened. The new understanding would pave the way for others to act similarly.

OPEC officials have grown anxious about crude prices, which have fallen about 15% since hitting a nominal record in July. It is too soon to know whether the three-year boom is about to go bust. Analysts say the margin of spare pumping capacity remains so thin that a sizable supply outage could send prices surging. But OPEC, at least, is preparing the groundwork to halt a collapse.

OPEC has backed away from quotas in times of crisis, such as the aftermath of Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait. During the recent boom, its quotas sometimes were rendered irrelevant as members pumped flat out. But those efforts were intended to bring down prices.

Some analysts have been forecasting that crude prices could fall toward the $50-a-barrel level, though those estimates were made before the OPEC meeting. OPEC's latest decision "could, over time, halt the slide in prices," said Antoine Halff, an analyst at Fimat USA, the brokerage arm of Société Générale.

The communiqué the cartel issued yesterday didn't mention quotas. It said, in part, "Member Countries would take the necessary steps to ensure that supply and demand remained in balance, with prices at reasonable levels, supplying to the market the needed volumes."

Roger Diwan, an analyst at PFC Energy, said OPEC output is likely to decline by about 400,000 barrels a day in coming months because of weak demand and the need to shore up prices.

OPEC ministers will now watch for signs the fall may be turning into a rout. The cartel's next gathering is scheduled for December, but the new understanding would allow members to trim output without a formal meeting.

OPEC is refraining from curbing output formally in part for fear of provoking a backlash in the U.S., Europe and other big importing regions. Crude prices remain more than double their level of three years ago. On the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday, oil futures for October delivery fell 64 cents, or 1%, to settle at $65.61 a barrel.

OPEC Leaves Oil Output Quotas In Place As Price Keeps Falling (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Crude oil prices continued their downward march yesterday as the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries left its production targets unchanged and as Europe's foreign policy chief raised hopes of a peaceful resolution to the standoff over Iran's nuclear program.

Signs of slower world economic growth and relatively high worldwide inventories of petroleum also helped knock the price of a barrel of crude oil to $65.61 on the New York Mercantile Exchange, down 64 cents yesterday and a slide of 17 percent from its all-time peak in July.

Oil markets are beset by "the perfect calm," said Edward Morse, a managing director and chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers Inc. He noted that anticipated hurricanes had not emerged, tightness in gasoline markets dissipated and political disruptions in supplies had not materialized.

Though prices are still very high by historical standards, the decline in the past month has eased some of the pressure on U.S. motorists. Prices at the pump fell for a fifth week, plunging 10.9 cents to a nationwide average of about $2.62 a gallon, the Energy Information Administration said yesterday. According to the government's weekly survey of about 800 filling stations, costs at the pump have declined 42 cents since Aug. 7.

Weakening oil prices were mixed news in Vienna, where OPEC oil ministers met yesterday and decided to leave their production target at 28 million barrels a day. The group often says that it fears high prices will drive consumers to alternative energy sources or non-OPEC oil, and its president, Nigerian oil minister Edmund Maduabebe Daukoru, said yesterday that OPEC was pleased to see prices drop from their peak levels.

But the ministers talked mostly of "downside risks" to prices and asserted that they might move to trim output later in the year if prices continued to slump. Chakib Helil, Algeria's oil minister, said that OPEC would "watch the market very closely," and Daukoru said that the group was concerned about the speed of the price decline, Bloomberg News reported.

"They like high prices, but they're relatively uncertain about the future because there's no way to be certain," Morse said. "They don't like the rate at which oil prices are falling. They are poised to jump in at some point . . . if the price continues falling at the rate it's been falling."

OPEC's 11 members, who produce nearly 40 percent of the world's oil, have kept their combined oil production target unchanged since July 2005, a level they said was high enough to ease record prices. In an opening speech to the group, Daukoru tried to deflect blame for soaring summer prices away from OPEC, pointing instead to the war in Lebanon, market "speculators" and BP's Alaska pipeline problems. World crude oil inventories, he noted, stand "comfortably above" their five year average.

As a practical matter, OPEC has limited ability to increase or decrease production. With political disputes or violence curtailing production in Iraq, Nigeria and Venezuela, Saudi Arabia remains the main swing producer, with the ability to trim or boost output from its current level of a little more than 9 million barrels a day.

Daukuro also confirmed reports that the amount of Nigerian output curtailed by militant attacks on facilities has risen to 872,000 barrels a day, about 40 percent of the country's production capacity. The militants have attacked pipelines and an export terminal in the Niger Delta as well as boats carrying workers to offshore production platforms.

One key factor in the price drop over the past month has been the diminishing prospect of conflict over Iran's nuclear program. A U.N. deadline for Iranian action has passed without consequences, Germany's chancellor has publicly opposed military action, Iran's former president has urged talks and Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief, described a meeting yesterday with Iran's top negotiator in the dispute over the country's nuclear program as "productive."

"The window of opportunity is not very long," Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said in Vienna. He said he hoped Iranian and E.U. negotiators would reach an agreement when they meet next week.

In oil markets, concerns also mounted over a slowdown in the world economy. The prices for other commodities also declined yesterday.

But Adam E. Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank AG, warned against the expectation that a slowdown would bring much lower oil prices.

"All this talk about the oil and commodities boom being over would make a lot more sense if we were in midst of global recession, but we're not," he said. "No one is talking about a huge U.S. recession. The question is whether we will grow at 2 percent or 3 percent." That means, he said, that oil markets will remain tight at least for the rest of this year and next, leaving consumers vulnerable to a single disruption in supplies.

Opec Move Sparks Slide In Oil Price (FT)

By Kevin Morrison, Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Oil prices fell on Monday to their lowest level since the end of March after the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries agreed to keep production quotas unchanged.

But members of the cartel signalled they might reduce output later this year to limit any further fall in world oil prices.

The European benchmark, Brent, dropped $1.09 to $64.24 a barrel in late afternoon London trade, and near its lowest level in more than five months. It is now more than 18 per cent down on its record high of $78.65, touched just over a month ago.

Falling crude prices sparked sharp declines in other commodity markets. Gold traded below the key $600-an-ounce threshold for the first time since late June, while copper fell 4.5 per cent to $7,460.50 a tonne.

Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers, said oil prices were unlikely to carry on falling. "We have had the perfect lull, but it is not a turning point when prices will continue to decline," he said.

Mr Morse said the fall reflected the easing of tension between the west and Iran over its nuclear ambitions, the end of the Israel-Lebanon conflict, lack of hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico region and an end to the US summer driving season.

Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's energy minister, shrugged off the fall in prices, calling it "a blip".

Opec ministers agreed to keep the cartel's official production at 28m barrels a day, even though the 10 members that abide by quotas are producing 500,000 b/d less. With the cartel producing below official limits, analysts said Opec may cut at its next meeting in Nigeria in December.

"The process is starting now. It's been several years since they've had to cut back," said Carl Calabro, analyst at PFC energy, the Washington based consulting firm. Mr Calabro said there was already a surplus of fuel oil in the market, in particular in Singapore, but also in the US, where inventories are 25 per cent higher than normal.

Mr Morse said the focus on inventories was overdone, as global inventories in absolute terms will have to continue to grow in order to maintain the "comfort level" of between 50 and 55 days of forward demand cover.

He said oil demand had risen by about 10m b/d in the past six years, which translates to another 500m barrels of oil needed in storage.

Oil traders expect prices to rise by the end of the year.

The US benchmark oil price, the West Texas Intermediate, is quoted at more than $67 a barrel for December, compared with the current spot price of $65.50.

Oil traders said concern about the fall in oil prices may be overdone, given that US benchmark oil prices are 7 per cent lower than the record peak of $70.85 reached in August last year in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

'Blogosphere' Spurs Government Oversight (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — When watchdog groups that monitor federal spending wanted more information on 1,800 "pork barrel" projects buried in a House appropriations bill, they listed them on the Internet and asked readers to dig deeper. Within days, details began pouring in.

The same thing happened when Porkbusters.org enlisted readers of its website to find out which senator had blocked legislation that would create an online database of federal grants and contracts. One by one, senators were eliminated until Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., were uncovered.

The two episodes illustrate the latest trend in government oversight: More light is being thrown on Congress, not just by the media and public interest groups, but in the "blogosphere" where Internet users meet.

"It's probably the biggest expansion of government oversight that we'll ever have," says Thomas Schatz of Citizens Against Government Waste, one of the groups pioneering the effort. "It will turn every American into a watchdog."

Their involvement is getting action: House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has promised a vote this week on a rules change that would ensure the sponsors of individual projects are identified. And Republicans in the House and Senate say they will approve the national database this year.

The amateur investigators are people such as Jamie Peppard, an accountant from Long Island, N.Y., and serial blogger who writes under the name "Mrs. Panstreppon." She researched groups such as the Congressional Glaucoma Caucus Foundation, which stands to receive nearly $1.2 million to screen patients in New York, Texas and the Virgin Islands. She unearthed tax forms showing the foundation pays several six-figure salaries.

They're people like Mario Delgado, the publisher of Porkopolis, a Cincinnati-based blog that determined Ohio stands to gain nearly $34 million from 135 projects in the pending House appropriations bill that funds health, education and labor programs.

And they're people nationwide who called their senators to ask if they were blocking action on the database — an obscure bill that has become controversial because of senators' anonymous objections. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., credited the passion of the "blogosphere" for winning Senate passage last week.

"There are citizens in every community who either take this as their responsibility or as their joy — or maybe a little bit of both," says Zephyr Teachout, national director of the Sunlight Foundation, which seeks greater transparency in government. "Reporters and good-government groups can't do it on their own. There's a real need."

Advances in technology and communication now make it easier for average citizens to be researchers, reporters and muckrakers.

The model for many watchdog groups is the Center for Responsive Politics, whose website, opensecrets.org, puts information about lobbying and campaign finance into accessible formats for Internet users. "Citizens have been doing some really good work on their own," says Ellen Miller, who left the center to take charge of the Sunlight Foundation.

Citizens got involved last year when blogger Josh Marshall, publisher of TPM Muckraker, urged readers to find out which House Republicans voted in closed caucus to let indicted lawmakers keep their leadership posts. After a public outcry, Republicans reversed the vote. As a result, Texas' Tom DeLay had to step down as majority leader last year after being indicted on campaign finance charges.

Such citizen involvement peaked again this summer when watchdog groups ranging from the conservative Citizens Against Government Waste to the more liberal Sunlight Foundation sought to shed new light on congressional "earmarks," the individual projects lawmakers insert into spending bills.

Nearly 10,000 projects costing $29 billion were funded in the current fiscal year. It was another project, however — the so-called bridge to nowhere in Alaska, originally included in last year's highway bill for $223 million — that made the issue politically volatile.

"The bridge to nowhere certainly got some traction," says Sen. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., who supported it as part of the highway bill. His challenger in next week's primary, Steve Laffey, opposes all earmarks.

When word filtered out last month that a senator was refusing to let the database bill come to a vote, Porkbusters urged its online faithful to find out who it was. Nearly every senator denied involvement. Ultimately, Stevens and Byrd acknowledged objections.

Around the same time, a loose coalition of groups published a complete list of earmarks in the House version of Congress' biggest spending bill, each adding unique technological tools. Porkbusters breaks them down by state and keyword. Sunlight uses Google Maps to show where each project is located.

Bloggers such as Jamie Peppard took it from there. She dug into groups such as the glaucoma foundation, discovering that it paid $340,000 to its CEO and more than $100,000 each to a consultant and part-time treasurer.

"I'm an ordinary citizen who does not have to answer to shareholders or anyone else," Peppard says. "I also have the luxury of spending as much time on a particular project as I want to."

Government watchdogs say the new effort to reach and empower average citizens is a two-way street: It provides Americans with needed information and enables them to give some back.

DOJ_NMG_0061660

"Maybe it really will be an empowering tool — the Internet leveling the playing field," says Gary Bass, executive director of OMB Watch, which seeks greater government accountability and citizen participation. "If that's true, this is very, very exciting."

Plans To Honor L.A. Muslim Leader Bring Out Animosity (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

In a public hearing spiced with accusations of Jew-hating and Muslim-bashing, nearly four dozen religious, ethnic and civil rights activists spoke out Monday on whether a prominent Los Angeles Muslim should be disqualified from receiving a prestigious humanitarian award because he has expressed some views critical of Israel.

Maher Hathout, chairman of the Islamic Center of Southern California, is the first Muslim chosen for the award from the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission. But some Jewish groups have vehemently objected to the selection, calling Hathout an extremist masquerading as a moderate, and are urging the commission to rescind the award before it is presented next month.

At Monday's commission hearing, the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles, an umbrella organization of 22 groups representing 40,000 donors, stepped forward as the latest and most influential opponent to Hathout.

Federation President John R. Fischel told commissioners that Hathout's "false and controversial" statements about Israel — that it is an apartheid state, for instance — had offended and angered many Jews.

"Dr. Hathout takes partisan positions which do not foster harmonious and equitable intergroup relations…. His words regrettably create the very fissures and divides that the [commission] is seeking to repair," Fischel told commissioners.

But Hathout's supporters Monday were more diverse and outnumbered opponents 2 to 1. Christians, Muslims and Jews, blacks, Latinos and Asian Americans, and such civil rights leaders as Connie Rice, who received the 2002 award, spoke forcefully in support of Hathout, describing him as a tireless proponent of interfaith and interethnic harmony.

Rice said it was difficult for her to break with her longtime Jewish friends on the issue, but that Hathout had taken "extraordinarily difficult" actions in promoting tolerance and moderation.

The furor over the award, she said, had turned the issue into a "seminal struggle" over whether Los Angeles would be seen as embracing or rejecting a man who preached tolerant Islamism.

"If we send a message to Muslims in Southern California that someone who has tried so hard to bridge … all of our communities cannot be acknowledged, we would have done extreme damage," Rice said.

Hathout also won support from the man that the 14-member commission originally chose for the award — the Rev. James M. Lawson Jr., a civil rights leader and president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference of Greater Los Angeles, who was unavailable to accept the award because he is teaching in Nashville.

In a letter read to commissioners Monday, Lawson urged them to reject what he called "extremism which seeks to vilify Dr. Hathout's name and character." He praised the Muslim leader as "a person of immeasurable integrity and honesty" who "reflects the best not only of the Muslim faith, but the finest of any faith."

In addition, several rabbis and the Progressive Jewish Alliance spoke in support of Hathout, saying that criticism of Israel should not be equated with backing terrorism or the destruction of the Jewish state.

Despite the deeply felt views and occasional outbursts of name-calling, the hearing remained largely calm and controlled. Commissioners will meet again Monday to vote on a final resolution.

The award was established more than a decade ago to honor outstanding contributions toward fostering better relations among diverse communities.

Last year's winner was Zara Buggs Taylor, who was honored for her work in fighting discriminatory hiring practices and biased portrayals in the media.

In 2002, the award was given to Rice, a director and co-founder of the Advancement Project, which is dedicated to building a racially just democracy and breaking down barriers to real opportunity.

DOJ_NMG_0061661

Hathout has said — and repeated again Monday — that he supports a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In introductory remarks to commissioners, the Egyptian native and retired cardiologist said he came to the U.S. 35 years ago with his family seeking freedom.

In 1989, Hathout said, he was an early Muslim voice to condemn the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's fatwa against Indian-born British novelist Salman Rushdie.

Two years later, he said, he barred from speaking at his mosque the extremist Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, who was convicted in 1995 of seditious conspiracy in connection with a plot to blow up several New York-area landmarks.

Hathout also said he wrote two books undermining any Islamic justification for suicide bombings and other terrorism, and initiated the city's first dialogues among Muslims, Christians and Jews.

"I am very proud of my record," he said. "I believe in human dignity."

Hathout added that his harsh words about Israeli state policies were spoken from "immense pain" he felt over Palestinian suffering, but that he meant no offense to citizens of Israel or Jews.

But Marcie Polier Swartz, a Brentwood businesswoman who was a co-founder of the first Los Angeles Muslim-Jewish dialogue, said she and most other Jews eventually dropped out.

She and others said Monday that they were particularly upset that the Muslim leader was recorded at a Washington, D.C., rally in 2000 condemning as traitors Arab governments that entered into dialogues with Israel.

Hathout, however, said he was not opposing Arab governments' talks with Israel but their oppressive regimes.

Hathout's opponents reaffirmed the Muslim leader's right to voice his sentiments — but argued that they were too divisive to merit giving him a human relations award.

At least one commissioner, the Rev. Zedar E. Broadous, said he had heard "nothing new" to change his original vote in July to support Hathout.

But others said they wanted time to review the voluminous material — including hundreds of e-mails — submitted from around the nation over the selection.

Mehlman: GOP Will Hold (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman predicted Monday that the GOP would maintain its control of both Congressional chambers, using a $47 million across-the-board financial edge and a finely honed voter turnout program to overcome historical trends and public resistance to the Iraq War.

Mehlman refuted pundits' suggestions that this year's midterms would be a purely nationalized campaign on issues breaking against Republicans, arguing instead that the elections would be characterized by larger national issues transposed onto a localized, race-by-race battlefield.

"I think we're in uncharted political territories," Mehlman said in an interview with Roll Call editors and reporters.

Mehlman said it would be "a dereliction of your duty" for his committee not to run a television air war attacking Democratic candidates for the votes taken by their party leaders, indicating his intention to highlight how a Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her ranking-members-turned-chairmen would run the House.

"There will be a clear contrast," he said, declining, however, to indicate in which states and districts the RNC would focus its resources.

In addition, Mehlman said:

• he no longer considered Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.) the most endangered GOP incumbent, calling him the "greatest closer in politics";

• that the electoral battlefield was largely set and that no races would materialize to shock the GOP down the stretch: "I don't think we will be surprised at all";

• it was wrong to ever assume Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), who polls show faces a tightening re-election fight, would win his race by more than 5 points: "Virginia's changing";

DOJ_NMG_0061662

• he would leave it up to Rhode Island GOP officials to recommend whether Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey should receive any RNC financial support if he were to unseat Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) in today's GOP primary.

Democrats consider Mehlman's prognostications wishful thinking, with Bush being an unpopular drag on too many GOP candidates to save his Congressional majorities for his final two years in office.

"As much as Ken Mehlman would like to deny it, the writing is on the wall about the 2006 elections. The country is sick and tired of this rubber-stamp, stay-the-course, out-of-touch Republican Congress," said Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Overwhelmingly, the American people want a change in the direction of the country, and a change in their representation in Washington."

Mehlman acknowledged that Republicans were fighting against two issues that political operatives can't control: history and Iraq. This being the sixth year of Bush's presidency, history holds that Bush should face big losses in Congressional seats, although then-President Bill Clinton bucked that trend in 1998 when the GOP committees unsuccessfully tried to nationalize those midterms on the impeachment scandal.

Mehlman noted that Iraq has been a political albatross for many candidates because voters have found it "hard to get their heads around and hard to measure progress on."

Despite those thematic battles, Mehlman said Republicans hold tactical advantages, particularly in House races, that will prevent the political tidal-wave environment that swamped Democrats in 1994. For example, 17 of the 20 GOP-held open seats are being fought in districts won by President Bush in 2004, while in 1994 Democrats were defending 19 open seats won by Bush's father in 1988, Mehlman said.

In addition, of the 35 top races in GOP-held seats, Republican candidates had a cash-on-hand edge in 28 of those battles as of June 30.

Overall, Mehlman said the Republican Party enjoys a $47 million edge over the Democrats when adding up the most recent cash-on-hand totals of the national party campaign committees, state party committees and the candidates in House and Senate battleground races.

The lion's share of that financial edge comes from Mehlman's committee versus the Democratic National Committee — as of July 31, the RNC held a more than $32 million cash edge over the DNC, $43.6 million to $11.3 million.

The RNC already is advertising in Ohio in defense of Sen. Mike DeWine (R) and has done polling in Tennessee, where Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R) is retiring.

Republican operatives have deemed the RNC financial edge critical because, unlike in past election cycles, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has opened up a massive cash edge over its GOP counterpart and the DCCC is at a rough cash parity with the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Mehlman pointed to DeWine's race against Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) as an example of how he expects many races to play down the stretch. The national issues of Iraq and the war on terror will be the predominant focus in the Buckeye State, he said, but the GOP will put all its might into turning the race into a specific choice between DeWine and Brown rather than a national referendum.

DeWine, along with the NRSC and the RNC, will spend millions of dollars targeting Brown with ads highlighting his votes against the USA PATRIOT Act and other tools that the Bush administration considers critical in its overseas fights.

This is a slight, but important, variation on campaign themes promoted by NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), who repeatedly has said these elections will be based only on local candidates and issues. Instead, Mehlman said Republican candidates can't avoid the "national conversation" and will instead have to use that as a cudgel against Democrats.In House races where Democratic challengers haven't voted on key issues, they can expect to be hit with attacks on their allegiance to liberal leaders such as Pelosi and DNC Chairman Howard Dean.

Mehlman said he expects Election Day to last deep into the night and early morning hours, that the Democrats will not swamp the GOP enough in Eastern states to reclaim the House majority.

The vaunted GOP turnout machine will face its toughest test to date, something Mehlman has personally worked on since his days as field director in Bush's 2000 campaign, then as White House political director and again as Bush-Cheney '04 campaign manager.

He said he believes it will be even more scientific than in years past, noting that the RNC began monitoring special elections in local races in early 2005 as test-runs for the 72-hour program. The RNC even used a May 2005 City Council race in Lincoln, Neb., to judge turnout efforts there.

On a personal note, Mehlman strongly hinted that, after completing an eight-year run of nonstop campaigning, he may just step down as RNC chairman following Election Day and go into the private sector. Noting that he's logged 260,000 miles as chairman, Mehlman said he might want to use those frequent-flyer miles for "personal" use as opposed to another term as chairman.

"I'm a lawyer," he said. "Someday I'll be a lawyer again."

House GOP Going For Broke To Hold Seats (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence And Ray Locker

USA Today, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Top House Republicans are using almost all their campaign contributions to hold on to their 15-seat majority, federal records show, while Democratic House leaders are pouring money into campaigns to capture Republican seats.

USA TODAY examined contributions by leadership committees run by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, House Majority Leader John Boehner and House campaign chief Tom Reynolds, all Republicans, and their Democratic counterparts: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer and House campaign chief Rahm Emanuel.

The three Republicans sent 85% of their donations — $1.9 million — to at least 70 Republican incumbents and candidates trying to hold GOP seats. The three Democrats gave $963,000, or 64% of their money, to at least 50 Democrats seeking Republican seats.

The contrasting contribution patterns underscore the extent to which Republicans are on the defensive this year. Democrats, in hot pursuit of a House majority, are finding expanding opportunities across the electoral map.

"Democrats have very few of their own vulnerable seats to worry about. They get to play almost exclusively on the offense," says Amy Walter, a House analyst for the non-partisan Cook Political Report.

Republicans hold 231 House seats while Democrats have 201. There are two vacant seats, one in each party, and one independent who votes with Democrats. The website CQpolitics.com currently rates as safe 184 Democratic seats and 174 Republican seats.

Leadership committees are political action committees used by politicians to finance travel and donations to candidates. In the cases of key party leaders, such as the campaign committee chairmen, contributions from these PACs often influence other givers.

People often give to the PACs "to curry favor," says the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics. The three GOP leaders have raised more than $6 million — more than twice as much as their counterparts in the Democratic minority.

In one spending indicator, the three Democratic leadership PACs each gave $10,000 to candidates in 13 districts now held by Republicans. The PACs run by Hastert, Boehner and Reynolds each gave the legal maximum of $10,000 each to only three contenders for seats held by Democrats.

Leadership PAC contributions often make up more than 10% of the overall donations in competitive races. For example, in the race between Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., and Ken Lucas, his Democratic opponent, Davis received 15% of his overall $2.4 million in donations from such PACs. Lucas, a former House member, received 21% of his $730,000 in contributions from leadership PACs.

Two years ago, Hastert's PAC gave 32% of its money to Republicans trying to win Democratic seats, twice the share they're getting this year. Boehner appeared at campaign events for 26 candidates last month — 23 of them trying to hold Republican seats.

"There is no question that we are in a very difficult political environment," Boehner said last week, but he predicted his party would keep its majority.

Anti-Incumbent Sentiment (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

NEW CASTLE, Ky. (AP) - Dissatisfied with Congress, voters would probably hang a "Help Wanted" sign on the U.S. Capitol if given the chance.

"They're not doing their job," says Scott Newland, 39, an independent voter who backed President Bush in 2004.

The factory worker had harsh words for congressional Republicans and Democrats as he helped close his sister's New Castle deli one recent evening. "You need people that care. They don't care."

Such angry sentiments echo up and down the Ohio River Valley as it cuts through Republican-held congressional districts in Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio - politically pivotal House seats in an election year in which Democrats hope to end 12 years in the minority.

At lunch counters, post offices, city parks and downtown streets, voters in this region and nationally are quick to voice their frustration with the GOP-controlled Congress, and their desire for more responsive replacements for the current crop of lawmakers.

It's a general disgust that may lead to firings of some politicians on Nov. 7. People already have hinted as much in Republican and Democratic primaries.

Kenny Brown, an independent, knows precisely what he's looking for in a congressman. "Somebody who cares for the working man," the supermarket employee, 66, says before picking up his mail at the Pewee Valley, Ky., post office.

Judging by the past few years, Brown said, Bush and Republicans don't care. "Maybe the Democrats do, or maybe they don't."

With congressional elections less two months away, the public is consistently giving the GOP-run Congress dismal marks. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll in August found that only 29 percent of the public approve of the job Congress is doing.

A CNN poll earlier this month found that 55 percent of Americans are more likely to vote for the challenger in any election this fall. And an ABC News/Washington Post poll in August found that 53 percent of Americans call themselves "anti-incumbent," a figure as high as it was in the summer 1994 shortly before Republicans seized control from Democrats.

The party in power typically loses congressional seats in the sixth year of a presidency, and both Republican and Democratic strategists say this fall is on track to follow suit. GOP losses are expected in the House and, perhaps, the Senate.

But it's also possible that such voter angst won't translate into a sweeping throw-the-bumbs-out election year.

"Typically, Americans have a really negative view of Congress but love their congressman," said Marybeth Beller, a political science professor at Marshall University in Huntington, W.Va.

That explains why House and Senate members rarely lose their re-election bids.

Nevertheless, four incumbents - including a governor and a senator - have lost primaries so far this year, providing some evidence that voters want fresh blood in positions of power. Neither political party may be immune.

Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski, a Republican, was the most recent casualty of what may end up being an anti-incumbent wave of the 2006 elections. He finished last in a three-way GOP primary in August, getting just 19 percent of the vote.

A fifth upset could occur Tuesday.

Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a moderate Republican in Rhode Island, is facing a fierce primary against Stephen Laffey, the mayor of Cranston. Polls show a tight race.

National Republicans are backing Chafee even though he often departs from the party line, including opposing the Iraq war. GOP operatives believe he is their best shot of keeping the seat in Republican hands. The National Republican Senatorial Committee has attacked Laffey on television and in mass mailings.

Laffey has the support of the conservative, pro-business Club for Growth, which also contributed to the defeat of freshman Rep. Joe Schwarz, a moderate Republican in Michigan.

Democrats have fared about the same.

In the biggest upset yet this year, voters in Connecticut sent a message to Sen. Joe Lieberman, a moderate Democrat, by giving the Democratic nomination to newcomer Ned Lamont.

The Iraq war played heavily in the race. Lieberman supports it. Lamont does not and his anti-war stance attracted enough votes from liberals and others to secure the nomination. Lieberman promptly signed up as an independent candidate for the November balloting.

Down south, another Democrat, Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney, also lost her primary.

Despite the Democratic losses, Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., the head of the Senate Democrat's campaign effort, declared: "This is not an anti-incumbent election. This is an anti-Republican incumbent election."

"I don't see an anti-incumbent wave," countered Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., chairman of the House Republicans' campaign committee, dismissing the notion as Democratic propaganda.

Voters outside the capital clearly aren't happy with their elected officials of either political party.

Paula Waltz, 31 and a self-described political "fence rider," is among the people who said they are considering voting against their sitting congressmen to make that point.

Many lawmakers have "been there a little too long" and have "lost touch with the problems we're facing now," said Waltz, a surgical assistant who talked politics after finishing a hospital shift in Madison, Ind.

"They're out of reality," said Loyd Candler, 61 and a Republican who supervises autoparts stores, after a meal in Scottsburg, Ind. "I don't think you can just keep voting the same people in because they've been there."

In Crestwood, Ky., Glenn Proctor, 47, a construction worker and a Republican, said lawmakers in Washington never come through.

"They all promise you the world and then when they get in there, they're all the same," he complained, climbing into his car after buying a few supplies at a Dollar General.

Upriver near Cincinnati, Sari Thoman, 55, a Democrat, wants term limits for members of Congress.

"These people make it their life jobs" and because of that "Congress is so out of touch," said the Cincinnati symphony violist as she stretched after a brisk walk around a park in Springfield Township.

Across the park, Curtis Kelley, 62 and "mostly a Democrat," was down on the president and his opinion of lawmakers on Capitol Hill was almost as negative.

"I don't have any confidence in them either," Kelley said, as he worked at the dock on the park's 188-acre lake. But, he said, voters share some of the blame. "We don't hold them accountable."

Vermont Races Could Shape House's Future (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. — The Senate race in this small state looks to be less an election than an ascension.

Bernie Sanders — Vermont's only U.S. representative and the lone independent in the House — boasts a commanding lead over a Republican challenger who has blanketed the state with venomous advertising. Richard Tarrant, a software magnate who has never held elective office, has poured millions of dollars into a campaign that has brought him scant 34% support, according to the state's most recent polls.

"He's been in everyone's face. Vermont has never experienced this kind of never-ending barrage," said Peter Freyne, political columnist for an alternative weekly here called Seven Days. "It's the most expensive fight by fivefold we have ever seen in Vermont."

Yet as Vermont voters cast primary ballots today — one of nine states plus the District of Columbia voting today — Sanders appears hard to beat.

As an independent, Sanders would not help Democrats or Republicans in the tight struggle for Senate control. By contrast, the contest for Sanders' congressional seat is important to both major parties.

State Sen. Peter Welch is running unopposed in the Democratic primary; Maj. Gen. Martha Rainville, the former adjutant general of the Vermont National Guard, is the leading Republican candidate.

"This seat absolutely matters, in that control of the House is up for grabs," said Amy Walter, senior editor at the Cook Political Report in Washington.

Democrats must win 15 seats to gain a House majority.

Rainville "has a great profile, and name recognition that transcends partisanship," Walter said. "The problem is, she is running in an awful year. She is running into gale-force headwinds of presidential low approval, low approval for Congress and opposition to the war. She can't control any of those things. So the job of Peter Welch and the Democrats is to take that shine off her, and I think that will be a lot easier to do in this election year than it might be some other time."

With the steady deployment of Vermont Guard members to Iraq and Afghanistan, Rainville, 48, became a familiar face around the state.

In an interview in her campaign headquarters in South Burlington, she said, "I think Vermonters knew me as the adjutant general who cared about the soldiers and the families."

Still, she acknowledged that her military affiliation unsettled some voters.

"There is such a sensitivity in this state to the war," Rainville said.

"People bring it up, regardless of whether they are Republican, Democrat or independent. No one has been confrontational, but there is a curiosity to hear my perspective."

Although Rainville has vowed to run a clean campaign, Welch said he was braced for nasty ads from national Republican groups.

"You know what, I was married to the same woman for 28 years," said Welch, a 59-year-old widower whose campaign companion is his dog. "I've had the same law partner for over 30 years, with no written agreement, just a handshake. I'm pretty boring. But they will find stuff, and if they don't find it, they will make it up."

Vermonters do not register by political party. On primary day, voters are offered ballots from the Progressive, Liberty Union, Republican and Democratic parties. A voter chooses one and discards the three unused ballots.

Exit polls from 2004 showed the state with 27% self-identified Republicans, 41% independents and 32% self-identified Democrats and liberals, said University of Vermont political science professor Garrison Nelson.

Voters in the Green Mountain State regularly split their tickets — voting overwhelmingly, for example, for Republican Gov. Jim Douglas in 2004 while Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) was virtually burying President Bush in the state's presidential count.

This time around, "Vermont is quirky enough to send a socialist to the Senate and a general to the House," Nelson said.

Sanders, 65, a former Burlington mayor, caucuses with Democrats but votes "however he pleases," according to campaign media director Paul Hortenstine.

Tarrant's televised assaults on Sanders have backfired, Nelson said. "It's as ugly a campaign as we have ever seen in Vermont. His campaign people are non-Vermonters, and they don't get it. Bernie Sanders has run 10 consecutive statewide elections. Bernie has shaken every hand in the state at least 10 times. We all know Bernie. No one believes Bernie is in favor of child molesters or terrorists, and that's what Rich Tarrant is saying."

With Sanders' trademark shock of white hair and a booming voice that betrays its Brooklyn origins, he has been a Vermont political fixture since he won his first mayor's race by a handful of votes in 1981. He is known throughout the state by his first name only: Even his red-and-white campaign signs declare "BERNIE for U.S. Senate."

Famous for engaging in debate with anyone, Sanders also is legendary for taking on underdog causes, such as his early support for U.S. consumers who traveled to Canada to purchase prescription drugs. He has been fervently antiwar, but has steadily championed the rights of veterans.

Sanders has clung to the Progressive mantle, espousing the belief that the more privileged members of society should take care of the less fortunate. Sanders also has called himself a socialist — the political theory supporting collective or government control of production and distribution of wealth.

Nelson calls Sanders "the only socialist I ever knew who wanted to win an election. Most socialists don't want to win. They want to lose, because that proves how corrupt America is." Whatever label Sanders wears seems not to matter to his constituents.

"So he's a socialist — who cares?" said 82-year-old Victor Acebo, a retired dry cleaner.

Phil Dymant, 61, who retired from the Navy, said: "I don't care what he is. Bernie takes care of fellows like me.

"He's got gumption. If more politicians would do more of what Bernie does, we'd all be a lot better off."

Among Governor Races, Iowa Lead Shifts Again (WSJ)

WSJ Online's "Washington Wire", September 11, 2006

Democrats remain poised for big gains in gubernatorial races nationwide even as Republican candidates took the lead in a few tight contests, according to the latest Zogby Interactive poll, conducted in cooperation with The Wall Street Journal Online. Of 19 states tracked in the poll, conducted Aug. 29-Sept. 5, Democratic candidates were ahead in 12 races, while Republicans led in six and one race yielded mixed results. In Zogby's August poll, Democrats led 14 of the states polled, Republicans four and one race was mixed. The Republican pickups came in Iowa, where Republican Jim Nussle recaptured his slim lead over Chet Culver, and in Nevada, where Republican nominee Jim Gibbons climbed back into the lead over Dina Tutus.

Among high-profile states, Arnold Schwarzenegger held onto his come-from-behind lead in California over Democratic challenger Phil Angelides. Meanwhile, in Pennsylvania, Democratic incumbent Ed Rendell pulled to his widest lead this year over Republican Lynn Swann, a former Pittsburgh Steeler wide receiver and TV commentator.

September 10, 2006, 8:54 pm Zogby Poll Shows Slide for Allen, Lieberman

Republicans made some headway on Democrats in hotly contested Senate races, according to the latest Zogby Battlegrounds poll. Democratic challengers remain narrowly ahead in the run for several seats now held by Republicans, but the GOP is still on track to retain control of the chamber.

The polls, conducted Aug. 29-Sept. 5 by Zogby Interactive in cooperation with The Wall Street Journal Online, show Democrats ahead in 11 of the 18 states polled, while Republicans lead in five. In a Zogby poll conducted in August, Democrats were ahead in 12 and Republicans in five. Joe Lieberman, running as an independent, maintains a lead in Connecticut, though his advantage over Democrat Ned Lamont has weakened considerably — to four points from 10 in the previous Zogby poll.

Republican incumbents picked up ground in Ohio and Pennsylvania, two of the seats Democrats had led solidly. Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine and Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum each pulled to four percentage points from their respective opponents Sherrod Brown and Bob Casey. In Virginia, however, Republican incumbent Sen. George Allen's Aug. 11 "macaca" remarks continued to hurt support. In the mid-August Zogby poll, challenger James Webb took a one-percentage-point lead; the latest poll shows Webb now ahead by a seven-point margin.

September 10, 2006, 4:10 pm Sen. Allen's Lead Shrivels in Virginia

Republican Sen. George Allen of Virginia sees the lead in his re-election race cut to just four percentage points–46% to 42%–over Democratic challenger James Webb, in a Mason Dixon Polling & Research Inc. poll. It was the first since Aug. 11, when Sen. Allen, at a rally of mostly white supporters in the southwestern part of the state, referred to a Webb campaign aide of Indian descent as "macaca," considered an ethnic slur in some countries. (Update: A Zogby Interactive/WSJ.com poll out late Sunday also shows Webb leading, by 7.5 percentage points.)

Polls have tightened all year in the hotly contested race. As recently as April, Allen had a 20 point lead over Webb, a decorated former U.S. marine and a Reagan administration Navy secretary who resigned, refusing to cut the Navy's size.

Allen, long a Bush supporter with presidential aspirations in 2008, has seen his popularity, along with that of the current president, decline. He now appears to be struggling to hold onto his Senate seat. But the poll, with an error margin of four percentage points, might not be as tight as the numbers suggest –or it might be worse. – Bernard Wysocki Jr.

September 10, 2006, 3:29 pm Cheney Makes Fall Predictions

On NBC's "Meet the Press" this morning, Tim Russert asked Vice President Dick Cheney if he thinks the Democrats will take the House in the midterm elections.

According to the transcript, Cheney responded: "I don't think it'll happen. I don't expect that Nancy Pelosi will be speaker. I think we're doing very well out there. I feel better about the election now than I did three months ago." Asked if he thinks Republicans will keep both the House and the Senate, Cheney says: "I think we will, I really do. … I've seen our candidates. I've seen how they're handling the issues. We've generated the resources we need to be able to have a good, hard-fought competition. I—if I had to bet today, I'd bet that—well, I can bet you a dinner that we hold both houses."

Russert said he doesn't bet, then asked whether Cheney has gone hunting since the accidental shooting earlier this year of Harry Whittington. After Cheney replied no, Russert asked: "Should I be relieved you didn't bring your shotgun in today?" Cheney answered: "I wouldn't worry about it. You're not in season." – Tim Hanrahan

September 9, 2006, 10:50 am Bush 9/11 Tour Aims to Bolster Republicans

President Bush will visit the sites of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks Sunday and Monday for a series of events that the administration hopes can once more lift Republicans to victory. Bush sees the attacks as the defining moment of his presidency, and made his muscular response a centerpiece of his re-election campaign in 2004. With the Republican majorities in Congress endangered by economic uncertainty and public fury over the war in Iraq, the White House is striving to remind voters of its response to Sept. 11 — part of a broader assertion that Republicans take the terrorist threat more seriously than Democrats do and are better prepared to defend against it.

Although Bush and other aides have long made terrorism a central part of their argument that Democrats are soft on national defense, administration officials say the president will make the Sept. 11 commemorations as apolitical as possible by not giving prepared remarks at any of the three sites. White House spokesman Tony Snow says Bush's only formal speech either day will be an Oval Office address to the nation Monday night on "what he thought Sept. 11th has meant to the country, what it taught us, and how Americans have demonstrated their toughness, compassion, courage and optimism in the many days since." September 8, 2006, 5:43 pm Here's a Clue for Ben Bernanke

Bernanke Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke wants to the markets to stop looking to him for cryptic clues about interest rates. Some say he'll be disappointed.

"As a well-respected economist, [Bernanke's] opinions mean something and are worth listening to," said James Bianco, president of Bianco Research, a Chicago research firm that closely watches the Fed and has a large trader clientele. "Unfortunately as Fed chairman, all we care about is, 'Are you raising rates, or aren't you?'"

The problem then becomes that traders and reporters may see clues that don't exist — or overreact because they ignored important points made elsewhere in the speech or testimony. As described in Friday's Wall Street Journal, Bernanke wants to wean the markets and the public off looking for clues for interest rates in his speeches and testimony, and instead wants them to focus on the Fed's objectives and forecasts, extrapolating from them the likely path of rates. But traders and reporters may try to read interest rates hints into what he says, anyway.

"The problem wasn't just Greenspan's tendency for sound bites, it's also the mutually reinforcing need for news services to deliver instant headlines and market participants' short attention spans," noted Tom Gallagher, the Fed watcher for brokerage firm ISI Group, referring to former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan. "I really think there's a risk that those who read the whole speech can miss the market's read on the Fed for sustained periods of time. Think of Bernanke's early June speech in which he talked about the three and six month annualized inflation rates… If you read the whole speech you got the 'medium-term outlook' and 'take full account of lags' messages, but everyone focused on his use of the recent inflation trends. News services can't put the full speech in their headlines, and I'm not sure how many of us would read them anyway." –Greg Ip

September 8, 2006, 5:31 pm Another Round in Softwood Lumber Trade Dispute

A coalition of independent lumber companies is pressing to reopen a key part of the agreement that settled the long-drawn-out dispute between the U.S. and Canada over trade in softwood lumber.

The settlement provides for tens of millions of dollars to be distributed among some top U.S. lumber producers. The Lumber Manufacturers for Ethics and Equity, a group of about 30 independent producers from around the country, complains the payments will be spread unevenly, benefiting big companies that were party to the original trade dispute and putting smaller producers at a competitive disadvantage.

Next week, coalition members plan to visit lawmakers on Capitol Hill as well as officials at the Commerce Department and the U.S. Trade Representative's office. "What we hope to do is to highlight the issue so Congress might take action," said Edward Lebow, a lawyer representing the group. Lebow said the coalition doesn't want to kill the overall deal, but suggests putting the planned industry payments to different use, perhaps benefiting Habitat for Humanity, the non-profit housing group. –Greg Hitt

September 8, 2006, 4:24 pm Rumsfeld Handshake Proves Popular

With Defense Secretary Rumsfeld making "appeasement" the big buzzword of the month, the George Washington University's National Security Archive notes that its single most-downloaded file is now the once-classified batch of documents, photos and video documenting Rumsfeld's handshake and meeting with Saddam Hussein in December 1983. President Reagan had sent Rumsfeld to Baghdad to help restore diplomatic ties with Iraq and aid Baghdad in its fight against Iran.

Saddam Hussein greets Rumsfeld in Baghdad, 1983 "Rumsfeld meeting Saddam has now far outpaced the previous winner, which was Elvis meeting Nixon," says Thomas Blanton, director of the archive, which collects and posts significant declassified documents under the Freedom of Information Act.

Rumsfeld last week warned of a rise of Islamic fascism and said that people should not fall into the trap of appeasement as did those who tried to accommodate the Nazis in the 1930s. The remarks led many pundits to compare Rumsfeld's 1983 meeting with Hussein to British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain's meeting with Adolf Hitler in 1938. September 8, 2006, 10:42 am Schwarzenegger Wades into Hot Water

Want to lay odds on how long it takes the Internet crowd to make a techno-mix using a leaked audio tape of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger? Think Stevens' "Tubes!"

The Los Angeles Times obtained a copy of the tape, in which the governor, who is running for re-election this year, allegedly describes Cubans and Puerto Ricans as "very hot" personalities because of their combo of "black blood" and "Latino blood." The tape, which makes it clear that the governor and other participants knew they were being recorded, comes from a spring meeting of Schwarzenegger and close advisers over Republican lawmakers' resistance to a huge state borrowing effort. If

September 8, 2006, 10:26 am If It Quacks…

Congress's lame-duck session emerges as potential venue for action on legislation important to business. Majority Leader Bill Frist rules out action on comprehensive immigration legislation before the midterm elections but says a deal remains possible during post-election session as the White House hopes.

Frist The lame-duck session will largely be consumed with completion of annual spending bills that Congress won't finish before recessing in October to hit the campaign trail. But lawmakers may take up other issues as well.

Another possibility aside from immigration: extension of the research and development tax credit, a top priority for high technology businesses and a key element of President Bush's competitiveness initiative. So far, the tax credit has been stalled as part of the so-called trifecta bill encompassing cuts in the estate tax and an increase in the minimum wage.

Frist says he intends to keep that controversial package intact through the election and not permit separate action on the R&D credit, which has bipartisan support. But a top Republican aide predicts it may be passed individually in the lame-duck session if Republicans keep control of Capitol Hill.

If Democrats take over, the aide says, Republicans would likely hold back on the extension so that it could "became an opportunity" for the party in the next Congress. –John Harwood

September 8, 2006, 5:55 am AIDS Bill Faces Serious Hurdles

Senate aides say they're close to a bipartisan deal on the contentious reworking of the Ryan White CARE Act, which funds AIDS treatment in the states. Unless Congress passes a bill by Oct. 1, several states risk a drop in federal funding under the program.

Even with the deadline looming, negotiations between the House and Senate committees and the Bush administration have been difficult. One aide likened the infighting between cities and rural areas, northern states and those in the South, to a "civil war."

Draft legislation circulated this week strikes a compromise on several of the most controversial issues in the protracted talks, which are meant to update the program, named for a young hemophiliac who died of AIDS. To satisfy calls for greater HIV testing without cutting into funds for treatment, the bill would set up a $30 million grant program at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention that states could tap for testing. Overall, states would be able to use 25% of the funds for services other than care and treatment, such as nutrition and transportation, or they could use all the money for treatment if they already provide those services through programs such as Medicaid.

States that use codes to track HIV and AIDS patients would get more time to switch to systems using patients' names, and patients identified by codes would still be counted in the formula that determines funding—a boon to states such as California, Massachusetts and Washington. Still, states would have to switch to a name-based AIDS tracking system by 2011.

It remains to be seen whether state governors, HIV patient-advocacy groups and other members of Congress will back the deal. For the states, much depends on their funding level. –Sarah Lueck

September 8, 2006, 12:02 am Maneuvering Starts for Post-Election House Leadership

Republican insiders say Speaker Hastert would likely become backbencher, not minority leader, if Democrats take over. Stronger Democratic gains would lift odds that Reps. Pence and Shadegg challenge incumbents Boehner and Blunt for leader and whip posts.

"Anyone who is even contemplating losing our majority or personal ambitions" should focus on election campaign, a top Boehner aide counters. While Pryce fights for her Ohio House seat, fellow Republicans warn she could lose leadership post over handling of party message. Pelosi looks set as Democrats' choice for speaker, but moderate Hoyer and war critic Murtha may face off for majority leader.

Still unclear: leadership aspirations of Democrats' campaign chief Emanuel.

PRE-ELECTION INDICATORS may show economy slowing further.

Economists expect employment reports and third-quarter GDP to show increasing sluggishness. But workers' purchasing power may get help from falling oil prices. Declining housing sector represents wild card.

Economists surveyed by WSJ.com put odds of recession within a year at 1 in 4, up from 1 in 5 a year ago. But they divide on how November results would affect long-term deficits; 14 say Republican rule would reduce them most, 14 say Democrats, while 10 say split control. "Democrats = tax increases," says Allen Sinai of Decision Economics, but S&P's David Wyss argues, "Republicans have turned into the spenders."

TRADE TENSIONS flavor midterm elections.

Steel executives and unions jointly seek votes for candidates "willing to stand up for American workers and enforce the trade laws." Their ads in eight states blame China, India and Brazil for "stealing American jobs." Separately, Citizens Trade PAC targets pro-trade Republican incumbents Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Hayes of North Carolina.

U.S. auto makers, still waiting for Bush to meet with Big Three executives, have major stake in administration negotiations on South Korean trade deal. In Seattle, U.S. negotiators press South Korea to open market to U.S. vehicles.

"Business as usual just won't cut it this time," says Democratic Rep. Levin of Michigan.

STRONG MESSAGE? On eve of 9/11 anniversary, Republicans distribute tabloid newspaper "America Weakly" mocking Democrats' security stance. Pro-Republican group Progress for America begins ad campaign featuring father of Flight 93 hero Todd Beamer backing antiterror war.

REPUBLICAN ESTABLISHMENT steps up efforts to stop conservative Laffey from toppling moderate Sen. Chafee in Rhode Island primary Tuesday. Senate campaign committee declares "Steve Laffey is unelectable" and sends mailing amid late turnout drive. Laffey receives $5,000 from illegal-immigration foe Minuteman PAC.

HOLE CARD? White House strategists see low November turnout blunting Democrats' edge in polls. In nearly all 2006 primaries so far, turnout has fallen below 1982-2002 midterm average. One exception: above-average participation in Connecticut's Senate primary nominating antiwar Democrat Lamont over incumbent Lieberman.

COOPERATION? Citing counterterrorism demands, FBI crime lab tells law-enforcement agencies it will no longer routinely conduct latent fingerprint exams for state and local police. It will continue exams in cases posing unusual technical demands and in those "of a high-profile nature," the bureau says.

La.'s Jefferson Fights To Stay In Office (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, September 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — A bribery scandal has Congressman William Jefferson fighting for his political life following eight House terms in which he faced little opposition at election time.

A dozen candidates are challenging Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who FBI agents say was found with $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer. Jefferson denies any impropriety.

The Nov. 7 election is the first time Jefferson has been threatened with defeat since elected to the House in 1990.

"We wouldn't be in the race if not for our friend Jefferson's problems," says Spencer Washington of New Orleans, a supporter of candidate and former New Orleans city councilman Troy Carter.

Louisiana has an open primary system, meaning all 13 candidates regardless of party will appear on the ballot. If no one gets more than 50% of the vote, the two top vote-getters face off in a December runoff.

Jefferson faces eight Democrats — including two state representatives and a former city councilman — three Republicans and one Libertarian.

The race is not likely to shift the balance of power in the House. The district, made up mostly of New Orleans residents, is overwhelmingly Democratic. If Jefferson loses, his successor will be a Democrat, political observers here say.

"That district is not going to vote for a Republican — a white Republican especially," says Hastings Wyman, editor of the Southern Political Report.

Jefferson is Louisiana's only black congressman. New Orleans has a black majority even though more blacks than whites remain displaced since Hurricane Katrina virtually emptied the city in August 2005.

According to returns from last spring's mayoral election, the city is about 55% black, down from more than 67% before Katrina.

Less than half of the city's 460,000 residents have returned, but displaced residents may still vote in the November election if they remain registered in Louisiana.

Challengers to Jefferson say the coming years are too important to the city to be left to a man who may be preoccupied with defending himself.

This is the first federal race for state Rep. Karen Carter (no relation to Troy Carter), who represents half a dozen New Orleans neighborhoods. She says the district needs new leadership to get through years of recovery from Katrina.

"We're going to be at the federal trough for the next 10 years, minimum, asking for help," she says.

"We need a credible, respected voice coming from the 2nd District."

In an interview Monday, Jefferson denied the bribery allegations and said he is confident of re-election.

"No matter what anybody says, I am innocent," he said.

Jefferson, 59, says voters will re-elect him on his record after Katrina, particularly his co-authorship of the Gulf Opportunity Zone Act, or "Go Zone," which gives tax breaks to businesses along the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast.

An FBI affidavit written in support of a search warrant alleges that Jefferson took money to help a Kentucky technology company called iGate win lucrative contracts in Africa. He has not been formally charged in the FBI sting operation.

In an affidavit sworn out in late May to obtain a search warrant for the congressman's office, the FBI describes Jefferson retrieving a briefcase filled with $100,000 from a car parked outside the Ritz-Carlton in Arlington, Va. An unnamed witness who is an iGate investor alleged Jefferson planned to use the money to coax African officials into deals.

Four days later the FBI raided Jefferson's homes in New Orleans and Washington. The FBI found $90,000 of the cash, which was marked, wrapped in foil in his Washington freezer.

The May 20 raid on his Capitol Hill offices was criticized by leaders of both political parties, who said it was a violation of the constitutional separation of powers.

Two of Jefferson's associates have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with the FBI. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate Inc., was sentenced Friday to 87 months in prison.

Louis Smith, 27, says he is voting for Jefferson.

"I like what he's been doing, and he's innocent until proven guilty," said Smith, who was taking a break Monday from installing countertops to eat barbecued ribs on his sheltered patio.

Jefferson's opponents are highlighting not only the congressman's alleged misdoings but his consequent loss of power in the House. In June, House Democrats removed him from his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

"When you don't have that position anymore and the seniority you'd otherwise be able to tout means nothing, you can't deliver what we need in the post-Katrina world," Karen Carter says. "It's absolutely critical that we have effective leadership when we make the ask (for money) year after year to rebuild this region."

Despite the long odds, the Republicans have not given up.

Political newcomer Joe Lavigne has waged a vigorous campaign with a profusion of yard signs and ads.

"I don't think it's as long a shot as people think," says Lavigne, 30, an attorney.

"The issues are not Republican or Democratic issues," he says. "The issue is how we're going to rebuild New Orleans bigger and better."

Louisiana Players Aid Jefferson Foe (RC)

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

As she builds support for her bid to oust embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D), Louisiana state Rep. Karen Carter (D) is getting help from several influential Louisiana Democrats, including former Sens. J. Bennett Johnston and John Breaux and former Rep. Chris John.

"I think she's a very impressive young woman," Johnston said Monday. "I think she is just exactly what New Orleans needs. It is more important than ever for New Orleans to be well represented. Somebody who can put a good face on the city."

Carter is one of 12 candidates who filed to challenge Jefferson in the Nov. 7, all-party primary. A December runoff is highly likely, unless one candidate gets more than 50 percent of the vote.

Jefferson has been embroiled in a federal bribery investigation since last year, and the FBI has raided his home and offices. He has not been charged and has denied any wrongdoing.

But Carter, 36, is making effectiveness the central issue of of her campaign, asserting that Jefferson's situation is both "embarrassing and disappointing," and the investigation is detracting from his Congressional work.

She said she has built a broad coalition of support, which includes business community and organized labor leaders, and she is also touting the backing of influential New Orleans Republicans.

Among them are Donald "Boysie" Bollinger, a shipyard mogul, and developer Joe Canizaro. Both Bollinger and Canizaro achieved "Super Ranger" status for their fundraising efforts during the 2004 Bush presidential campaign.

High-profile Democrats are also supporting her bid.

Today she is set to receive the endorsements of New Orleans City Council President Oliver Thomas and City Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge-Morrell.

Hedge-Morrell is the wife of Criminal Court Clerk Arthur Morrell, a former state Representative and one-time chairman of the Legislative Black Caucus.

Thomas will headline Carter's first major fundraising event Thursday in New Orleans.

A big Washington, D.C., fundraiser is also in the works for early October, and Carter was in D.C. last week to meet with party leaders and interest groups. John, who helped escort Carter around town last week, is putting the October event together.

"I'm trying to help raise her some money," said John, who lost a 2004 Senate bid. "She's committed, she's smart. I think she'd be great for New Orleans."

John served with Carter in the state Legislature and has other past ties to Capitol Hill.

While earning her undergraduate degree at Howard University, Carter interned for Breaux as well as for then-Rep. Billy Tauzin (D-La.), who later switched parties.

"Karen comes from a prominent, highly respected political family in New Orleans. And I think she would make a terrific member of Congress," Breaux said in a statement.

Jefferson spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said the Congressman was not sweating the support of the three well-connected Members-turned-lobbyists.

"People in Washington certainly aren't going to win the race on the ground in New Orleans," Roussell said.

She added that the New Orleans mayoral race earlier this year was proof that support on the ground trumps money, and she also said that Carter's endorsements were not surprising because they come from people in "the same political organization."

Carter's father was the first black elected assessor in New Orleans, and the district he represented included some of the city's most influential territory, like the French Quarter.

Roussell said Jefferson still has a wide range of support within New Orleans and the 2nd district, and that he would be announcing his endorsements soon.

"Votes and connections with people are going to win the race — and the Congressmen's record," she said.

Jefferson has suffered from diminished fundraising in light of the federal investigation. In the second quarter of this year he raised just $20,000, but as of July 22, he had $322,000 in his campaign war chest.

Carter met with EMILY's List last week and an endorsement from the organization would no doubt be a financial boon to her campaign. Roussell said Jefferson is "doing very well" on the money front as well as in the field. She noted that on Saturday, while Carter attended the Congressional Black Caucus' annual legislative conference in Washington, D.C., Jefferson had a citywide canvass.

At the CBC gathering on Friday, Jefferson hosted a forum on rebuilding New Orleans. Mayor Ray Nagin (D), who won re-election earlier this year in a costly and high-profile runoff, attended the event.

Jefferson endorsed Nagin in his race against Louisiana Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D) — brother of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) — and the mayor could repay the favor by endorsing the Congressman's bid.

Carter has assembled a team of highly regarded consultants. She has hired Cornell Belcher as her pollster and the campaign expects to do a survey within the next two weeks.

Belcher, founder of Brilliant Corners Research and Strategies, is the lead pollster for the Democratic National Committee and is known for his focus on black voters as well as people of faith.

An independent survey done the week of Aug. 7 by Florida-based pollster Vern Kennedy, who specializes in polling for independent and business groups, showed Carter positioned to make the runoff with Jefferson. It showed Jefferson at 25 percent, Carter with 14 percent and state Rep. Derrick Shepherd (D) with 9 percent.

Carter also has hired Washington-based media consultant Dino Seder, who is teaming up with New Orleans-based Carvin Consulting to work on the race.

Carvin consulting founder Jim Carvin is one of Louisiana's original political advertising gurus, and the firm has worked to elect the past 10 New Orleans mayors, including Nagin in his recent race.

While there is no doubt less population in the New Orleans-based district, Roussell said the demographics of the district have not changed as much as people might think in the wake of Hurricane Katrina because some city residents have relocated to suburbs still within the district.

Unlike in the mayoral election earlier this year, which was held on a Saturday and not a Tuesday, satellite voting will not be allowed for New Orleans residents in November.

Democratic strategist and Louisiana native Donna Brazile, a contributing writer for Roll Call, noted that absentee balloting could be a big factor in the election and runoff.

"The key is getting some of the displaced voters who are scattered around the state of Louisiana and the country to cast absentee ballots," Brazile said.

Aside from Carter and Shepherd, former state Rep. Troy Carter, who is also a former New Orleans city councilman, is the only other well-known contender in the 13 candidate field. Shepherd has already aired campaign ads.

Attorney Joe Lavigne is running the highest-profile campaign on the GOP side. But it is still viewed as a long shot that he can garner enough votes to make the runoff.

RI Senator Targeted In Tuesday Primary (AP-Y)

By Robert Tanner

AP, September 12, 2006

Moderate GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island faces a serious challenge Tuesday as the last big flurry of primary elections provides another test of the depth of anti-incumbent sentiment and the erosion of the political middle ground.

In all, nine states and Washington, D.C., hold primary elections. Maryland Democrats choose a Senate candidate to go up against Republican Michael Steele, the lieutenant governor. An open House seat in Arizona has drawn a contentious crowd of GOP candidates, as well as several hopefuls on the Democratic side. Minnesota Democrats will pick a candidate for a House seat left open by retiring 14-term Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo.

Many races won't be close, but will set up important November contests that include Senate seats in Arizona and Minnesota, and the race for governor in Maryland, Minnesota, Rhode Island and Wisconsin. Other states holding primaries are Delaware, New Hampshire, New York and Vermont, while the District of Columbia will select mayoral candidates.

Chafee's bid for a second term is the latest race with a moderate targeted by his own party's hard-line critics. Connecticut's Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman was beaten by anti-war candidate Ned Lamont, though the incumbent is still running as an independent, and Michigan Rep. Joe Schwarz, a moderate Republican targeted by the anti-tax Club for Growth, also was defeated.

Two other incumbents lost primaries in the last two months, though both had grown unpopular for their personal behavior — Alaska GOP Gov. Frank Murkowski and Democratic Rep. Cynthia McKinney of Georgia.

Chafee has also been targeted by the Club for Growth, a Washington-based group that has tried, not always successfully, to force candidates to vote against taxes. The group is backing Steve Laffey, a former investment banker and mayor of Cranston, R.I.

Chafee has drawn a remarkable amount of support from national Republicans, especially for a senator who has often been at odds with the party, bucking the administration on tax cuts, civil liberties and the Iraq war. He has the distinction of being the only Republican to vote against the use of military force in Iraq.

Polls a month before the primary showed the two Republicans running even.

Chafee himself acknowledged that the race could hinge on turnout in heavily Democratic Rhode Island, saying a low turnout could mean his defeat. His campaign has encouraged Democrats to drop their party registration so they could vote for him.

The battle comes amid a national fight for Congress, with Democrats hoping national dismay with the Bush administration and the GOP-led Congress could boost their efforts to win majorities in the House and Senate. Democrats need to win six Senate seats — and Rhode Island's is one of the more vulnerable, with polls showing Laffey would lose to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general, in the general election.

The last days of the campaign brought a flurry of mean-spirited mailings to voters. Fliers from the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which is backing Chafee, accused Laffey of wasting taxpayers' money, giving favors to campaign donors and being disrespectful of seniors.

Laffey's campaign sent voters letters and fliers criticizing Chafee for supporting abortion rights, being weak on terrorism and failing to protect Social Security.

Peter Ubertaccio, a political science professor at Stonehill College in Easton, Mass., said the negative tactics may better serve Laffey because his supporters are already behind him, while Chafee needs more of the undecided voters.

"Laffey seems to have that kind of momentum, and this just adds fuel to the fire," Ubertaccio said.

The fight for Congress also fuels a primary race for an open House seat in southeastern Arizona, where five Republicans and six Democrats jumped in when 11-term GOP Rep. Jim Kolbe, a moderate Republican, announced his retirement.

Candidates have argued about border security, illegal immigration and the war, but the campaign flashed into national view after the National Republican Congressional Committee ran an ad supporting Steve Huffman. Other candidates were furious.

Other races to watch include:

• The Maryland Democratic Senate primary, where Rep. Ben Cardin and Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman and one-time head of the NAACP, are among 18 contenders for an open seat. The winner will face Steele, who, if he wins in the fall, would be the Senate's only black Republican.

• The Democratic primary for a House seat in Minnesota in an open, reliably Democratic district which includes Minneapolis. Four candidates are running, including state legislator Keith Ellison, who won his party's backing. If he won, Ellison would be the first Muslim member of Congress.

• The New York Democratic primary for attorney general, with former federal Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo — son of former Gov. Mario Cuomo — against Mark Green, the former New York City Public Advocate.

Also in New York, frontrunning Democratic gubernatorial candidate Eliot Spitzer faces a challenge from Nassau County Executive Tom Suozzi, while Sen. Hillary Clinton was far ahead of anti-war candidate Jonathan Tasini.

GOP Leaders Throw Weight Behind Chafee (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington And Rebecca Knight In Providence, Rhode Island

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Lincoln Chafee is not your average Republican. He voted against President George W. Bush's 2001 tax cuts. The following year, he was the only Republican in the Senate to oppose the Iraq war resolution. Last week, he stood in the way of his party's plans to extend John Bolton's tenure as US ambassador to the United Nations.

None of that seems to matter these days to national Republican leaders, who are doing all they can to ensure that Mr Chafee wins his party's primary election in Rhode Island on Tuesday. If he loses to Stephen Laffey, the conservative mayor of Cranston, they fear the party has no hope of keeping the seat in November's general election, imperilling the Republicans' control of the Senate.

"If Laffey wins, it really says that Republicans in Rhode Island care more about the purity of their ideology than holding the seat," said Wendy Schiller, a political science professor at Brown University in Providence, the state capital.

There are only about 70,000 registered Republicans in the state – about 10 per cent of all voters – and most political observers predict they will back Mr Laffey by a wide margin. A win by Mr Chafee depends on how many of the 340,000 independents who are eligible to vote in the primary show up at the polls to support him. Public opinion polls have varied widely, leaving the outcome uncertain.

Providence, like the state, tends to vote Democratic. Yet pockets of independent voters can be found in areas such as Wayland Square, a wealthy enclave in the eastern section of the city filled with stately homes with manicured lawns. A walk down Wayland Avenue, dotted with fine wine stores and clothing boutiques, finds the electorate divided.

Mr Laffey's constituency is composed mostly of pro-Bush, right-leaning voters who are frustrated by Mr Chafee's moderate politics. "[Chafee] is not a Republican," said one of Mr Laffey's supporters. "I appreciate what Stephen is trying to do by bringing back the party to its core values."

The Club for Growth, a Washington group that supports fiscally conservative candidates, has encouraged that view, praising the economic turnaround of Cranston under the energetic Mr Laffey and complaining about Mr Chafee's voting record in Washington. Its political action committee has spent $400,000 (€315,000, £215,000) on advertisements against Mr Chafee and its members have donated more than $700,000 to Mr Laffey's campaign.

David Keating, the group's executive director, said a win by Mr Laffey "would send a clear message to the Republican establishment that their base is sick of Washington's wasteful business-as-usual spending".

Mr Chafee holds the seat once occupied by his father, the late John Chafee, a popular figure and former governor, and the two are the only Republicans the state has sent to the Senate since the Great Depression.

Carl Simkevich, a university scientist, is casting his vote for Mr Chafee, but grudgingly. "I am voting for Chafee because I don't think that Laffey is electable," he said, predicting that Mr Laffey would lose to Sheldon Whitehouse, the Democratic candidate. But, he adds: "I wish Chafee were more of a Republican. He's certainly ticked off a lot of people in his party."

There are parallels between this race and last month's Democratic Senate primary in Connecticut, where Joseph Lieberman, a three-term senator, was defeated by Ned Lamont, a political novice who complained about Mr Lieberman's support for the war and his inattention to the state. Most important may be what the contests say about voters' preference for fresh blood over incumbents from either party.

Political analysts say that while the low-key Mr Chafee is known nationally for his independent streak – in 2004 he cast a symbolic protest vote against Mr Bush's re-election, writing in the name of his father instead – he has not done enough to cement his relationship with voters in Rhode Island.

A former specialist in equine foot care, Mr Chafee has flirted with leaving the Republican party. But the National Republican Senatorial Committee has stood by him, insisting that Mr Chafee is "the only Republican" who can beat the Democrats' candidate. Elizabeth Dole, chair of the committee, said that if Mr Laffey won today, her group would not spend any money to help him in November.

But they should be careful what they wish for. Nancy Bassel, a government worker who is registered as an independent, said she planned to vote for Mr Chafee. "There are certain issues that concern me – I am against the war and I am pro-choice – and I like that Chafee is a pretty liberal Republican," she said while browsing the discounted paperbacks outside Books on the Square, a cozy bookshop in Wayland Square. "I've always voted for Chafee and frankly I am a little surprised he hasn't crossed over [to the Democratic party]."

Laffey Decries Party, Beltway In His 'outsider' Campaign (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, September 12, 2006

CRANSTON, R.I. – If Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) were any other Republican senator running in a blue state, his move last week to block the nomination of United Nations Ambassador John Bolton on an expected party-line vote might smack of election-year politics.

But the move, which came five days before Chafee's heated primary culminates today, was business as usual for arguably the most moderate — or, as his party detractors say, liberal — Republican in the Senate.

While Chafee recently called his support for President Bush's agenda "spotty at best," his primary opponent, Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, is more conservative and likely would be a more dependable vote for the party. But with the Republican establishment entrenched against him in the name of keeping the seat Republican, Laffey has harnessed an anti-Washington approach to campaigning, hoping his outsider credentials will help him best Chafee then overcome some long odds to win in the general in this heavily independent but very blue state.

In Rhode Island, a slight majority of the state's voters are registered independents. Of the rest, there are more than three registered Democrats for every Republican.

Running in an open primary that could be largely decided by those independent voters, Laffey tries to avoid labels like "conservative" and "Republican." Early in the campaign he stressed Chafee's distance from the party and his own conservative credentials, but now he talks more about how Chafee has made himself irrelevant and how Washington needs someone who effects change instead of a "nice guy" who passively embodies independence.

He points to the fact that Chafee was among the last to decide on how he would vote on the nomination of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito and now the senator's indecision on Bolton (Chafee cites recent events in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and said they raise new questions about Bolton). Laffey also has called for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation and classifies two of the four major plans on his website as "liberal" in nature.

Meanwhile, Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse is waiting in the wings. With no significant primary opposition, he has been able to focus his efforts on each of the Republicans while they duke it out amongst themselves.

Polls have given vastly different indications about who enters the Republican primary ahead — with one showing Laffey in the lead by 17 points and one showing Chafee up 14. But they all show Chafee and Whitehouse neck-and-neck in the general election while Laffey would have about 25-30 points to make up against the Democrat.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) has argued that Laffey cannot beat Whitehouse and the party has mobilized in support of Chafee, even though he has bucked them time and time again — on President Bush's tax cuts, on the war in Iraq, on social issues, on Alito and now possibly on Bolton.

The NRSC also said last week that it would not support Laffey should he win the primary. Laffey said that the NRSC, the Republican National Committee and the White House have asked him to withdraw.

Visiting with Cranston constituents at a well-attended Greek festival in the parking lot of a local church, Laffey insists he doesn't want the national party's help. And it's quite apparent that he has grown tired being asked whether he can win in the general.

"It's unfortunate that people concentrate on something that's so foolish," said Laffey, who has predicted he would "crush" Whitehouse. "You can't do a general election poll 'til this primary's done anyways. … Linc Chafee can't win the general election."

Laffey has made a trademark of his "blitzes" in which he runs — literally — from door to door meeting voters in this tiny state of about a million people. Asked how many people he visits who express concern about his electability, he initially says "nobody" and then concedes that it's more like "maybe one out of 100, one out of 200 people."

Donna Barrett of Warwick counts herself as one of those concerned Laffey voters. Sitting beneath a tent at the festival on Saturday evening and chatting with Laffey, she later explains that she's got to "vote my conscience" but says she is "a little bit nervous" that a Laffey victory today would hand Democrats the seat in November.

But she also says people she talks to aren't concerned about it. She attributes her skepticism to that fact that she pays more attention to political news than most people.

Barrett buys into Laffey's outsider approach. She doesn't dislike Chafee and says she wishes Laffey were an independent, but she says there's something to be said for a new face for the sake of a new face considering the state of affairs in Washington.

"I just don't think anybody dislikes Chafee," she said of the former Warwick mayor, who took his seat in 1999 after the death of his father, popular longtime Republican Sen. John Chafee. "It's going to be tough for me not to vote for Chafee."

Laffey, meanwhile, with his brash, in-your-face style, is a more polished campaigner. At the festival he says he is there as mayor and not a candidate, though he reminds at least a few people about today's primary as he frenetically leaps from one person to another, kissing the women and constantly grasping hands. His style plays to his message of populism and outworking everybody.

Chafee, meanwhile, has tried to paint Laffey's intensity as instability. Standing in front of his campaign headquarters before a barbeque Saturday morning, the sign his supporters hold up behind him for the TV cameras says it all: "Keep Chafee." A Chafee has held the seat for three decades; Laffey, meanwhile, is too unpredictable, Chafee says.

Speaking frequently in the third person as if to emphasize the Chafee name, the senator describes his style as "a very stable, thoughtful, calm, steady approach, whereas my opponent's more likely to say whatever suits the audience he's talking to at the moment. And I think Rhode Islanders are going to see that."

Political Moderates Imperiled (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 12, 2006

CRANSTON, R.I.

Many drivers roaring toward the beach wave, honk, or flash thumbs up to Sen. Lincoln Chafee and a gaggle of roadside campaign volunteers hoisting "Keep Chafee" signs. Some travelers don't react at all. But one woman scowls and plunges a thumb toward the dashboard.

"It's rare you see a woman [do that]," muses the Republican senator to those standing nearby. "We'll get her in the general [election]!" cries out an aide.

That's if Senator Chafee manages to get to the general election. Monday's GOP primary in Rhode Island will tell whether the soft-spoken, middle-of-the-road incumbent will survive a political climate that's unfriendly to moderates - or whether the state's Republicans prefer a candidate closer to the GOP conservative base, even if that raises the risk of losing the seat in November to a Democrat.

Campaign 2006 is proving to be a scorcher for moderates of both parties, especially in the Northeast, where at least eight of the key races for control of the House and Senate will be decided.

"Moderates in the Northeast are a disappearing species, and this could be the year of the final purge," says Darrell West, a political scientist at Brown University in Providence.

Like fellow moderate Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut, Chafee could lose the primary to a rival who's more aligned with the base. Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey has run an aggressive campaign, and, heading into the vote, polls show that either candidate could win.

But unlike the Connecticut primary, the Rhode Island contest is not just about Iraq or the candidate's ties to President Bush. It's about whether a politician can hold middle ground when the pull in both parties is to the extremes. It's also about contrasting candidate styles - Chafee, low-key and reflective; Mr. Laffey, high intensity and no shades of gray - in a state so small that one-on-ones with voters can still make a difference.

Chafee is the only Republican senator to have voted against the use of force in Iraq, and has bucked the Bush White House on issues ranging from tax cuts and Social Security to abortion rights and regulation of the environment. He also cast the lone GOP vote against confirmation of Samuel Alito to the US Supreme Court. His stands won him enemies among conservative activists, especially the Club for Growth, which hopes to make Chafee its second trophy this primary season.

It's also a key election for the Senate Republican establishment, which is supporting Chafee with advisers, mailings, and ads, as well as a highly targeted get-out-the-vote drive in the last 72 hours.

Early on, the National Republican Senatorial Committee urged Laffey to not get into the race, on the grounds that only a moderate could win a general election in a blue state like Rhode Island.

"The NRSC said I would make a good lieutenant governor ... a job with no power. I said to them: 'Do I look like a lieutenant governor to you?' " says Laffey, a former investment banker, who works the crowd at a Greek festival in Cranston as rapidly as he speaks. Chafee, he says, is "indecisive and irrelevant" in Washington.

National Republican Party groups have poured more than $1 million into the state for Chafee, blanketing Rhode Island with mailings that charge that Laffey is a "tax and spend" politician, "will say anything to get elected," and "just isn't ready for the Senate." The NRSC released a statement last week calling Laffey "unelectable in a general election."

Meanwhile, the Club for Growth, an antitax group, has raised comparable funds for Laffey. Its ads and mailings have been a constant in the state since May, including claims that Chafee "has been awfully busy trying to raise taxes," supports pork projects such as the "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska, and would give Social Security to illegal immigrants.

"Both political parties are being pulled to the extremes," says Chafee.

After Sen. Arlen Specter beat back a challenge from former Rep. Pat Toomey and the Club for Growth in the 2004 Pennsylvania GOP primary, Chafee hired key Specter strategists for his own race. "They have a track record beating the Club for Growth," he says.

In fact, highly intense races are rare in Rhode Island, where only about 1 in 10 voters are registered Republicans. Asked about this race, many at the Lions Club steak fry in West Greenwich say they're tired of all the advertising. "They're slaughtering one another with those ads on TV," says George Mitchell of Cranston, who says he's still on the fence. But the bigger fight for Republicans will come in the general election. "Everyone's mad at Bush, and Republicans are going to get slaughtered because of it. Just look at Connecticut," he adds.

While Laffey likes to "blitz campaign" around the state in a Suburban or a Winnebago, Chafee drives himself in a green Prius. "Senator Chafee likes to criticize, but when you count all the children we put in that Winnebago, we're getting about 80 miles per gallon per person," says Kelly Laffey, Stephen's wife.

The typically low turnout in Rhode Island primary elections - the record was 45,000 back in 1964 - makes this race especially difficult to predict. A recent Rhode Island College poll shows Laffey leading 51 to 34 percent. In response, the NRSC released its own poll, by Public Opinion Strategies, showing Chafee leading 53 to 39 percent.

"I have no faith in polling in this race, because we have no idea how many people are going to turn out," says Jennifer Duffy, who analyzes Senate races for the Cook political report. Almost 50 percent of Rhode Island voters are independents and, unlike Connecticut, independents can vote in this race.

"If we can get turnout up to 45,000, we will prevail," predicts Chafee. National environmental groups such as the Sierra Club and the League of Conservation Voters are urging activists in the state to turn out for Chafee.

But Laffey dismisses the projections. "Tuesday will send a real message to the Washington [GOP] elite," he says.

In Cranston, voter Howard Fleming assures the mayor that when a Chafee worker asked whether he was going to support the senator, he said: " 'Yes, to the very end' ... if you get what I mean."

Burns' Foe Compiles Highlight Reel Of Gaffes (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) had a bumpy August politically, to say the least.

Yet the three-term lawmaker with a penchant for putting his foot in his mouth entered September in surprisingly good shape given the negative publicity his comments generated.

That hasn't stopped Burns' opponent, state Senate President Jon Tester (D), from compiling a "highlight reel" of the Senator's gaffes, which his campaign will begin showing on the YouTube Web site today.

Whether he was accusing Virginia firefighters of doing a "piss-poor job" or commenting about the "nice little Guatemalan man" — with uncertain immigration status — who is doing work on his Virginia home, Burns spent most of August apologizing for his off-the-cuff remarks.

Probably the most damaging incident came in late July when Burns reportedly stalked up to an elite group of firefighters from Augusta, Va., in the Billings, Mont., airport and accused them of not doing a "goddamned thing" to put out a raging wildfire in Montana.

"You probably paid [one of the firefighters] $10,000 to sit around; it's gotta change," he told the group, according to the report written by a Montana Department of Natural Resources and Conservation employee charged with looking into the incident.

Burns apologized quickly, issuing a statement that said: "In retrospect, I wish I had chosen my words more carefully. My criticism of the way in which the fire was handled should not have been directed at those who were working hard to put it out."

By mid-August, Burns was taking friendly ribbing from Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), who was in Helena, Mont., stumping for Burns.

Warner recounted how as a young man he worked for the Forest Service in Montana, "fighting fires, Conrad," he said, turning toward Burns and coughing conspicuously.

The move generated laughs at the event.

Yet for all the negative publicity, polls taken during the thick of it showed Burns running even with his Democratic challenger.

A USA Today/Gallup poll released on Sept. 1 showed Burns leading Tester 44 percent to 42 percent among registered voters, which was within the survey's margin of error. That's good news, according to the Burns camp.

"You look at all that has happened in the last year and he's within the margin of error starting the home stretch?" asked Erik Iverson, the Burns campaign's new senior adviser. "I honestly believe that Tester peaked too soon."

Tester spokesman Matt McKenna dismissed the notion that Burns is where he wants to be.

"I think that sounds like somebody who's been living in Washington, D.C., for the last year," McKenna said of Iverson. "Those of us who have been in Montana for more than 15 minutes recognize that there's an appetite for real change here."

Iverson is on a leave of absence from his duties as chief of staff to Rep. Denny Rehberg (R-Mont.) through the end of the campaign.

Iverson does not equate his hiring to the 2000 campaign, during which Burns was in serious trouble against now-Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer (D), who was then a political unknown, and turned to veteran GOP operative Dick Wadhams to pull him across the finish line.

"We got 60 days to go and it's all hands on deck," Iverson said. "I see myself as a supplement to what the campaign was doing before.

Tester's campaign chalks up the tight contest, despite Burns' verbal miscues, to the power of incumbency.

"He's a three-term incumbent U.S. Senator who spent $5 million and all he has to show for it is a tied race with a dirt farmer from Big Sandy," McKenna said.

Burns has used Hugo Reyes, the "nice little Guatemalan man," for yuks before.

At a June meeting, Burns told the group he has "this little fella who does our maintenance work around the house." Burns said he asked to see Reyes' green card, but Reyes demurred.

"I said 'oh gosh,'" Burns recounted.

Later that month at a debate with Tester, Burns told another anecdote about workers whose immigration status was unknown.

Burns said he was speaking to his contractor in Virginia when he saw an interview with an illegal roofing worker caught at the Mexican border on the TV news.

"So I told my roofer, 'you better go down and get your help or you won't get my house roofed."

Iverson said the legal status of Reyes' or any other employee doing work on the Senator's his Virginia home has never been in question.

"My understanding is that it is well documented that he's here legally and there is no question about that," Iverson said.

Two union chiefs have written Burns inquiring about the immigration status of his contractors.

Iverson dismissed the letters, which he has not seen, as "gotcha politics."

"This is the tempest in the teapot, this is some folks trying to make something out of nothing," Iverson said. "This is a desperate attempt to try to keep this story going."

The Burns campaign has not provided documentation that Reyes or any other handymen on the job at Burns' home are in the country legally.

Iverson said Burns does not condone illegal immigration, and his stance on the issue is clear.

DOJ_NMG_0061682

As for his gaffes, Iverson said they won't be a political issue because Montanans know Burns well enough to know he does not mean any offense.

"Sure, were there some misstatements?" Iverson asked. "Absolutely. But at the end of the day with Conrad, what you see is what you get. He's not your typical pre-packaged politician; he's a real person."

Burns recently said that there are terrorists in this country who "drive taxicabs in the daytime and kill at night."

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, who has made much of reaching out to black and Hispanic voters during his tenure, dismissed Burns' past statements.

"I don't think these statements are seen as reflective of the party or his record," Mehlman said in an interview with Roll Call reporters and editors. "People vote for Conrad Burns because of his [legislative] record, not necessarily the things he says."

Iverson said Montana voters know Burns is not racially intolerant.

"We're all fallible," Iverson said. "We all make a mistake. He has absolute respect for our firefighters. He has respect for people of all different backgrounds."

Under Fire, Democrat Retreats (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

The U.S. Senate campaign of Missouri Democrat Claire McCaskill has been under sharp criticism since she accused President Bush of letting poor blacks in Louisiana die during Hurricane Katrina.

Mrs. McCaskill, the state auditor, is attempting to link Republican Sen. Jim Talent with the president as she tries to unseat the incumbent.

"George Bush let people die on rooftops in New Orleans because they were poor and because they were black," she told a group of Democratic state legislators last week.

The comments, made as she outlined Mr. Talent's efforts to attract minority voters, were first reported by Pub Def Weekly, a St. Louis-based blog.

"In a spirited voice, she told them that she would do everything she could to make clear to every Democratic voter that 'George Bush has no better friend than Jim Talent,'" wrote Pub Def Weekly's Antonio D. French.

Republicans, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, immediately called upon Mrs. McCaskill to apologize for the remarks.

"It is totally unconscionable to suggest that the Coast Guard helicopter crews who worked hours long past regulation were intentionally leaving poor, black Americans to die on their rooftops," Mr. Frist said on his blog.

Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who leads the Senate Republican campaign arm, issued a similar statement: "These outrageous comments have no place in public discourse."

But Mrs. McCaskill told KMOX radio in Missouri the statement's context as reported by Pub Def Weekly is "not exactly correct." She said she was acknowledging the sentiment of many Americans, and national tragedies are the time when people need government the most.

She characterized the Bush response to Katrina as "gross incompetence that turned tragic because so many of the people in New Orleans didn't have the resources to help themselves."

"Clearly, the Bush administration needs to accept blame for the tragedy in Katrina," she said.

Mr. Talent has been running television ads that laud his work with Democrats and portray him as an independent thinker. They don't mention Mr. Bush, who raised about $600,000 for Mr. Talent at a private Kansas City fundraiser Friday.

Former President Bill Clinton, meanwhile, campaigned for Mrs. McCaskill and Missouri Democrats at a weekend fundraiser in St. Louis that raised more than $1 million.

"You can vote for someone who will perpetuate the control of the narrow strip of the Republican Party that's been running America for six years," Mr. Clinton told attendees. "Or you can vote for someone who would be a proud successor in the Senate to Harry Truman: Claire McCaskill."

Mich. Voters Focus On Economy (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0061683

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

PONTIAC, Mich. -- Mike Bouchard was eager to make the sale as he bantered with Tracey Allen at a Labor Day street fair. Pitching his Republican candidacy for the U.S. Senate, the Oakland County sheriff heard her say she favored Democratic incumbent Debbie Stabenow.

"Tell me," Bouchard smiled, holding a plastic water bottle under Allen's chin as a mock microphone, "what has she accomplished to make your life better? Thirty seconds or less."

When Allen merely smiled, he persisted: "I'll get you results!"

The candidate's high-spirited determination charmed Allen, but after he had moved on, she said Stabenow was her choice.

"I just want my gas to go down and my cost of living to go down," Allen said. "Everybody has felt the wrath of Bush. Anybody who is attached to the Republicans, I want out of office."

In Michigan, the November election is likely to come down to whom the voters blame for one of the nation's most troubled economies. With unemployment higher than the national average and many residents frustrated with Democratic Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, Republicans see a chance for a swing-state victory.

Bouchard has kept within striking distance in his first statewide race. But as he works to cultivate an image as a seasoned lawman and a pragmatic politician, he is finding that many voters are unwilling to replace a Democrat in Washington with a largely unknown Republican.

Recent polls show Stabenow with about 50 percent of the vote and a lead of eight to 13 percentage points. She took her Senate seat six years ago after a one-point victory over incumbent Republican Spencer Abraham.

At this point in the 2000 race, she was more than a dozen points behind -- a fact cited by both sides this time. Stabenow's team points out how much better she is doing. Bouchard's advisers suggest there is plenty of time to catch up.

The GOP draws hope from polls showing that two in three voters are dissatisfied with Michigan's direction. The jobless rate rose to 7 percent in July, compared with 4.8 percent nationwide. Given deepening troubles in the auto industry, economists expect the number to remain high even with seasonal hiring.

A brain drain fueled by pessimism about the state's economic future has left Michigan ranked 49th nationally between 2000 and 2005 in retaining young adults, according to the Census Bureau. Detroit, no longer vibrant no matter how its leaders try, has lost a million residents since its heyday.

"Only three states have lost jobs in the last four years," as one Republican ad puts it. "Two of them -- Louisiana and Mississippi -- were devastated by hurricanes. The third is Michigan."

The state's long list of economic woes has been particularly damaging to first-term governor Granholm, who has suffered heavily as she battles a Republican-led legislature and a joyless budget squeeze.

Her Republican challenger -- Dick DeVos, former president of Amway Corp. -- has hammered her relentlessly while pouring more than $12 million of his own money into the race.

Polls suggest Granholm has a slight edge. A Detroit Free Press poll showed her ahead by two points at the end of August after closing an earlier four-point gap. A sounding for the Detroit News and four television stations gave her a seven-point lead.

That late-August poll, conducted by Epic-MRA, found that 50 percent of respondents viewed Granholm favorably and 49 percent unfavorably. The polls and recent interviews with more than a dozen voters in four cities also show the intense interest in the governor's race has distracted attention from the Senate contest.

"The Senate race is being overwhelmed by the governor's race," said Bill Rustem of Lansing-based Public Sector Consultants, who believes the situation helps the better-known incumbent. "The less attention is paid to the race, the less people know about who the alternative is, the better it is for Stabenow."

Stabenow, 56, is a former House member who has outraised Bouchard by millions of dollars. She is casting herself as more experienced and a reliable vote against what she calls the "Bush agenda." She says the GOP has shortchanged education and turned its back on manufacturing.

DOJ_NMG_0061684

To counter Bouchard's claims that she has accomplished little -- Republicans at the state convention dubbed her "Do-Nothing Debbie" -- she cites favored bills and amendments.

On larger issues, Stabenow voted against the Iraq invasion while voting since for military spending. As a senator from a strong trade union state, she rejected a proposed guest-worker program, speaking against "importing cheap labor when you have Americans willing to work for good wages."

The two Senate candidates have dueled over border and homeland security issues, which Bouchard consider his strong suit. At 50, he is former state legislator and career police officer and member of one of the FBI's joint terrorism task forces, a network of dozens of teams across the country.

Stabenow speaks often about radio operability, the often unfulfilled goal of law agencies being able to speak to one another in a crisis. Bouchard, who volunteered for duty at Ground Zero and in flood-battered New Orleans, suggests that his rival is well intentioned but unschooled.

"I live, eat and breathe that. She doesn't understand the issue. She never got any of it done and in my book, talk is cheap," Bouchard said at a Pontiac coffee shop. "It's going to be a campaign based on results. She doesn't have them."

President Bush is broadly unpopular in Michigan but jetted into the state Friday to raise money for Bouchard. Bouchard said he was grateful for Bush's fundraising help, but he is keeping a certain distance, mindful of the national mood. He tells voters, "I'm the guy from Michigan who happens to be a Republican."

With both candidates calling it an election about change, the campaigns are essentially pushing voters to decide who, if anyone, should be ousted.

Is it, as Stabenow contends, the Republicans who dominate policymaking in Washington? Or, as Bouchard maintains, the Democrat who governs in Lansing and the one who commutes to Washington?

"I don't blame them," Southfield electrician Gregory Bracey, 54, said of Granholm and Stabenow. "Their hands are tied. We know Republicans are in charge."

But at the annual Peach Fest parade in the reliably Republican town of Romeo, north of Detroit, 20-year General Motors worker Clay Osborne said the two women deserve early retirement.

"There's a lot of jobs leaving the state," said Osborne, 59, as he stood at the corner of South Main and Pleasant. "Since Governor Granholm and Senator Stabenow have been in office, it's gone down the tubes."

Chicago's Daley Vetoes Bill Aimed At Big Retailers (WSJ)

By Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley used the first veto of his 17-year tenure to reject a living-wage ordinance aimed at forcing big retailers to pay wages of $10 an hour and health benefits equivalent to $3 an hour by 2010.

The veto is important to Wal-Mart Stores Inc., which plans to open its first store in Chicago late this month in the economically depressed 37th ward. The Bentonville, Ark., retailer is expanding to cities such as Chicago after saturating many rural markets in the U.S. (See the veto letter.1)

Mayor Daley had to persuade only two aldermen to reverse course on the ordinance to ensure his veto isn't overridden. The aldermen had voted 35-14 on July 26 to pass the ordinance.

The ordinance's sponsor, Alderman Joseph Moore, said an override of the veto remains possible. He said the council could delay its vote on the veto rather than settling the issue at its meeting tomorrow, when Alderman Manuel Flores, one of those who supports the ordinance, will be absent at a leadership conference in China. With more time, the votes could tip back in the ordinance's favor, Mr. Moore said. "Going against popular will, the mayor has now put the issue back squarely into the laps of the city council," Mr. Moore said. "I am hopeful this city council will see clear to overriding this veto."

The ordinance would have required retailers with more than $1 billion in annual sales and stores exceeding 90,000 square feet to pay their Chicago employees hourly wages of at least $9.25 starting in July 2007 and $10 by 2010. It also would have required those retailers to provide benefits such as health-care coverage equivalent to at least $1.50 an hour by July and $3 an hour by 2010.

The ordinance was another example of lawmakers trying to use local and state measures rather than federal law to mandate wages and benefits from big retailers. Maryland legislators in January overrode a gubernatorial veto to require large employers, namely Wal-Mart, to spend the equivalent of 8% of their payroll in the state on employees' health-care benefits. A federal judge struck down the Maryland law in July as conflicting with federal law, and none of the similar bills proposed in three dozen states has advanced to become law so far this year.

Wal-Mart operates nearly 4,000 stores in the U.S., including Sam's Club warehouses. Michael Lewis, a senior vice president of store operations for Wal-Mart, said the veto "encourages desperately needed business investment and development in the city."

In vetoing the ordinance, Mayor Daley cited a potential loss of jobs. In recent weeks, several big retailers had written to his office to oppose the ordinance. "I understand and share a desire to ensure that everyone who works in the city of Chicago earns a decent wage," the mayor wrote to the aldermen yesterday. "But I do not believe that this ordinance, well intentioned as it may be, would achieve that end. Rather, I believe that it would drive jobs and business from our city."

Chicago Mayor Vetoes Big-Store Minimum Wage (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

CHICAGO, Sept. 11 — In his 17 years at this city's helm, Mayor Richard M. Daley had never vetoed a decision of the City Council, a sign, it seems, that he gets his way most of the time.

But on Monday, Mr. Daley vetoed the Council's plan to make Chicago the first city in the nation to single out "big box" retailers like Wal-Mart and Home Depot for wage minimums for their workers.

"I understand and share a desire to ensure that everyone who works in the city of Chicago earns a decent wage," Mr. Daley wrote of the rules, which would have required large stores to pay at least $10 an hour by 2010, and at least $3 an hour in benefits.

"But I do not believe that this ordinance, well intentioned as it may be, would achieve that end," he continued. "Rather, I believe it would drive jobs and businesses from our city, penalizing neighborhoods that need additional economic activity the most."

The veto, praised by business leaders but condemned by labor groups and the aldermen who had pressed for the ordinance, set up the mayor for a rare political fight: Mr. Daley, who is up for re-election next year, may face an effort to override his veto at City Hall on Wednesday.

Despite the mayor's disapproval, the aldermen voted 35 to 14 in favor of the wage rules in July. But some of that support has grown shaky in the face of recent lobbying by the mayor's office. One person was absent for the original vote.

An override would require 34 of the 50 aldermen, and at least one Council member who had supported the ordinance told The Chicago Tribune that she now intended to vote against it. Another alderman who supported the measure is expected to be absent.

The ordinance, which was to apply to stores with at least 90,000 square feet and which are part of companies grossing more than $1 billion a year, set off a firestorm after its passage.

Supporters called it a groundbreaking step nationally in forcing such businesses to improve treatment of their workers and pay them more than either the federal minimum wage ($5.15 an hour) or the state's ($6.50) require.

Opponents, including some City Council members from the poorest wards, said they feared the move would send stores and jobs into the suburbs, even as some large stores announced that they were delaying plans to sign new leases in Chicago.

On Monday, Wal-Mart praised Mr. Daley's decision. "His action encourages desperately needed business investment and development in the city, with job opportunities and savings for those who need it most," Michael Lewis, a Wal-Mart official, said in a release.

In the coming weeks, Wal-Mart expects to open its first store in Chicago, on the city's West Side. Some 11,000 people applied for the 400 jobs there, said David Tovar, a Wal-Mart spokesman. The range of expected wages there was unavailable, Mr. Tovar said, but he said the average wage for full-time hourly associates in Illinois was $10.41 an hour.

Wal-Mart Discounts Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Yesterday Chicago Mayor Richard Daley issued his first veto ever, striking down a living-wage bill that would require "big box" retailers like Wal-Mart and Office Depot to pay a super-minimum wage of $10 an hour plus $3 in benefits to all employees by 2010. The national minimum is $5.15, and in Illinois the minimum is $6.50. So you ask: What else is new? Well this is Chicago, so follow us back through the big-box bill's politics, and even the most politically jaundiced reader might find a surprise.

In his veto message, Mayor Daley, a pro-union Democrat, declared that the wage law would "drive jobs and businesses from our city, penalizing neighborhoods that need additional economic activity the most." Wal-Mart and Target have announced plans to cease expansions in the city if the law is enacted. The city already loses $300 million a year in sales tax revenues when Windy City residents go bargain hunting in the suburbs. And of course if Wal-Mart, Home Depot and the others were to abandon the city, Chicago residents would be paying a great many millions more a year in higher prices. Still, the City Council has vowed a veto override vote later this week. What then? Well, the poor get stuck while those with the financial means will drive out to the suburbs to do some Wal-Mart shopping.

It turns out that the wage bill's chief sponsor, Alderman Joe Moore, shops at suburban big-box retail stores, for the usual reason. His campaign committee has purchased $30,589 worth of supplies at big-box retailers outside the city, according to disclosure forms. Alderman Moore isn't alone out there with a cart among the high stacks. A review of Illinois State Board of Elections disclosure forms finds that the 35 aldermen who voted to stick it to the "big box" retailers have spent $114,000 patronizing these non-Chicago stores.

And why not? The virtue of superstores isn't just that they're prodigious creators of jobs -- Wal-Mart alone has hired 240,000 workers since 2001 -- but that they hold down costs and pass on the savings to consumers, even to Windy City pols.

View Of God Can Reveal Your Values And Politics (USAT)

By Cathy Lynn Grossman

USA Today, September 12, 2006

The United States calls itself one nation under God, but Americans don't all have the same image of the Almighty in mind.

A new survey of religion in the USA finds four very different images of God — from a wrathful deity thundering at sinful humanity to a distant power uninvolved in mankind's affairs.

Forget denominational brands or doctrines or even once-salient terms like “Religious Right.” Even the oft-used “Evangelical” appears to be losing ground.

Believers just don't see themselves the way the media and politicians — or even their pastors — do, according to the national survey of 1,721 Americans, by far the most comprehensive national religion survey to date.

Written and analyzed by sociologists from Baylor University's Institute for Studies of Religion, in Waco, Texas, and conducted by Gallup, the survey asked 77 questions with nearly 400 answer choices that burrowed deeply into beliefs, practices and religious ties and turned up some surprising findings:

•Though 91.8% say they believe in God, a higher power or a cosmic force, they had four distinct views of God's personality and engagement in human affairs. These Four Gods — dubbed by researchers Authoritarian, Benevolent, Critical or Distant — tell more about people's social, moral and political views and personal piety than the familiar categories of Protestant/Catholic/Jew or even red state/blue state.

For example: 45.6% of all Americans say the federal government “should advocate Christian values,” but 74.5% of believers in an authoritarian God do.

Sociologist Paul Froese says the survey finds the stereotype that conservatives are religious and liberals are secular is “simply not true. Political liberals and conservatives are both religious. They just have different religious views.”

•About one in nine (10.8%) respondents have no religious ties at all; previous national surveys found 14%. The Baylor survey, unlike others, asked people to write in the names and addresses of where they worship, and many who said “none” or “don't know” when asked about their religious identity named a church they occasionally attend.

•The paranormal — beliefs outside conventional organized religion — is immensely popular. Most people said they believe in prophetic dreams; four in 10 say there were once “ancient advanced civilizations” such as Atlantis.

•"Evangelical" may be losing favor as a way Americans describe themselves. About one in three Americans say they belong to denominations that theologians consider evangelical, but only 14% of all respondents in the survey say this is one way they would describe themselves. Only 2.2% called it the single best term. Top choices overall: "Bible-believing" (20.5%) or "born-again" (18.6%).

"Any politician who really wants to connect with Christians should be looking at those terms, not vague abstractions like evangelical. … They need to tap into labels that have salience," Baylor sociologist Kevin Dougherty says.

•Most Americans think their nearest and dearest are going to heaven. The pearly gates open widest for family (75.3% say they'll get in) and personal friends (69.3%). The survey did not ask whether people expect to go to heaven themselves.

•Religion-themed movies and books have a vast reach: 44.3% of those polled saw Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ. More than one in 10 of all surveyed say they spent $50 or more in the past month on items such as religious books, music and jewelry.

A closer look at what people read finds that 28.5% of Americans say they've read The Da Vinci Code. Baylor also found 19%, including 25% of all U.S. women, have read the Rev. Rick Warren's Christian handbook The Purpose-Driven Life, and 19% overall have read at least one of the novels in the Left Behind apocalyptic fiction series.

These are part of the first wave of results from the random survey of Americans who completed and mailed in a 16-page questionnaire. Conducted in the fall of 2005, the survey is a statistically representative sampling of the USA by age, gender and race.

The Baylor team will spend two years digging through the findings and releasing reports on subtopics such as civic involvement and volunteerism, then repeat the core questions in fall 2007 to track trends. The research is funded by the John Templeton Foundation.

Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, calls the analysis "intriguing. Baylor was able to ask many more probing questions than the usual surveys."

Others agree.

The Four Gods breakdown is helpful "if you are trying to understand religion's impact on society by how people see themselves from the inside, not by observations from outsiders," says John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life.

Baylor researchers determined the Four Gods breakdown by analyzing questions about God's personality and engagement.

The survey asked respondents to agree or disagree with any of 10 descriptions of their "personal understanding of what God is like," including phrases such as "angered by my sins" or "removed from worldly affairs." They could check off 16 adjectives they believe describe God, including words such as "absolute," "wrathful," "forgiving," "friendly" or "distant."

When USA TODAY asked people similar questions, it found views as varied as those of self-described fundamentalist Brian Snider of Madison, Ala., and Marilyn McGuire, who says she sees God in every sunrise and sunset, flower and kitten at her home on Orcas Island near Seattle.

Snider, 46, says God is "involved in the affairs of men at all times and he does judge us. … We still believe he is angry at sin."

McGuire, in her late 60s and once an active Episcopalian, now rejects all dogma. "I have my own system of what I think is true and sacred. I try to keep myself peaceful and keep myself in a loving state."

The four visions of God outlined in the Baylor research aren't mutually exclusive. And they don't include 5.2% of Americans who say they are atheists. (Although 91.8% said they believe in God, some didn't answer or weren't sure.)

Still, says Baylor's Christopher Bader, "you learn more about people's moral and political behavior if you know their image of God than almost any other measure. It turns out to be more powerful a predictor of social and political views than the usual markers of church attendance or belief in the Bible."

Though 12.2% overall say abortion is wrong in all circumstances, the number nearly doubles to 23.4% for those who see an authoritarian God and slides to 1.5% for followers of a distant God.

Highlights of Baylor's analysis:

DOJ_NMG_0061688

•The Authoritarian God (31.4% of Americans overall, 43.3% in the South) is angry at humanity's sins and engaged in every creature's life and world affairs. He is ready to throw the thunderbolt of judgment down on "the unfaithful or ungodly," Bader says.

Those who envision God this way "are religiously and politically conservative people, more often black Protestants and white evangelicals," Bader says. "(They) want an active, Christian-values-based government with federal funding for faith-based social services and prayer in the schools."

They're also the most inclined to say God favors the USA in world affairs (32.1% vs. 18.6% overall).

•The Benevolent God (23% overall, 28.8% in the Midwest) still sets absolute standards for mankind in the Bible. More than half (54.8%) want the government to advocate Christian values.

But this group, which draws more from mainline Protestants, Catholics and Jews, sees primarily a forgiving God, more like the father who embraces his repentant prodigal son in the Bible, Froese says.

They're inclined (68.1%) to say caring for the sick and needy ranks highest on the list of what it means to be a good person.

This is the group in which the Rev. Jeremy Johnston, executive pastor and communications director for his father's 5,000-member Southern Baptist congregation in Overland Park, Kan., places himself.

"God is in control of everything. He's grieved by the sin of the world, by any created person who doesn't follow him. But I see (a) God … who loves us, who sees us for who we really are. We serve a God of the second, third, fourth and fifth chance," Johnston says.

•The Critical God (16% overall, 21.2% in the East) has his judgmental eye on the world, but he's not going to intervene, either to punish or to comfort.

"This group is more paradoxical," Bader says. "They have very traditional beliefs, picturing God as the classic bearded old man on high. Yet they're less inclined to go to church or affiliate seriously with religious groups. They are less inclined to see God as active in the world. Their politics are definitely not liberal, but they're not quite conservative, either."

Those who picture a critical God are significantly less likely to draw absolute moral lines on hot-button issues such as abortion, gay marriage or embryonic stem cell research.

For example, 57% overall say gay marriage is always wrong compared with 80.6% for those who see an authoritarian God, and 65.8% for those who see God as benevolent. For those who believe in a critical God, it was 54.7%.

•The Distant God (24.4% overall, 30.3% in the West) is "no bearded old man in the sky raining down his opinions on us," Bader says. Followers of this God see a cosmic force that launched the world, then left it spinning on its own.

This has strongest appeal for Catholics, mainline Protestants and Jews. It's also strong among "moral relativists," those least likely to say any moral choice is always wrong, and among those who don't attend church, Bader says.

Only 3.8% of this group say embryonic stem cell research is always wrong, compared with 38.5% of those who see an authoritarian God, 22.7% for those who see God as benevolent and 13.2% who see God as critical but disengaged.

"I still believe in God," says Joanne Meehl, 56, of Barre, Mass., who wrote a book in the mid-'90s called Recovering Catholics. "But to me God is the universe, not as small as a 'He' or a 'She' but bigger than all of that." Humanity is on its own, she says. "People who do wrong are punished in this world, not in the next. This world is it."

Some might question whether a survey by Baptist-affiliated Baylor has a conservative Protestant tilt. For example, there's no mention of communion or saints — central to Catholic believers. Also, questions often used "church," with no mention of synagogues or mosques. But Baylor researchers say their testing finds people view the word as generic for "house of worship."

"This work was done by well-respected sociologists of religion," the Pew Forum's Green says. "Baylor is becoming a leading evangelical university in the same way Notre Dame is a leading Catholic university, by doing first-rate objective social science."

Rodney Stark, former president of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion and part of the Baylor team, says: "We wanted to break from the past 30 years of narrow questions. " 'Do you believe in God?' Everyone says yes.

"If you ask 'Are you a Protestant, Catholic or Jew?' people don't even know what denomination they are today or what the label means."

Americans May Be More Religious Than They Realize (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0061689

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

A survey released yesterday posits the idea that the United States -- already one of the most religious nations in the developed world -- may be even less secular than previously suspected.

The Baylor University survey looked carefully at people who checked "none" when asked their religion in polls. Sociologists have watched this group closely since 1990, when their numbers doubled, from 7 percent of the population to 14 percent. Some sociologists said the jump reflects increasing secularization at the same time that American society is becoming more religious.

But the Baylor survey, considered one of the most detailed ever conducted about religion in the United States, found that one in 10 people who picked "no religion" out of 40 choices did something interesting when asked later where they worship: They named a place.

Considering that, Baylor researchers say, the percentage of people who are truly unaffiliated is more like 10.8 percent. The difference between 10.8 percent and 14 percent is about 10 million Americans.

"People might not have a denomination, but they have a congregation. They have a sense of religious connection that is formative to who they are," said Kevin D. Dougherty, a sociologist at Baylor's Institute for Studies of Religion and one of the survey's authors. Baylor is a leading Baptist university, located in Waco, Tex.

The finding reflects the new challenges involved in trying to categorize religiosity in the United States, where people increasingly blend religions, shop for churches and worship in independent communities. Classic labels such as mainline, evangelical and unaffiliated no longer have the same meaning.

For example, 33 percent of Americans worship at evangelical congregations, which sociologists say are places that espouse an inerrant Bible, the importance of evangelizing and the requirement of having a personal relationship with Jesus. But only 15 percent of respondents to the Baylor survey said the term "evangelical" describes their religious identity.

Scholars have been saying for some time that the relevance of denomination is decreasing. But the Baylor survey, which asks about such subjects as God's "personality" and what people pray about, adds to a debate about what that means. It reveals the complex ways Americans describe their religiosity, and the minefield for today's scholars in trying to measure it. Is someone religious if they attend church? If they believe in God? If they identify with a particular religious group? What if they do one but not the others? Which gets more weight?

Academics who study religious demographics disagree about the "nones," and the Baylor study won't end that debate. Some say they are mostly secular -- those who aren't atheist but don't consider religion important. Some say they are in interfaith families and have mixed identities.

Some say they are new immigrants, including many from China, and second-generation Hispanics.

One thing the experts agree on: "Nones" tend to vote liberal but tend not to identify with a political party.

"What is most associated with 'no religion' from a political point of view is independence," said Barry Kosmin, principal investigator of a telephone survey that queried tens of thousands of respondents. His American Religious Identification Survey found that the number of "no religion" Americans jumped from 14.3 million in 1990 to 29.4 million in 2001. "If you don't belong religiously, you don't belong politically," he said.

Among the most innovative aspects of the Baylor survey, say scholars who know about it, are questions about how Americans describe God's personality. Respondents were offered 26 attributes ranging from "absolute" to "wrathful," and were asked whether God is directly involved in and angered by their lives and what happens in the world.

The researchers separated God's attributes into four categories: wrathful, involved, benevolent and uninvolved. They found that the largest category of people -- 31 percent -- was made up of those who said they believe God is both wrathful and highly involved in human affairs.

Beliefs about God's personality are powerful predictors, according to the survey. Those who considered God engaged and punishing were likely to have lower incomes and less education, to come from the South and to be white evangelicals or black Protestants. Those who believed God to be distant and nonjudgmental were more likely to support increased business regulation, environmental protection and the even distribution of wealth.

The changing demographics of the United States demand different polls as well, religion pollsters say. For example, approximately 3 percent of Americans observe faiths other than Christianity and Judaism. While still small, this group is growing rapidly, and scholars say that if current trends continue, that number could reach 10 percent in coming decades.

According to Democratic pollster Anna Greenberg, who focuses on religion, that is already the figure for Americans younger than 25.

Questions about the frequency of attending religious services aren't as relevant to Hindus and Buddhists, who often have worship spaces in their homes. Questions about weekly prayer services aren't as relevant to Muslims, who pray five times a day, she said.

John Green, senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life focusing on religion and politics, said: "The broader point is that this country that's always been religiously diverse is becoming religiously diverse in a new way."

The 'Daily Show' Generation (USAT)

By Mary Zeiss Stange

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Is Jon Stewart a corruptor of youth or a political mentor?

The question is wacky enough to be a Daily Show headline. But it has been seriously posed by a number of academics, most recently in a study published in May by two political science professors in the journal American Politics Research.

In "The Daily Show Effect: Candidate Evaluations, Efficacy, and American Youth," Jody Baumgartner and Jonathan Morris, of East Carolina University, claim to have discovered that viewing Stewart's nightly satirical riff on the news causes college-age Americans to become cynical about politicians and the news media.

"Because young people are more impressionable … and thus more prone to any adverse effects The Daily Show might have," Baumgartner and Morris conclude that the greatest potential net effect of Comedy Central's Peabody Award-winning show is a sense of apathy among the 18-24 crowd, approximately half of whom view Stewart's program on a more or less regular basis.

They reached this conclusion by contrasting the responses of students who had viewed 2004 presidential election coverage on The Daily Show to those of students who had viewed similar reportage on CBS' Evening News. The study had an ironic edge to it, however: The cynical and potentially more apathetic Daily Show viewers also seemed to be "more confident about their own ability to understand politics" than those who had "consumed" the network news.

The "Daily Show effect" study made media waves when The Village Voice ran a story about it in its education issue for this fall. Suddenly, pundits showed more interest in the political thinking of college students than they had since the 2004 elections. In August, MSNBC's Chris Matthews featured the issue on his Sunday morning talk show, putting former CBS news anchor Dan Rather on the spot to explain why young viewers might have opted for Stewart over him. In reply, Rather said something about how that age group wasn't really his demographic.

As a college professor who, among other things, serves as faculty adviser to our progressive student organization, I was immediately struck both by the rightness of Rather's response, and by the wrongheadedness of the assumption that educated young adults cannot discern a relationship between Stewart's satire (which Baumgartner/Morris persistently call "sarcasm") and pointed political commentary.

Because the courses I teach — in women's and environmental studies, and in American religion — have contemporary "real world" implications, I customarily build a current-events component into them. These assignments serve two functions: One is for students to relate news items from various sources — newspapers, magazines, broadcast media and the Internet — to course content. The other, more important one, is for students to pay close attention to the way the news is being "packaged." Are there politically or otherwise skewed stories, editorial content masquerading as straight news, and so on?

Based on my experience with them, I can attest that the current college-age generation is generally, and increasingly, media savvy when it comes to critically "consuming" the news. I would further argue that this is more so because of shows such as Stewart's (and more recently its spinoff, The Colbert Report) as well as websites such as that of The Onion newspaper. After all, in order to "get" their humor, one has to already know something substantial about the stories they parody.

As it turns out, two other academic studies, both from the Annenberg Public Policy Center of the University of Pennsylvania, bear out my classroom experience.

One was part of the Center's 2004 Election Survey under the direction of Kathleen Hall Jamieson. It disclosed that late-night comedy viewers were more likely than the early-to-bed general public to be knowledgeable about the issue positions and backgrounds of the presidential candidates — and viewers of The Daily Show were, as a group, better informed than those of David Letterman or Jay Leno.

These viewers were also younger, better educated and more likely to identify themselves as moderates or liberals.

Where did these hip, young Daily Show viewers get their knowledge of politics?

Not from conventional TV news. A second Annenberg report, released in May, studied media use among people ages 14-22 and found that for the majority of them (almost 60%), the Web is the primary source of news. Newspapers ranked a distant second, and the national evening news on TV (including cable networks) came in last. I'd say that over the years, the current-event reports in my classes have mirrored this pattern, bearing in mind that many people read newspapers online now.

A second set of facts emerged from this study: Reading newspapers (presumably, on- or off-line) increases political awareness, but searching the Internet increases both political awareness and civic engagement. The Daily Show generation, in other words, is not only apt to be more concerned about politics but also more likely to be spurred to do something with that concern.

The apparent sharp upsurge in the past several years of political activism — both liberal and conservative — on college campuses nationwide would seem to bear this out. Whether that activism will translate into significant voter turnout this November remains to be seen. But apathy it is not.

Are these same young people cynical about politicians and newscasters?

Well, yes. So are many of their elders. But don't blame that on Jon Stewart. As he himself famously pointed out on CNN's now-defunct Crossfire in October 2004, if the “serious” national news media are irked at being called to account by a show whose lead-in is “puppets making crank phone calls,” they have no one to thank but themselves.

'Death Of A President' Courts Controversy, But To What End? (WSJ)

By Joe Morgenstern

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The first question posed by "Death of a President" is whether a filmmaker has the right to shout Assassination in a crowded theater. That's what happened, in effect, on Sunday night at the Toronto International Film Festival when Gabriel Range's film was screened for the first time, to a turnaway audience. A fake documentary set one year in the future, "D.O.A.P.," as it has also been called, depicts the assassination of President Bush by a lone gunman, and the prosecutorial rush to judgment that follows.

The answer to the question is yes, of course a filmmaker has the right. A distinction must be made between provoking controversy with obviously fictional, albeit incendiary, events, and provoking panic over a nonexistent fire. What's more, Mr. Range, an Englishman with an uncommon gift for simulating reality on screen, plays a clever game with his audience, inviting a rush to judgment on the merits of his film. I confess to having done just that -- jumped to the conclusion, sight unseen, that nothing the film might contain would be likely to justify the implicit opportunism of its premise. Now that I've seen it, I think that sometimes one jumps to the right conclusion.

The action begins in October 2007, when Air Force One touches down in Chicago and a motorcade takes President Bush to a downtown hotel, where he is to deliver a speech on the economy. (Video snippets of speeches Mr. Bush has actually given in Chicago are seamlessly integrated with the staged reality.) The scene-setting is impressive, and plausible enough, if pessimistic. The economy has been battered by soaring oil prices. North Korea poses a suddenly imminent nuclear threat. Opposition to the war in Iraq has brought throngs of angry demonstrators to Chicago's streets. And the film is respectful of Mr. Bush as a person, even though its heart obviously lies with the demonstrators, and later the arrestees, who fiercely denounce his administration's policies.

But the title of this production is, after all, "Death of a President," and its fateful narrative generates a buildup of anxiety from the moment the presidential plane hits the runway. The ingredients are mercilessly familiar: the motorcade hinting at Dallas; the surging protesters and club-wielding cops suggesting the deadly combat of Chicago during the Democratic convention of 1968; the president's vulnerability on the street evoking the attempt on Ronald Reagan's life. And I'm euphemizing when I say "anxiety." For those of us who are old enough to remember the assassinations of John F. Kennedy, Robert F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, the right word is anguish: Mr. Range's film is an anguish-generator of enormous intensity.

But let's set aside that generational divide for the moment and acknowledge that works of art can and sometimes should evoke fear and dread in the beholder. The next questions are whether "Death of a President" is a work of art, and whether it puts us through what it puts us through in order to illuminate something else beyond the anger and potential violence of contemporary life.

The film is certainly artful in its deployment of tried-and-true documentary techniques to create an alternate reality. Before and after the assassination (the details of which are mercifully veiled by crowds and ensuing chaos), Mr. Range, who wrote the script with Simon Finch, uses actors in fictional straight-to-the-camera interviews to reconstruct the events leading up to the shooting, and to comment on what ensues. Mr. Range is very good at directing actors -- he may have a bright future in conventional fiction films. And the script is very sly in imputing to the new president -- President Cheney -- an eagerness to act on the basis of dubious evidence: i.e. the indictment of a Syrian immigrant, despite grave doubts about his guilt. "Cheney," we are told by one faux interview subject, "had been obsessed by Syria, and getting rid of Assad, for years." ("Death of a President" was originally made for British television. There are currently no plans for broadcast in the U.S., although the screening has stimulated interest in theatrical distribution.)

For a while "D.O.A.P." holds out the promise of political satire, however partisan, or some sort of structural analysis -- what a U.S. government might do in such circumstances, both domestically and globally. But the movie has less on its mind than meets the eye. The first two-thirds of the story is taken up with events surrounding the assassination. The tragic totems of 20th-century American history are all there -- the TV bulletins (which are strangely off-key), the state funeral, the grief-stricken faces, the riderless horse. Yet they seem perfunctory, and become less convincing (or more repugnant, in the case of still photos supposedly showing the president in an operating room) as the minutes tick by.

And in the aftermath, the film loses track of any consequences to Syria or anywhere else. Its focus is the scapegoating of the Syrian suspect in a trial that takes place, quite implausibly, only seven months after the assassination, and that leads to what used to be called, before Watergate faded from national memory, a post-Watergate ending, tinnily cynical and tacitly smug.

As a piece of postmodern, mockumentary filmmaking, "Death of a President" does play -- and I use that word advisedly -- with other issues. By dramatizing the government's dependence on questionable forensic evidence, by manipulating images and flagrantly falsifying contexts (as in excerpts from a Cheney speech that are made to seem a eulogy for the fallen president), it reminds us of the undependable nature of supposedly objective truth. As filmmaking for the sake of filmmaking, it's part of a familiar genre: "Citizen Kane" employed a fake documentary as its basic narrative device.

But another distinction must be made -- between clever films that play games with interesting themes, and a film that depicts the murder of a sitting president. This is not to suggest that what's seen on screen might provoke a mad act in real life. Too little is understood about such causal connections, and in any case one hopes, and must assume, that this president is protected adequately.

The problem is that the game played by Mr. Range and his colleagues turns out to be, at bottom, banal. Do we truly not know that reality can be altered, whether by Photoshop or official lies? And by playing it so glibly, "Death of a President" ultimately, and paradoxically, does what it professes to deplore -- devalues the difference between real and false. Mr. Range is a talented man who knows how to control images and emotions, up to a point. By virtue of its subject, however, "Death of a President" takes on an unreal life of its own. The film itself becomes a riderless horse.

'Death Of A President' Faces Tough Questions, Audience (USAT)

By Harlan Jacobson

USA Today, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061693

TORONTO — The hot-ticket Death of a President, which had its world premiere here Sunday night, was not meant to be a political attack on President Bush, says its British TV director, Gabriel Range.

The film's title set off an orgy on the talk radio and TV circuit when it was revealed two weeks ago. But Range calls it a "fictionalized retrospective documentary … in which we're using the lens of the future to look at the present."

At press time, the British film did not have a deal for U.S. distribution.

In the movie, events are set forward to Oct. 19, 2007, when President Bush gives a speech to the Chicago Economics Club, a sequence lifted from archival news footage of Bush speaking to the real group earlier this year. Outside, the Chicago police beat protesters run amok.

As he walks from the hotel to his motorcade, "Bush" is assassinated.

The filmmakers use transplanted archival footage of Bush (and of Vice President Cheney giving a eulogy — critics tried to figure out whose funeral it was), but the actual assassination is a quick, blurry sequence reminiscent of the 1981 attempt on President Reagan.

Range says he used Photoshop, but the camera only fleetingly shows the president's face. The film is not, as the talk-radio world chattered last week, the work of fringe liberal Democrats having a wish-fulfillment fantasy. Range has given similar treatment to the collapse of the British transit system in a future-past 2003 doc called The Day Britain Stopped.

Death of a President flashes forward to a time after the administration has fictionally introduced Patriot Act 3, further expanding the power of government into the judicial process, which is seen as corrupted by the political need to blame Middle East enemies such as Syria. A Syrian immigrant is wrongly accused of the crime.

The movie didn't score any huge critical success here. The consensus seemed to be that the political conclusions — that American politics drives truth out the window — didn't seem to be worth the artistic effort to pump up the volume.

"They handled the assassination sequence well and not exploitively," says Todd McCarthy, film critic at Variety, who challenged Range after the screening for having too narrow of a focus on the future course of things.

"It's not as controversial as it could be," says Norman Wilner, who writes for the Toronto Metro weekly newspaper.

The point of all this specificity by Range and co-writer/producer Simon Finch is to make it seem real enough to audiences to get and keep their attention. "In order for what has affected us in the last five years to come across as realistic, it was important that George Bush be the president," Range told the packed 387-seat house at the downtown Paramount multiplex. "If we'd have used a fictional president, audience reaction would be completely different — like watching 24 or The Sentinel. This feels authentic."

Festival co-executive director Piers Handling agreed, saying: "It's just part of the cinema landscape now, that increasingly people want the immediacy of real experience, real information, and the simulation of that 'reality.' Otherwise, it all feels removed at a time when audiences are saying, 'Whatever it is, give us reality and let us deal with it.' "

Handling said showing the film "has had no adverse impact on us as a festival."

Toronto chief programmer Noah Cowan, who booked the film, says awareness of it has "launched like a bullet on the international scene. Why wouldn't we book it? It's a completely innovative and creative construction of the way images can be used — which is precisely the conversation we should be having at a film festival."

The auditorium was silent during the film while viewers tried to follow the stream of political and forensic jargon. Audience response at the end was an unsure round of applause.

The Republican Collapse May Not Be So Imminent (NYT)

By Michiko Kakutani

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Despite lots of talk about President Bush's dismal poll numbers, corruption scandals involving Tom DeLay and Jack Abramoff and the toll that the war in Iraq and the administration's mishandling of Hurricane Katrina may take on the Republican Party in this fall's midterm elections, the veteran political reporter Thomas B. Edsall has some bad news for Democrats. While such developments "may take the G.O.P. down in individual elections," he writes in "Building Red America," the Republican Party

"holds a set of advantages, some substantial and some marginal," that have enabled it to "eke out victory by slim margins in a majority of closely contested elections" and that will probably give it an edge in the foreseeable future.

For that matter, neither party is likely to be happy with the findings of this provocative though in many ways familiar book. Mr. Edsall, who covered national politics for The Washington Post from 1981 to 2006, accuses the Republicans of using their closely contested victories to advance a conservative agenda that "does not have the decisive support of the people," of further polarizing the electorate and cynically forcing it "to pick between extremes," and of using "the slimmest of political margins" to try "to remake America — as well as America's role in the world."

As for Democrats, he depicts them as hapless, unfocused and reeling from self-inflicted wounds. He contends that "the social-issue left overwhelmingly sets the agenda of the Democratic Party," often to the detriment of its candidates in general elections. He takes the party to task for its "lack of credible policies" in the areas of globalization and education. (He curiously has little to say about its internal schisms over foreign policy and national security.)

And he argues that "Democrats and liberals have shown little interest in maintaining and sustaining institutions designed to produce majorities in Congress and to win the White House." He says that progressives tend to make project-specific grants instead of building party infrastructure and that "the mainstay organizations of the left," which were created when liberals were in power, aim to influence "sympathetic decision makers," not "to wrest power from adversaries," as many of their counterparts on the right so aggressively do.

Unless the Democratic Party makes fundamental changes in its structure, tactical operations and long-range strategic planning, he writes, the odds are that the Republicans "will continue to maintain, over the long term, a thin but durable margin of victory."

Certainly Mr. Edsall has been wrong in the past: only a year before Bill Clinton captured the White House, he said in his 1991 book, "Chain Reaction" (written with Mary D. Edsall), that the Democratic Party was "in danger of losing its stature as a major competitor in national politics."

And his new book is hardly without flaws: his zeal to make larger points about the two parties can lead to some gross generalizations and to his glossing over potentially significant divisions within the Republican Party between libertarians and cultural conservatives, between deficit hawks and big spenders, between practitioners of old-fashioned realpolitik and neo-conservative advocates of the Iraq war.

Many of the observations made in this book have been made before by journalists and political strategists, but Mr. Edsall does a nimble job of pulling them together to form a coherent picture, buttressing his assessments with lots of demographic and polling data and situating them in a historical context.

While building upon ideas he originally set out in "Chain Reaction," Mr. Edsall also grapples with more recent arguments made by writers like Thomas Frank ("What's the Matter With Kansas?"); Kevin Phillips ("American Theocracy" and "Wealth and Democracy," as well as the classic "Emerging Republican Majority"); Jacob S. Hacker and Paul Pierson ("Off Center: The Republican Revolution and the Erosion of American Democracy"); and John Micklethwait and Adrian Wooldridge ("The Right Nation").

Clearly, some of Mr. Edsall's conclusions are bound to be debated. He contests the suggestion — advanced by Mr. Frank, among others — that the Democrats would help their cause by embracing an old-fashioned economic populism, asserting that the ideological and economic bifurcation of the party (with an affluent, college-educated elite on one end and many low-income voters on the other) does not lend itself to populist appeals.

In contrast to Mr. Micklethwait and Mr. Wooldridge, who have argued that "the center of gravity in American politics has moved to the right" and that America is truly "in the thrall of the Right Nation," Mr. Edsall contends that the Republican Party "has not achieved a political realignment" but has simply tried to impose a deeply conservative agenda on the country "without clear majoritarian public support."

As Mr. Edsall sees it, growing political polarization in the United States, the rise of the conservative movement and the recent successes of the Republican Party can best be understood in the context of two revolutions that have changed American society over the last four decades: a social and cultural revolution "driven by a commitment to equality and the extension of rights to previously marginalized groups," and a technological and economic revolution that has altered the job market and business models and expectations.

These revolutions, Mr. Edsall writes, have created "two roughly equal partisan coalitions, one on the left, the other on the right," and in an effort to assemble a winning political majority, he argues, the Republican Party "has tapped into and capitalized on the sense of dislocation and conflict generated by rapid cultural modernization among many middle- and working-class voters." In his opinion, it has done so largely by using wedge issues like abortion and gay marriage, which push voters' "anger points" and motivate the base.

Securing the base, Mr. Edsall argues, became a central Republican strategy, especially after Mr. Bush's chief pollster, Matt Dowd, sent a memo to Karl Rove, the Republican mastermind, in the wake of the highly contested 2000 presidential vote. The memo — which declared that the center of the electorate had collapsed, that true swing voters made up a mere 6 percent of the electorate — destroyed, in Mr. Edsall's words, "the rationale for Bush to govern as 'a uniter, not a divider,' " as he had promised. Instead, it "freed Bush to discard centrist strategies" and promote "polarizing policies designed explicitly to appeal to the conservative Republican core."

Mr. Dowd's finding that "you can lose the swing voters and still win the election, if you make sure your base is bigger than theirs," says Mr. Edsall, decisively affected the Bush administration's policy making on matters ranging from tax cuts to the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

Mr. Edsall adds that trend lines suggest that "in America today, the G.O.P. has bested the Democratic Party in the symbolic manipulation of controversial sociocultural issues touching upon national security, patriotism, race, sex and religion," and that an array of demographic developments — including a "geographic distribution of voters" that gives the Republican Party "a strong, built-in advantage in the competition for control of the House and Senate" — has further enhanced the party's advantages.

Do the Democrats possess any advantages? Mr. Edsall cites a surge in small contributions to Democrats through online credit card donations in 2004 and the party's ability to capitalize on the Web, growth in certain constituencies (like Hispanic voters) that traditionally have favored the Democratic Party and an unwillingness on the part of a growing number of younger women to relinquish their "sexual autonomy."

His long-term outlook, however, points less to any signs of a Democratic resurgence than to what he sees as the Republican Party's philosophical shortcomings. "The protective stance of Republicans toward the rich and the dominant," he writes, "and the acquiescence to a morally and intellectually repressive social agenda are too much at odds with the American egalitarian ethic to achieve the overwhelming strength of the Democratic coalition of the New Deal era."

His conclusion: "Politics functions as a market, and the political marketplace is now significantly out of balance — it is in disequilibrium. If political parties were corporations, the political market would be viewed as territory ripe for takeover or for the entry of an outside competitor."

3 Killed Outside U.S. Embassy In Syria (AP-Y)

By Albert Aji, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

Gunmen apparently blew up a car outside the U.S. Embassy and exchanged fire with Syrian guards on Tuesday in a brazen attack on Damascus' diplomatic neighborhood. Syrian security forces killed three of the attackers, the government said.

The Interior Ministry, which is in charge of police, said a fourth assailant was wounded in what it called a "terrorist attack." The report, carried on state-run television, said an investigation was under way.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman confirmed the attack on the American Embassy by "unknown assailants" and said the event appears to be over.

"Local authorities have responded and are on the scene," spokesman Kurtis Cooper said. He said he had no further information.

A Syrian who works at the U.S. Embassy said there were no American casualities.

Rice Indicates Slight Shift In Stance On Iran Sanctions (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

DOJ_NMG_0061696

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

PICTOU, Canada, Sept. 11 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in an ever-so-slight softening of America's stance, on Monday left open the possibility that the United States might suspend efforts to impose sanctions against Iran if it suspended uranium enrichment for two months.

"First of all, it would have to be suspension — verified suspension," Ms. Rice said. "Secondly, it's suspension for suspension. We've said that if they suspend," the United States would in turn halt its pursuit of United Nations sanctions against Iran and would join European talks with Tehran over its nuclear program.

Ms. Rice, who said Monday that she had spoken with the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, about his continuing talks with Mr. Larijani, also urged caution. "As far as I know, the Iranians have not said that they would suspend prior to negotiations, which is what the issue has been," she said.

Mr. Solana said Sunday that he made progress in the search for a compromise with Iran, and added that he and Mr. Larijani would meet again soon.

The United States has long contended that Iran is stalling for time to develop what American officials say is a nuclear weapons capacity. Iran says its nuclear program is only to produce energy for civilian use.

Ms. Rice, speaking to reporters aboard a flight to Halifax, said that "the time is coming very soon when we'll have to vote on a Security Council resolution" about Iran. But, she added, "From our point of view we have nothing to lose, as we work toward this Security Council resolution, having Javier Solana explore with the Iranians whether there's a way to get to negotiations."

In Canada for ceremonies to mark Sept. 11, Ms. Rice thanked the nation for opening its airports to United States-bound flights on that day and honored Canadian victims of the attacks.

Much of the language regarding Iran is nuance. The formal proposal made earlier this summer by the United States and Europe to Iran — to suspend its enrichment activities in exchange for a package of incentives or face sanctions — does not require a permanent suspension.

Indeed, the proposal even includes an offer that one senior Bush administration official characterized at the time as the "when hell freezes over" clause: that Iran, after it has satisfied regulatory bodies that its nuclear ambitions are peaceful, might at some point in the future be allowed to enrich uranium on its own soil. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue.

But the Bush administration has long made clear that what it wants is a permanent suspension. While that remains so, the coalition of six countries that made the offer to Iran is fragile, with Russia and China far less agreeable to the idea of sanctions against Iran than the United States and its European allies, Britain, France and Germany.

In order to keep Russia and China on board, Ms. Rice has taken pains to try to present the United States as taking a reasonable position and being willing to work with the Iranians. But the Americans have insisted all along on one non-negotiable demand: that Iran must suspend its enrichment activities.

The apparent shift in the American stance also reflects the hard realities that there are few good options on Iran, even if the Bush administration is able to get Russia and China to sign on to sanctions. Iran defied an Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations Security Council to halt production of nuclear fuel.

The United States is trying to get Russia and China, along with the European Union, to impose sanctions through the Security Council, beginning with restrictions on imports of nuclear-related equipment and material. Eventually, punitive measures might expand to restrict travel by Iran's leaders and limit Iran's access to global financial markets.

But few diplomats believe that Russia and China will agree to more than weak sanctions, and Ms. Rice must calculate whether the coalition will remain intact. If it does not, the United States could be left facing the possibility of further conflict in the Middle East at a time when it is still grappling with the Iraq war.

A nonproliferation analyst, speaking anonymously because he has not yet had time to review all the implications, said that part of the apparent new willingness by the United States to consider a temporary suspension might reflect the need to seize on any possible daylight with a country that has been an adversary since its Islamic revolution in 1979.

Rice Leaves Door Open For Dealing With Iran (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice did not rule out accepting what may be a new opening from Iran to bargain with the West over its disputed nuclear program, but she predicted Monday that United Nations sanctions would follow "if this does not work out."

Iran has told diplomats it may be willing to shelve its uranium-enrichment program temporarily, perhaps for two months, during negotiations with the United States and other world powers over the future and scope of the Islamic republic's nuclear program.

Rice said Iran has not put a formal offer on the table, but she did not reject the idea of beginning talks framed by an Iranian deadline. "The question is: Are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin? … Nobody is going to become accustomed to a nuclear-armed Iran; that's why we're on this course," Rice said.

The United States has led the drive for the U.N. Security Council to impose economic or other sanctions if Iran does not halt its nuclear program. Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to stop enriching uranium.

Uranium enrichment can lead to fuel for nuclear power reactors or for weapons. The United States accuses Iran of secretly trying to build a nuclear weapon. Iran says its program is to produce electricity.

House panel to take up tribunal bill

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., has drafted a bill largely along the lines of the Bush administration's plan to create military commissions to prosecute terrorism suspects. The bill he will ask the committee to approve Wednesday includes a provision that would allow judges to bar defendants from access to some evidence. The commission judges would be told they should determine what weight to give to any evidence that is withheld from the defendant.

Hunter's version is at odds with legislation that Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., and some of his Senate colleagues have drafted. Their bill would ensure that a defendant be allowed access to all evidence.

Hunter's proposal includes other slight deviations from the administration's proposal, including a requirement that no fewer than nine members of a commission be present in a case involving a potential death sentence. The administration's plan would allow five members to deliver a death sentence in certain cases. Hunter's bill also says the administration could convene commissions only in the cases of "alien illegal enemy combatants." The administration's plan would allow a broader range of terrorism cases.

Rice Open To Talks On Nuke Program (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left the door open yesterday for consideration of a possible a new offer from Iran to bargain with the West over Tehran's disputed nuclear program.

Still, she predicted U.N. sanctions would follow "if this does not work out."

Iran has told diplomats it may be willing to shelve its uranium-enrichment program temporarily, perhaps for two months, during negotiations with the United States and other powers over the future and scope of a nuclear program that Iran insists is peaceful. The Bush administration accuses Iran of hiding ambitions to build nuclear weapons.

Miss Rice said Iran has not put a formal offer on the table, but she did not reject the idea of beginning talks framed by a deadline.

"As to time limitations, I haven't heard any Iranian offer, so I don't know what to make of that," she said. "But the question is, are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin?"

"Our clock would be running, too," she told reporters aboard her plane.

Miss Rice was in Canada to thank Canadians for helping thousands of Americans stranded when their international flights were diverted on September 11 five years ago.

The United States has led a drive to ask the U.N. Security Council to impose economic or other sanctions if Iran does not roll back its nuclear program. Iran let pass without action an Aug. 31 deadline to stop uranium enrichment.

Such enrichment can lead either to fuel for nuclear-power reactors or for weapons. International inspectors have been unable to determine whether Iran's program, begun in secret two decades ago, is intended only to produce electricity, as Iran has claimed.

Iran has said it will not give up what it calls its right to the full range of nuclear technology and expertise, and has been wary of even a temporary pause in its development program.

The West, and the United States in particular, says a pause is essential to prevent Tehran from gaining ground toward a weapon if that is its hidden aim. Iran did suspend its uranium activities during two years of negotiations with European nations that fell apart last year without a deal. Tehran claims that, with a suspension, there is no incentive for the West to cut a deal.

The latest Western offer, with the added inducement of face-to-face talks with the United States, would give trade, aid and political benefits to Iran if it scaled back its program and answered the West's concerns. Iran would still be able to develop civilian nuclear power.

"Nobody is going to become accustomed to a nuclear-armed Iran, that's why we're on this course," Miss Rice said.

She predicted, as other Bush administration figures have, that the Security Council would gradually ratchet up economic or political sanctions. The step-by-step approach is meant to offer Iran a way out as the pressure increases.

"I'm quite certain that you're going to see, if this does not work out, you're going to see sanctions, and that those will be commensurate with Iranian behavior," the top U.S. diplomat said.

The United States has had no diplomatic and few commercial or other ties with Iran since the 1979 storming of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The diplomatic coalition against Iran has appeared ragged at times, but has so far held together. The issue may finally be at a turning point if the Security Council takes up sanctions, a step that two of the council's veto-holding members have publicly said they oppose.

Brief Nuclear Halt May Lead To Talks With Iran (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice signaled yesterday that a temporary suspension of Iran's nuclear programs might be enough to pave the way for the first direct negotiations involving the United States and Iran in more than a quarter-century.

Speaking to reporters as she flew to Halifax, Nova Scotia, Rice said Iran needs to suspend uranium-enrichment activities before talks can begin, but she did not rule out something less than a permanent suspension. In talks over the weekend between Iranian and European officials, the chief Iranian negotiator offered a two-month freeze at the start of the talks.

"The point is, there would have to be a suspension," Rice said when asked about Iran's proposal. "If there is a suspension, we can have discussions, but there has to be a suspension. As far as I know, the Iranians have not yet said that they would suspend prior to negotiations."

Rice said she has not "heard any Iranian offer, so I don't know what to make of that," adding: "But the question is: Are they prepared to suspend, verifiably, so that negotiations can begin? That's the issue."

Rice's comments followed a round of private calls she had in the past day with European counterparts and came after positive meetings between European and Iranian officials. Two days of talks in Vienna between Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, and Javier Solana of the European Union went well, and both sides said they will meet again Thursday, according to diplomats from both sides who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the negotiations.

"First of all, it's suspension, verified suspension -- that's the condition," Rice said. "Secondly, it's suspension for suspension," she said, meaning that if Iran freezes its program, then the United States and its allies would halt a push for U.N. sanctions.

France, Britain and Germany have committed to push for sanctions against Iran if it does not halt its uranium-enrichment program, but the Europeans are also eager to find a route to negotiations. Other members of the European Union have strongly supported talks, rather than punitive measures, noting that Iran's technical progress on its nuclear program has been marginal while its position as a major oil exporter leaves it with significant leverage to batter European economies. Japan, which has billions of dollars' worth of investments in Iran's oil and gas industry, has been reluctant to back sanctions.

But all parties, including Russia and China -- two of Iran's closest economic partners -- have publicly said that Tehran must suspend its nuclear program for talks to begin.

Iran quit negotiations with the Europeans a year ago and restarted its nuclear program. In an effort to coax Iran back to the negotiating table, Rice announced in May that the United States would join the talks if Iran suspended its program again. The United States and its partners offered Iran the prospect of economic incentives if negotiations are successful -- or an escalating series of sanctions if the talks fail.

The Institute for Science and International Security, a nonpartisan think tank in Washington, yesterday posted a copy of Iran's confidential 21-page response to the offer of incentives that was officially conveyed in June.

David Albright, president of ISIS, said the document is tough to grasp and sometimes contradictory, but that there are positive elements, including a willingness to discuss suspension of uranium enrichment, even as Iran rejected the right of the U.N. Security Council to order a halt to enrichment activities. "This is not a hollow offer by the Iranians," he said -- adding, however, that "you just get mad reading this thing."

Iran, in its response, indicated willingness to comply with a Security Council obligation to freeze the program as long as it is not a precondition for talks. The Vienna meetings are aimed at finding face-saving ways out of the staunch positions all sides have taken while facilitating a path toward negotiations, officials said.

Rice spoke by telephone with Solana and with Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency overseeing a probe of Iran's nuclear program. Agency inspectors, in their fourth year of investigation, have not found proof of a weapons program but have also been unable to verify Iran's assertion that the enrichment program is strictly for energy production.

Rice reiterated yesterday that if the talks do not materialize, the United States will push for sanctions. "Our clock would be running, too," she said. "Nobody is going to become accustomed to a nuclear-armed Iran. That's why we're on this course."

Iran Closes Down 2 Opposition Newspapers (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, September 12, 2006

Iran closed down two opposition newspapers on Monday, one of which had recently poked fun at hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the way his government has handled nuclear talks with the West.

It was a fresh show of determination by Iran's ruling clerical establishment to silence dissent over its handling of nuclear talks with the West and deny reformers a chance to air their views ahead of elections scheduled for Dec. 15.

The rights group Reporters Without Borders voiced concern last week about harassment of Iranian journalists, including prison sentences and interrogations. Ahmadinejad has purged dozens of journalists, university professors and government officials seen as supporting warmer ties with the West.

Iran's most prominent reformist daily, Shargh, or East, ran a cartoon Thursday depicting a horse and donkey facing each other on a chess board. The donkey — a symbol of ignorance in Iranian culture — has his mouth open and light around him, while the horse shows no emotion.

Iranian judiciary officials apparently took the donkey to represent Iran in nuclear negotiations with the West, journalists said.

Ahmadinejad reportedly said he felt there was a light around him, and that world leaders focused unblinkingly on him when he addressed the U.N. General Assembly last year. Ahmadinejad is reportedly planning to address the assembly again later this month.

"We got a call from the Press Supervisory Board saying that we have no right to publish our newspaper as of today," Shargh editor Mohammad Ghouchani told The Associated Press.

Iran's official news agency reported the paper was ordered closed down for "dozens of violations," including the cartoon's publication and "publication of material against the rulings by the Supreme National Security Council." The council handles Iran's nuclear negotiations with the West.

"In recent months, nuclear officials have been warning the press to be careful over what they publish over Iran's nuclear policy and not write anything that contradicts what they do," reformist lawmaker Esmaeil Gerami Moghadam told the AP.

State-run television said Shargh was shut because it failed to appoint a new managing director to "more aggressively supervise material published in the paper."

The current managing director, Mahdi Rahmanian, denounced such a demand.

"Pressure on the press to change their managing director is illegal. The law doesn't allow the board to make such a demand," he said.

The Press Supervisory Board also ordered the political monthly Nameh, or Letter, to be closed down, IRNA reported Monday.

The paper's editor, Majid Tavallaei, said the reason behind the closure was the publication of a poem from dissident female poet Simin Behbahani. The text of the poem was not immediately available.

"Publication of the poem is seen as the main reason for the closure. They have taken that as an insult," Tavallaei said.

Echoing the rhetoric of the nation's 1979 Islamic revolution, Ahmadinejad appears determined to remake Iran by reviving the fundamentalist goals pursued under the republic's late founder, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Upon taking office last year, Ahmadinejad replaced nearly all his country's governors and lower provincial officials, as well as 40 ambassadors. Many of Iran's top government officials are now either former commanders of the elite Revolutionary Guards or former hard-line security officials.

Last week, he urged students to push for a purge of liberal, secular university teachers, and dozens of such instructors have been sent into early retirement during Ahmadinejad's rule.

Ahmadinejad and supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei both appear on a list of "press freedom predators" compiled by Reporters Without Borders each year.

Iran saw a wave of newspaper closures in past years amid a confrontation between reformers and hard-liners during the 1997-2005 tenure of reformist President Mohammad Khatami.

The hard-line judiciary shut down more than 100 pro-reform newspapers and jailed dozens of editors and writers on vague charges of insulting authorities.

But Moghadam said the new wave of press crackdown meant no tolerance for criticism ahead of upcoming elections.

"It is a clear message that they don't tolerate any voice of opposition. They also don't want reformers to convey their message through Shargh to the people ahead of the elections," he said.

Iran is preparing to hold elections for the Assembly of Experts, a clerical panel that has the authority to choose or dismiss Iran's top leader, and city council elections. Both are slated for Dec. 15.

Iran Shuts Top Reformist Paper, Citing Cartoon Seen As An Insult (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

TEHRAN, Sept. 11 — Iran's conservative press watchdog shut down four publications on Monday, including a major reformist newspaper.

The reformist daily, called Shargh, or East, was shut down indefinitely because the newspaper had refused to replace its director and because it published a cartoon in a recent edition that was considered insulting to the government, state-run television said, citing a statement from the press monitoring agency.

"Shargh was banned and referred to the court because of its frequent violations and refusing to make amends in the past month, especially an insulting cartoon in a recent edition," the statement said.

The statement said that the press agency had issued 70 warnings to the popular newspaper, which has a circulation of 100,000, and had ordered it to replace its managing director, which it had not done.

The cartoon published Thursday showed two chess pieces, a white knight facing an angry black donkey, a symbol of ignorance in Iran, on a checkered board. Journalists working at the newspaper said the cartoonist had tried to make the black donkey clearer on the checkered board by making the area around it whiter.

The cartoon was believed to be a reference to Iran's negotiations over its nuclear program, The Associated Press said, and an insult to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

He had been reported to have said that he felt in the spotlight with world leaders focusing unblinkingly on him when he addressed the United Nations General Assembly last year.

The political monthly Nameh, or Letter, was also shut down Monday, the news agency ISNA reported, but no reason was announced. The journal was published by religious nationalistic opposition groups.

The press agency also revoked permits for two other journals, Hafez and Khatereh. Hafez was a literary and historical monthly that had published articles about a former monarch of Iran.

"It seems that the government is limiting the freedom at home as the international pressure is increasing on Iran over its nuclear program," said Mohsen Kadivar, a dissident cleric and an Islamic philosopher in Tehran. "Now that the threat of sanctions looms, the government does not want to hear any protest at home."

The government shut down the daily newspaper Iran in May and jailed two of its journalists after it published a cartoon that Iranian ethnic Azeris said had mocked them.

More than a hundred newspapers and journals were shut down in previous years by the conservative judiciary. But the press has come under even stronger pressure since Mr. Ahmadinejad's election a year ago. Last month, a government spokesman, Gholamhossein Elham, was reported to have sent a letter to the public prosecutor calling on him to act against newspapers that publish accusations against the government.

In addition to the crackdown on the press, two political prisoners have died recently.

One prisoner, Valiollah Feyz Mahdavi, hanged himself last Wednesday, the government said. He had been sentenced to death on charges that he had ties to an armed opposition group in exile, the Mujahedeen Khalq. Mr. Mahdavi's death sentence had recently been upheld by a supreme court.

Another political prisoner, Akbar Mohammadi, died in jail on July 30, after a hunger strike protesting prison conditions.

Human Rights Watch warned last week that the health and safety of Iranian political prisoners was in grave danger and called on the government to appoint an independent commission of Iranian lawyers and doctors to investigate the recent deaths.

Iranian Newspaper Ordered Closed After Publishing Cartoon (LAT)

By Babak Pirouz

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

TEHRAN — Press authorities on Monday ordered the temporary closure of Shargh, Iran's leading reformist newspaper, just days after the publication printed a cartoon that appeared to lampoon Iranian nuclear negotiations.

In a letter to the paper's managing director, the Press Supervisory Board ordered the shutdown "for publishing articles insulting to religious, political and national figures, and fomenting discord."

The board also cited the publication's failure to comply with an earlier order to replace its managing editor, and about 70 previous warnings for violations of the press law in recent years.

Shargh, published by allies of former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, is the most widely read newspaper critical of the government and is one of the few reformist publications operating as the government increasingly cracks down on dissent.

A second opposition publication, the political monthly Nameh, also has been closed in recent days, reportedly for publishing a poem by dissident female poet Simin Behbahani, the Islamic Republic News Agency reported Monday.

The orders are the latest in what appears to be the beginning of a crackdown against reform-minded publications and journalists under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that also has resulted in the arrest of high-profile dissidents and the purging of dozens of liberal, secular professors from the nation's universities.

Journalists over the last two months have been sentenced to prison terms ranging from six months to four years for offenses that included "propaganda against the regime" and "insulting" Iran's supreme religious leader.

"By its recent actions, the government is now trying to control the way the news is produced, distributed and received," said Mashallah Shamsolvaezin, a spokesman for the Iranian Committee for the Defense of Freedom of the Press and editor of a number of reformist newspapers shut down by the judiciary.

The press board said it had warned the publishers of Shargh, which had been shut down for a week in February 2004 over similar charges, to appoint a new managing editor and halt its publication of material "insulting officials, religious and national figures."

The most recent purported violation was the publication Thursday of a cartoon titled "The Other Rule for Playing the Game," which depicted a horse and a donkey on a chessboard. A white halo appears around the donkey, an apparent reference to reports in several reformist papers that Ahmadinejad said he had been told that witnesses to his address at the United Nations last year had seen a halo of light around him. The president denied making the statement.

The board has referred the newspaper's case to the courts for trial. Mehdi Rahmanian, the managing editor, has vowed to appeal the closure.

Recent actions by the government seem to point to new restrictions for the press. In August, the government spokesperson wrote a letter to the judiciary demanding action against those spreading "falsehoods" about the government. Last week, the Ministry of Islamic Culture and Guidance published restrictions barring the use of most reformist websites as sources.

Proxy Terrorism From Iran (LAT)

By Natan Sharansky

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

IN THE SUMMER of 2000, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin told me a story that I have been unable to get out of my mind. We were meeting in the Kremlin, and I raised the grave danger facing the world from the transfer of missile technology and nuclear material to the Iranians. In Putin's view, however, the real danger came not from an Iranian nuclear-tipped missile or, for that matter, from the lethal arsenal of any nation-state.

"Imagine a sunny and beautiful day in a suburb of Manhattan," he said. "An elderly man is tending to the roses in his small garden with his nephew visiting from Europe. Life seems perfectly normal. The following day, the nephew, carrying a suitcase, takes a train to Manhattan. Inside the suitcase is a nuclear bomb."

The threat, Putin explained to me a year before 9/11, was not from this or that country but from their terrorist proxies — aided and supported quietly by a sovereign state that doesn't want to get its hands dirty — who will perpetrate their attacks without a return address. This scenario became real when Al Qaeda plotted its 9/11 attacks from within Afghanistan and received support from the Taliban government. Then it happened again this summer, when Iran was allowed to wage a proxy war through Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and northern Israel. But this time, the international community's weak response dealt the global war on terror a severe blow.

Five years ago, after 9/11, such a lack of culpability seemed inconceivable. That was when President Bush abandoned the conventional approach to fighting terror by vowing that the United States would henceforth make no distinction between terrorists and regimes that support them. You are either with us or you are with the terrorists.

In the pre-9/11 world, regimes were rarely held responsible for the actions of terror groups. Now the Taliban regime was being held accountable.

This was critically important for two reasons. First, it recognized that international terrorism relies on the support of sovereign states. It is regimes, after all, that give terror groups territory on which to train, arm and indoctrinate their members, and regimes that provide them critical financial, diplomatic, logistical and intelligence support.

Second, although shadowy terror cells are difficult to eradicate fully and suicidal fanatics impossible to deter, the regimes that support terror groups do have a return address and are rarely suicidal. Thus, holding the Taliban responsible for the actions of Al Qaeda, and elevating the logic for doing so to a central principle in the war on terror, greatly enhanced deterrence. Every single regime was immediately put on notice.

Fast forward five years. Hezbollah launches an unprovoked attack on Israel. It is clear that Hezbollah is a proxy of Iran. It is public knowledge that Hezbollah receives more than $100 million a year from the Iranian regime, as well as sophisticated weapons and training.

Yet Iran has paid no price for its proxy's actions. No military strikes on Iranian targets, no sanctions, no threat whatsoever to Iranian interests. On the contrary, in the wake of the war, there have been renewed calls in the democratic world to "engage" Iran.

Symptomatic of the moral myopia in the West is a farce worthy of Orwell: Former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami, under whom students were tortured after a 1999 crackdown at Tehran University and whose rule was marked by the continued stifling of dissent, spoke Sunday at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government on "Ethics of Tolerance in the Age of Violence."

The Iranian regime's intentions are clear. It calls for "wiping Israel off the map" and tells its followers to "imagine a world without America." It seeks to dominate the Middle East. By failing to hold Iran accountable for its brazen support of Hezbollah, the free world has undermined a central pillar in the war on terror and given the Iranian regime a huge weapon for achieving its ambitions. Now the mullahs know they can attack a democratic country with impunity.

Considering the apocalyptic fanaticism of Iran's leader, it is an open question whether the current regime in Tehran is capable of being deterred through the threat of mutually assured destruction. But given how the world has responded to Hezbollah, the point may be academic. For surely Iran would be better served by using proxies to wage a nuclear war against Israel. And if there is no accountability, why stop with Israel?

The road to a suitcase bomb in Tel Aviv, Paris or New York just got a whole lot shorter.

Starting Another War (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

It is quite possible that President Bush will bomb Iran's nuclear installations over the next couple of years.

Let's hope he looks at how Israel shot itself in the foot in Lebanon this summer and resists the siren calls of neocons who claim that a few air raids would make the Iranian nuclear menace disappear.

The argument Mr. Bush is hearing in favor of an airstrike is pretty simple: Iran is a terrorist regime that has sponsored attacks on Americans and on Jews (as far away as Argentina). The president of Iran is a hard-liner who has used language that, while subject to debate among Farsi speakers, may mean that his aim is to wipe Israel off the map.

A nuclear Iran would also have a devastating ripple effect around the region: Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Turkey might go nuclear as well. And considering how reckless Iran's foreign policy has already been, imagine if it felt emboldened with a nuclear weapon.

Moreover, if Mr. Bush doesn't strike Iran, there's a good chance that Israel will — and the U.S. would still get blamed (partly because the Israeli planes would fly through American-controlled airspace over Iraq).

So if the U.S. is going to get the blame either way, why not do it right, with a combination of American bombers and cruise missiles destroying Iranian nuclear sites in Natanz, Isfahan, Arak and perhaps Bushehr? A successful strike would have to destroy not only buildings but also kill the scientists involved; this is one military strike that would surely occur during working hours.

That's the argument. But Iran's leaders are probably praying for such a strike; it may be the only way that they can stay in power for more than another decade.

I've never been in a country where the government is so unpopular as in Iran, with the possible exception of Burma. The government is so corrupt, tyrannical and incompetent that it will eventually collapse — unless we attack its nuclear sites and trigger a nationalistic surge of support for the regime.

We Americans are still paying the price for our involvement in the 1953 overthrow of the elected Iranian government of Mohammed Mossadegh; if we bomb Iran, we may cement the mullahs in power for another 50 years.

Moreover, the military options are wretched, partly because Iran is probably doing much of its work at sites we can't destroy because we don't know where they are. The Natanz site for now is an empty room. We might kill Russian technicians at Bushehr or elsewhere, and Iran might retaliate with terror attacks aimed at us (counterterrorism experts suspect that Iran has sleeper agents in the U.S. whom it could activate).

A military strike would also do nothing more than buy time. Ashton Carter, a former senior Pentagon official who has studied the possibility of a strike and considers it feasible (but unwise at this time), estimates that a one-time strike would delay Iran's nuclear weapon at most three or four years. The U.S. could then go back and hit the sites again, but Iran presumably would hide the locations, so later strikes would be less effective.

Dov Zakheim, who was under secretary of defense in Mr. Bush's first term, recalls that fears of Pakistan's "Islamic bomb" proved exaggerated and notes that Iran doesn't treat its 20,000 Jews as wretchedly as its rhetoric would suggest (Iran continues to be home to more Jews than any Middle Eastern country save Israel). Mr. Zakheim argues that the best way to protect Israel is to give Israel improved missile defense capabilities on the understanding that it not launch a first strike against Iran.

As for alternatives to bombs, the best option is more of the carrot-and-stick diplomacy that the West is already engaging in (including direct Iran-U.S. talks) — and keeping International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors in Iran to uncover the hidden sites. Few experts expect Iran to give up its nuclear program altogether, but it's likely that Iran could be persuaded to adopt a Japanese model: develop its capacity to the point that a bomb could be completed in weeks or months, but without testing or stockpiling weapons.

Granted, expert reassurances are easier to accept if you live in New York than in Tel Aviv, and the consequences of being wrong would be horrific. But however one judges the risks, the one thing we should have learned from Iraq and Lebanon is that military "solutions" can leave us worse off than before.

Abbas Agrees To Share Power With Hamas (AP)

By Diaa Hadid

AP, September 12, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas struck a deal Monday to share power with the militant Islamic Hamas, an accord that could restore international aid and could lead to contacts with Israel.

The breakthrough compromise falls short of international demands that Hamas fully renounce violence, but Israeli officials still voiced cautious support for the accord.

Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction, swept to victory in January legislative elections, defeating Fatah, and formed a government by itself. The West and Israel reacted by cutting off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, accusing Hamas of being a terrorist group.

Initially, Palestinians held the West and Israel to blame for their misfortune, but in recent weeks, they have directed that criticism at the government. Tens of thousands of civil servants launched a strike this month to protest the government's failure to pay them. A two-month Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip — begun after Hamas-linked militants infiltrated Israel and captured a soldier — has added to the Palestinians' misery.

After months of on-and-off talks, Abbas, the moderate Fatah leader, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas announced the accord Monday.

"The continuous efforts to form a national unity government have ended successfully with the announcement of a political program for this government," Abbas told Palestinian television. "Efforts in the next few days will continue to complete the formation of the national unity government."

Abbas aide Nabil Abu Rdeneh said the president would dissolve the Hamas-led government within 48 hours to clear the way for the formation of a coalition.

Haniyeh, who said earlier that he would retain his post in the new government, confirmed the two parties planned to rule together.

"I bring good news to the Palestinian people, and I feel proud and content that at this important moment we establish a national coalition government," Haniyeh said.

Both Fatah and Hamas officials said their deal was based on a proposal — formulated last spring by prominent prisoners held by Israel — that many have interpreted to imply recognition of Israel.

That proposal calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel — effectively abandoning the Hamas goal of destroying the Jewish state — and accepts U.N. resolutions that call for compromise with Israel. Hamas also would allow Abbas to handle all dealings with Israel.

In addition, it also endorses a wider Arab plan seeking a comprehensive peace agreement with Israel. Arab allies of the U.S. are expected to present the plan to the U.N. Security Council this month.

Israel has been cool to the Arab plan, since it would require a withdrawal from all territories captured in the 1967 Mideast War, including east Jerusalem. Israel wants to adjust the borders to include some main Jewish settlements.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Israel would maintain its tough line with Hamas. "It doesn't matter what Palestinian government there may be, it must fulfill the three conditions" set by the international community, she said in Jerusalem. She was referring to the demands that Hamas renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept previous peace agreements.

She also said budding ties with Abbas could be in danger if Hamas does not comply. "Abu Mazen and Fatah cannot join a government that does not fulfill the conditions," she said, referring to Abbas. "If he does, I feel we will have a problem."

Prodded by visiting British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert both said they were prepared to hold their first working meeting.

In Beirut, Lebanon, a spokesman for Blair said the British leader regarded the Palestinian leaders' announcement as "potentially, a hugely significant statement."

Monday's agreement indicated that Hamas has finally buckled under the crushing international sanctions, imposed six months ago to pressure it to moderate. Without the vital international aid, the government was unable to pay salaries to its tens of thousands of civil servants. The government is the largest employer in the Palestinian areas, and the economic crisis caused widespread hardship.

"When we came to power, we wanted to achieve our Islamic program — to reduce people's suffering, to eliminate corruption, anarchy and lack of security, and of course, to find a resolution for the Palestinian issue," said Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas lawmaker. "Because of the embargo we faced, and its result on the Palestinian street, we couldn't achieve all of that."

A smaller Islamic militant group, Islamic Jihad, said it would not join the government, but spokesman Khader Habib said if a cease-fire with Israel is declared, "we will not sing out of tune."

Palestinian officials have been looking to Europe to lead the way in lifting the sanctions. European leaders have recently welcomed the Palestinian efforts to form a unity government.

Mouin Rabbani, an analyst with the International Crisis Group in Jordan, said Monday's agreement was a "positive signal" but by no means meets the requirements of the U.S. and the European Union.

While European countries have signaled they will reassess their policies toward a Palestinian national unity government, the signals are "far short of a formal policy commitment, and will be put to the test," he said.

Abbas And Hamas Agree To Coalition Government (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said today that his Fatah movement would join Hamas in a coalition government, a bid to quell factional clashes and persuade the West to halt an aid cutoff that has left the treasury broke.

The pact may help bring a measure of calm to the Gaza Strip and West Bank, easing protests by long-unpaid public workers and strife between the two parties' gunmen. However, it remained unclear whether a government reshuffle would go far enough to restart the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars in aid from foreign donors, including the United States.

Abbas announced the agreement after talks in Gaza City on Sunday with leaders of Hamas, the radical Islamist group that gained control of the Palestinian government after winning parliamentary elections in January. The U.S. and European Union cut off direct aid soon after because they classify Hamas as a terrorist group.

"The continued efforts to form a national unity government ended successfully by determining its political program," Abbas said in a statement posted by the official Wafa news agency.

Palestinian officials said Abbas would dissolve the Hamas government in the coming days and that a new governing coalition would be named, most likely under Hamas leadership but including other factions. Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman with Hamas, said the parties still needed to work out the makeup of the government.

"I am happy to bring our people the good news that we took into consideration the Palestinian people's supreme interests and the preservation of their rights," said Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, who is expected to lead the new government.

Details of the agreement were not released. A key unanswered question was whether the proposed government would satisfy the three conditions laid out by the so-called quartet of Middle East intermediaries — the U.S., the EU, Russia and United Nations — in order to resume the flow of aid. Those conditions are: recognizing Israel, halting violence and agreeing to honor past Israeli-Palestinians agreements.

Analysts said a government shake-up might be enough to get at least partial renewal of aid, such as from European donors.

Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, has steadfastly refused to recognize Israel explicitly and maintains that Palestinians have the right to resist the Israeli occupation with violence, if necessary. Hamas leaders had previously said they would honor past agreements only as long as they benefited the Palestinian people.

U.S. officials in Jerusalem said they were awaiting details on today's deal.

Israel officials reacted cautiously, saying they wanted to see whether the proposed unity government would expressly accept the three international conditions and win the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier taken captive by Gaza-based militants June 25. Since Hamas took power, Israel has withheld about $50 million a month in tax and customs revenues that it collects on behalf of the Palestinians under a long-standing economic agreement.

"If a future Palestinian government were to accept the three benchmarks and they were to bring about the immediate release of Gilad Shalit, that would create new momentum, re-energize the peace process and put the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue back on track," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry. "Anything short of that would, unfortunately, be a recipe for stagnation."

Ziad abu Amr, an independent Palestinian lawmaker who mediated the negotiations between Fatah and Hamas, said Hamas had agreed to accept past Arab peacemaking initiatives and U.N. resolutions on the conflict. By accepting these, the group could be seen as having recognized Israel implicitly.

Hamas spokesman Sami abu Zuhri said that Hamas had not changed its positions. "We have said that we will not recognize the legitimacy of the occupation," he said in Gaza.

But it is still possible that the unity government could recognize Israel. Abu Amr, in a telephone interview from Gaza, said it is significant that the agreement was acceptable to Abbas, who favors negotiations with Israel and has repeatedly urged Palestinian militants in Gaza to stop firing rockets across the border into Israeli towns.

"It meets with the satisfaction of the president, who is fully aware of what the world wants," he said.

Abu Amr said Abbas made it clear that the new government could not succeed unless militants halted the rocket attacks and release Shalit, who was taken into Gaza after his capture. Hamas fighters claimed partial responsibility for the raid.

Since late June, Israel has carried out on-again, off-again military operations in Gaza that have left more than 200 Palestinians dead and led to the arrest of more than two dozen Hamas legislators and Cabinet members in the West Bank .

The coalition pact announced today stemmed from a "reconciliation agreement" hammered out by the parties in June that accepted a unity government in principle but was vague in its wording about Israel.

Abbas, whose Fatah Party accepts Israel and a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict, has sought to persuade Hamas to moderate its positions. While Abbas is president, Hamas holds a parliamentary majority and thus controls the government.

Hamas' tenure has been marked by factional violence, grave economic shortages due to the aid cuts and the collapse of many government services. Teachers and public employees have been on strike for more than a week to protest the government's failure to pay them regularly since February.

Hamas and Fatah gunmen, often members of the security forces, have clashed at times, contributing to a lawless climate, especially in the Gaza Strip.

Abbas too must shake things up if he has any hope of breaking the impasse and moving forward to try to negotiate a peace deal with Israel, said Ali Jarbawi, a Palestinian political analyst.

"He is willing to do what is necessary to break this deadlock," Jarbawi said. "If the only way is a national unity government and everyone gets a piece of the cake, fine." ken.ellingwood@latimes.com

Fatah, Hamas Move Toward Unity (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0061707

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh announced an agreement in principle yesterday on the formation of a unity government comprising ministers from their rival Fatah and Hamas parties.

The final agreement is expected to include an implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas, but it was not clear whether it would go far enough to end an international aid boycott that has paralyzed the Palestinian government and left its workers unpaid for months.

The United States and European Union have insisted that aid cannot resume until the Palestinian government recognizes Israel, renounces terrorism and agrees to honor previous treaties with the Jewish state.

Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniyeh announced their agreement following weekend talks in Gaza City, Gaza Strip. A spokesman for Mr. Abbas said he hoped to conclude all the details within 48 hours.

Mr. Abbas hopes to persuade Hamas to sign on to a three-year-old Saudi peace formula calling for a full Israeli withdrawal from territories occupied since 1967 in return for full peace, and to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization's role as the body responsible for negotiating international agreements.

"An agreement in principle was reached," said Saeb Erekat, a peace negotiator and aide to Mr. Abbas, "but there are many details to be ironed out, like composition of the government and the program of the government."

There was some doubt that all the questions could be resolved within the 48-hour time frame. Indeed, Palestinian officials in late June announced the creation of a unity government that never materialized.

Since then, Hamas has come under intense pressure to strike a power-sharing deal with Fatah that would restore billions of dollars of annual aid that pays the salaries of some 140,000 employees.

The Palestinian Authority has been shut down for a week by striking civil servants who are protesting the government's failure to pay salaries for the past six months.

While there was no direct U.S. endorsement of the accord between Palestinian factions, the State Department said yesterday that any Palestinian government must renounce violence and accept Israel's right to exist to join now-dormant Mideast peacemaking efforts and qualify for a resumption of full Western aid.

State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said the Palestinian government must accept the "three principles of peace" -- disavowal of terror and violence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements between the two sides, including a peacemaking process, the Associated Press reported.

The top editor of Hamas' weekly newspaper in the West Bank confirmed Israeli newspaper reports that the Islamic militants had agreed to support the Saudi peace initiative, but no confirmation was offered by Hamas officials yesterday.

"If we are united, then we can present ourselves as a strong group to the international community and the world," said Yazeed Khader, the editor of the Hamas weekly.

Israeli press reports said that Mr. Haniyeh was expected to remain prime minister in the new government.

Hamas' surprise victory in a January parliamentary vote gave it a majority of the Palestinian legislators and exclusive control over the Palestinian Cabinet.

Since then, the Islamic militants have refused to budge from their rejection of peace talks and refusal to recognize Israel.

During coalition talks with Hamas, Mr. Abbas has pushed for a political program based on a joint declaration issued by imprisoned Palestinian militants from both Fatah and Hamas.

Known as the "prisoners document," the declaration affirms the role of the plo -- headed by mr. Abbas -- as the political body responsible for negotiating international peace treaties aimed at establishing a palestinian state. Many consider ratification of the document an implicit recognition of israel.

Nevertheless, Israeli officials said that they would insist that any new government meet the conditions of the international community on the peace process and free an Israeli soldier being held in Gaza since June.

Such a development "would put Palestinian-Israeli talks on track," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev. "Short of that would be a recipe for further stagnation, which is neither an Israeli nor a Palestinian interest."

Palestinian Reports Unity Deal With Hamas (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger, Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

GAZA, Sept. 11 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said Monday that he had reached a tentative agreement with Hamas to form a national unity government in an attempt to end the Palestinians' international isolation and the cutoff in Western assistance to their government.

In a speech on Palestinian television, Mr. Abbas said it would take several days to finish the deal, and provided no details of how his Fatah faction and the militant group Hamas, which leads the government, had resolved their considerable differences.

"We have finalized the elements of the political agenda of the national unity government," Mr. Abbas said in his speech. "Hopefully, in the coming days we will begin forming the government of national unity."

Details of the political agreement were believed to be limited to the unity government, rather than committing the Hamas movement more broadly to its terms. A national unity government will also have representatives of other Palestinian factions like Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, said Ghazi Hamad, the spokesman for the Hamas government.

"We're trying to make a balance between the requirements of the international community and Palestinian factions," Mr. Hamad said. "For everyone to sit at the same table won't be easy, but we need to do this. We hope it will break the international siege and minimize the tensions on the street."

Mr. Abbas's intention in pressing to form this new government is to regain the funds that have been cut off to Hamas, by the West and by Israel, since it took office in late March.

Aides to Mr. Abbas said he hoped to be able to disband the current Hamas government within 48 hours, but that the two factions still disagreed over important portfolios. They are agreed that the current prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, will keep his job, and that Fatah will control the Finance Ministry. Fatah also wants the foreign minister's post, but Hamas wants Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas leader, to keep it. Hamas also wants to keep the Interior Ministry.

Officials said the new government would accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements, an implicit recognition of a two-state solution. It would call for the negotiation of an independent Palestine outside of Israel's 1967 borders, including Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem, on the basis of an Arab League initiative.

The document is expected to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has signed all agreements with Israel, as the negotiating representative of the Palestinian people, and to acknowledge the right of Mr. Abbas to negotiate for the Palestinians.

After Hamas formed the government, which Fatah initially refused to join, the United States and the European Union took steps to halt aid to the Palestinian Authority that constitutes part of the authority's budget, and Israel stopped handing over the $50 million a month in taxes and customs receipts collected on behalf of the Palestinians, a major reason for the Palestinian deficit.

All said that the government of Hamas, which they have considered a terrorist group, must first recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Since Hamas gained control of the government in March, the 165,000 employees of the Palestinian Authority have received less than two months of their salaries, causing considerable hardship and a collapse of the economy, especially in Gaza. Crossings into Israel from Gaza have been regularly closed, which Israel said was a result of security threats.

It is not known whether the unpublished program of the unfinished new government will be enough for Israel to hand over funds that now total more than $350 million. The European Union has already suggested, though not explicitly, that it will resume contacts and aid to a unity government, and the United States, which does not give direct budget support, has been wary, but its view will be important in the Israeli decision.

Ziad Abu Amr, a lawmaker and mediator in the negotiations, said that if a new government did not permit the resumption of funds transfers and aid, "there's not much point to the whole exercise."

The Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mark Regev, said that if a new Palestinian government accepted the three international conditions "and releases Gilad Shalit," a captured Israeli soldier, "that would create a new momentum in the peace process and put us firmly on the right track."

DOJ_NMG_0061709

But he added, “Anything short of that would unfortunately lead to more stagnation that is not good for Israel, not good for the Palestinians and not good for anyone who wants peace in the Middle East.”

The Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, told Israel radio that if the new government did not meet international conditions, and if Mr. Abbas “decides not to take a step in this direction, but rather join something which actually means he is joining a Hamas-led government of terror, then I’m afraid we are going to have a problem.”

Hamas has moved a long distance, said Mr. Hamad, the Hamas government spokesman, adding, “No one should push them into a corner.”

Hamas recognizes the fact of Israel but refuses to recognize its right to exist, a position repeated Monday by a Hamas spokesman, Sami Abu Zuhri, when he said: “Hamas will still have its political agenda. We will never recognize the legitimacy of the occupation.” That term lets Hamas be vague at different moments about whether it means the occupation of land captured during the 1967 war, or, as its charter insists, Israel’s very existence in the region.

But Mr. Hamad points out that the charter of Israel’s conservative Likud Party calls for an Israel on both banks of the Jordan River, even as Likud governments have recognized the Oslo peace agreements of more than a decade ago and a two-state solution.

Since Fatah and Hamas agreed in principle on a national unity government in June, Mr. Abbas has made several statements indicating that a deal was close. He put major questions to Mr. Haniya 10 days ago, and reportedly threatened to dismiss the current government if it did not agree to work with Fatah to end the international aid freeze for the benefit of Palestinians in general.

Fatah says it is prepared to negotiate with Israel, and seeks a Palestinian state based on Israel’s 1967 borders, which would include all of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, with a capital in East Jerusalem. Hamas says that all the land in the region belongs to Muslims, but has said it would consider a long-term truce with Israel if a Palestinian state were established based on the 1967 borders.

Broke and isolated, largely because of Israeli and American policy, the Hamas government has been ineffective since coming to power in March. Many Palestinian teachers went on strike at the beginning of the school year in early September. On Monday, Mr. Abbas called for the strike to end.

“We call for a return to work and the end of the strike because all the sons of the Palestinian people should unite in the national interest,” he said.

Abbas Announces Deal With Hamas (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 11 -- Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas announced Monday that the governing Hamas movement and his rival Fatah party have agreed on the principles of a power-sharing government and may soon form a new cabinet to lead the beleaguered Palestinian Authority.

Under the plan, Abbas, the authority's president, is to dissolve the current Hamas-led cabinet within 48 hours. Abbas would then nominate the current Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas officials said, to assemble a coalition cabinet that would include members of his party, Fatah, other factions, and so-called technocrats unaligned with the leading movements.

Details of the agreement mark the first time Hamas has tacitly endorsed a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, if not explicitly the Jewish state's right to exist. Hamas and Fatah announced a tentative agreement several months ago, but it was never officially signed because of the tumult of an Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip following the June 25 capture of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit by gunmen from Hamas's military wing.

"The continuous efforts to form a national unity government have ended successfully," Abbas said on Palestinian state television Monday. "Efforts in the next few days will continue to complete the formation of the national unity government."

The deal follows contentious negotiations over a unified political program that would satisfy the rival Palestinian movements, as well as bring about an end to international sanctions against the Palestinian Authority. International donors froze aid after Hamas defeated the secular Fatah movement in elections eight months ago. Israel has withheld hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue that it collects on the Palestinian state's behalf.

The United States, the European Union and Israel all designate Hamas, an Islamic political movement with a potent armed wing at war with the Jewish state, as a terrorist organization.

The sanctions have left the Hamas-led government unable to pay salaries to an estimated 165,000 public employees, most of whom are on strike. In a rare show of unity, Abbas and Haniyeh both called Monday for all government employees to end the strike, spearheaded by young Fatah activists to give Abbas leverage in talks with Hamas.

The United States, the E.U., Russia and the United Nations -- a group of Middle East peace interlocutors known as the quartet -- have demanded three concessions from Hamas in return for resumption of aid that accounts for nearly half the Palestinian government's budget: Hamas must renounce violence, accept previously signed agreements, and recognize Israel's right to exist.

It was unclear whether they would accept the Palestinian agreement as meeting those conditions.

Palestinian officials said the deal does not require Hamas to explicitly recognize Israel or renounce violence. Instead, Hamas would accept previously signed agreements with Israel and the principles of a 2002 Arab peace initiative that calls for a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem, territory Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

Hamas's charter calls for the creation of an Islamic state across territory that now includes Israel. Party officials deny that the agreement amounts to a recognition of Israel. "Our program has not changed," Sami Abu Zouhri, a Hamas spokesman, said on al-Jazeera television.

Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said that "things are still fluid" concerning the terms of the political program. But he said that "it's clear that if the incoming government, assuming there is one, accepts the three benchmarks . . . as well as the release of Gilad Shalit, it could give new momentum to the peace process and put the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue back on track."

"Anything short of those benchmarks would be a recipe for stagnation," Regev said.

Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, spokeswoman for the U.S. Consulate here, which manages diplomacy with the Palestinians, said the political developments would be reviewed before any decision on aid is reached. But, she added, "if it's still falling short of the quartet's principles, then it's still falling short."

Blair Gets Rough Ride In Beirut (FT)

By Christopher Adams, Andrew England

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Several thousand angry chanting protesters gathered in central Beirut on Monday, leaving Tony Blair in little doubt about the hostility many Lebanese felt towards his fleeting visit to their country.

“Blair you are a partner in the killing of children,” said one poster. “We demand the conviction of Blair a war criminal in Lebanon and Iraq,” said another.

While hostile and vocal, the reaction reflects the country’s experience of 34 days of Israeli bombardment that some argue Britain’s prime minister bears a degree of responsibility for.

Many Lebanese accuse Mr Blair of supporting Israel in its war with Hizbollah, the Shia militant group, and he was widely criticised for refusing to call for an immediate ceasefire to the conflict. Some also deride him as a crony of George W. Bush, the US president.

“Blair, Bush, (Israeli Prime Minister Ehud) Olmert, three corns of one devil,” one placard declared.

More than 1,000 Lebanese, mainly civilians, were killed in the war, and Israeli bombs destroyed thousand of homes, as well as roads, businesses and bridges.

“We respect the English people, but we are against Blair and the policy of the government,” said Youssef Nour, a Hizbollah supporter at the demonstration where organisers used loud speakers to praise Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah’s leader, and denounce Mr Blair.

“We say Blair is not welcome in this land, a land of dignity, a land of honour and resistance,” Mr Nour added.

Shia politicians made their own protests.

Hizbollah's two ministers in the government, as well as two cabinet members from Amal, another Shia group, refused to attend a meeting of ministers with Mr Blair.

The prime minister was also scheduled to meet Nabih Berri, the influential Shia parliamentary speaker who acted as a mediator with Hizbollah. But Mr Berri, the leader of Amal, was abroad on a business trip in what was seen by some as another snub to the British leader.

"Hizbollah's position is that he is like Bush and (Condoleezza) Rice who killed the children, who refused the ceasefire and that means they share in the Israeli massacre. He should not have come," said Hussein Rahal, a Hizbollah spokesman.

Hundreds of soldiers, some in riot gear, deployed to keep the protesters away from Mr Blair's entourage, closing much of downtown Beirut to traffic.

But even in the relative tranquillity of the office of Fouad Siniora, Lebanon's prime minister, Mr Blair could not escape heckling.

As he and Mr Siniora were addressing journalists, an Irish woman, who said she was working as a volunteer in Lebanon, unfurled a banner reading "Boycott Israeli apartheid," and shouted: "It's an insult to the memories of thousands of Palestinians and Iraqis."

"Shame on you," she repeated as security men dragged her away.

"I've got used to demonstrations in my own country and demonstrations elsewhere as well," Mr Blair said.

Mr Siniora used the incident to play up Lebanon's fledgling democracy.

"We are proud of our democracy and the democratic measures used by some of our people today," he said.

But the fact that senior Shia politicians, particularly Mr Berri, did not meet Mr Blair could expose Mr Siniora to criticism from Lebanese groups who were against the UK prime minister's visit.

During the war, Lebanese parties projected a sense of unity, but the predominantly Christian and Sunni parliamentary majority that backs Mr Siniora has been under pressure since the August 14 ceasefire. Hizbollah, emboldened by its perceived success in the conflict, has been calling for a change of government, and it initially reacted much faster than Mr Siniora's administration to provide funds for those whose homes were destroyed.

However, Lebanese officials said the trip was important not only for Lebanon but also for efforts to find a solution to the broader Arab-Israeli conflict.

"It's important to have our requests heard, it's important (for leaders) to shuttle between Israel and Lebanon and other players in the region," said Misbah el-Ahdab, a Sunni parliamentarian in the majority bloc.

Protesters In Lebanon Drown Out Blair's Offers Of Aid And Support (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 11 — Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain dodged raucous demonstrators and endured a series of diplomatic snubs on his first official visit to this country, offering help for the Lebanese Army and vowing to renew efforts to bring peace to the Middle East.

His message was largely lost on a population angry at his failure to demand an earlier end to the fighting, which had killed nearly 1,200 Lebanese, an overwhelming majority of them civilians.

Hundreds of people gathered to protest near Martyrs Square on the edge of downtown Beirut, which for Mr. Blair's visit was cordoned off with barbed wire and guarded by hundreds of Lebanese troops with tanks. "Blair, bow your head before the children you have murdered," read one of the placards in the crowd.

Several ministers refused to meet him, including the pro-Syrian speaker of Parliament, Nabih Berri. The front pages of most of the country's newspapers said he was not welcome.

But Mr. Blair defended his policies in the 34-day war.

"I could have gone out there and called for it all to stop, but it wasn't going to stop until there was a U.N. resolution that had a framework within which it could stop, in which the real problems could be dealt with," he told reporters, with the embattled Lebanese prime minister, Fouad Siniora, standing beside him.

Mr. Blair said Britain would send more than $75 million in aid to Lebanon this year and was ready to provide "training, equipment, any help we can give" to Lebanese security forces that were filling the void left by Hezbollah and departing Israeli troops in southern Lebanon. He said he would use his remaining months as prime minister to work for peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Siniora then urged Mr. Blair to push the Security Council to carry out an Arab plan offering Israel peace if it withdrew from Arab land occupied since 1967. "Only by addressing the underlying causes can we guarantee peace and security for the Middle East," Mr. Siniora said.

On Sunday, Mr. Blair said Europe and the United States should work with a Palestinian coalition government, including both the Fatah and Hamas factions, if that government distanced itself from the anti-Israeli policies of Hamas that have isolated the current Hamas-led government.

The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, said Monday that a coalition government could be formed within days.

Separately, President Jacques Chirac of France said Monday in Helsinki that China could send up to 1,000 peacekeepers to bolster the United Nations force meant to maintain the nearly month-old cease-fire.

In Russia, President Vladimir V. Putin ordered the deployment of Russian military engineers and other military personnel to help with the reconstruction of Lebanon. In a meeting with government ministers, he said his administration would submit a request to the upper house of Parliament, the Federation Council, which approves the deployment of Russian forces abroad.

The defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, said a battalion of combat engineers could be ready to leave by the end of the month. He said the soldiers would not be part of the United Nations peacekeeping force.

An engineering battalion typically has about 400 soldiers, but a Ministry of Defense spokesman said he could not say how many would be deployed.

Cameron Hits Out At US Foreign Policy (FT)

By Miranda Green

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

David Cameron, leader of Britain's opposition Conservative party, on launched an outspoken attack on the failures of American foreign policy, calling for a "rebalancing" of the close relationship between the US and the UK.

"We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America," he said on Monday, during a speech in London on the fifth anniversary of the September 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington.

Mr Cameron, the youthful new leader of a party that has close ties to the Republicans, used his first big speech on international relations to differentiate his stance from that of Tony Blair, the prime minister.

Mr Blair's staunch support for the US-led war on terror has compromised his standing with British voters and MPs in his ruling Labour party. The Iraq war and Mr Blair's apparent willingness to take the lead from President George W. Bush have also proved increasingly unpopular, while the prime minister's refusal to condemn Israel's attacks on Lebanon was also widely criticised.

"We will serve neither our own, nor America's, nor the world's, interests if we are seen as America's unconditional associate in every endeavour," Mr Cameron said, calling for a new approach to promoting the shared values of Britain and America abroad – human dignity, personal freedom and national self-determin-ation. "A moral mission requires moral methods. Without them we are merely warmakers," he added.

The Tory leader argued that the military and diplomatic partnership between the allies since the attacks, and the military actions in Iraq and Afghanistan, which he and his party supported, had been part of a foreign policy approach that lacked humility and patience.

"I and my party are instinctive friends of America and passionate supporters of the Atlantic alliance," he said, warning against the "intellectual and moral surrender" of anti-Americanism. But he added that being an uncritical ally was dangerous for

Britain: "I fear that if we continue at present we may combine the maximum of exposure with the minimum of real influence over decisions."

Risking a rift with the Republicans and his own traditionalists, he attacked the "unrealistic and simplistic" neoconservative philosophy of Mr Bush's closest colleagues and advisers, calling it "a view which sees only light and darkness in the world – and which believes that one can be turned to the other as quickly as flicking a switch".

In a rare public statement issued on Monday, Baroness Thatcher, the former Conservative prime minister, said the attack on America was "an attack on all of us". She added: "With America, Britain stands in the front line against Islamist fanatics who hate our beliefs, our liberties and our citizens.''

Mr Cameron's predecessor as Conservative leader, Michael Howard, was kept at arms length by the Bush administration after failing to give unquestioning support to its policies.

But Mr Cameron is building bridges with other Republicans and has invited Senator John McCain to address his party's conference next month.

Tory Denounces Blair's 'Slavish' Tie To U.S. (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 11 — In his first major foreign policy address, David Cameron, the leader of Britain's opposition Conservatives, sought Monday to distance his party from what he called a "slavish" bond established between Britain and the United States by Prime Minister Tony Blair.

At the same time, though, he asked his audience of several hundred bankers and policy experts in London's financial district to bow their heads in silence during his speech at the moment when the first hijacked plane slammed into the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001.

Mr. Cameron is the main opposition contender likely to challenge whoever takes over the governing Labor Party from Mr. Blair, who has promised to quit within a year. His remarks seemed intended to sharply demarcate his foreign policy from that of Mr. Blair, for whom the war in Iraq and his ties with President Bush have proved politically ruinous.

His remarks — by a Conservative accusing a Labor leader of being too far to the right — showed just how far the British political spectrum has shifted since the end of the cold war and, particularly, since Mr. Blair's rise to power in 1997.

The speech was also intended to draw a line under previous Conservative policy. Mr. Cameron himself supported the Iraq invasion in 2003, but a senior Conservative, who spoke on the condition of anonymity under party rules, said: "We don't want to have an endless fight about what happened three or four years ago. This is about the next 10 years."

Mr. Cameron, 39, a former public relations executive who took over the Conservative leadership last December, assailed what he described as American neoconservatism and Mr. Blair's close alliance with the White House, which has encouraged British critics to label their prime minister America's "poodle."

But, he said, "I and my party are instinctive friends of America and passionate supporters of the Atlantic Alliance."

Mr. Cameron said there had been mixed success by Britain and the United States in curbing terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks. A terrorist attack on the same scale had been averted, he said, but "across the globe, terrorists are being recruited in increasing numbers and are active in many more areas than before Sept. 11." Anti-Americanism had taken hold, he said, "not just in countries affected by war and instability, but here in the West, here in Britain."

He urged development of "a foreign policy that goes beyond neo-conservatism, retaining its strengths but learning from its failures."

"We will serve neither our own, nor America's, nor the world's interests, if we are seen as America's unconditional associate in every endeavor," he said. "Our duty is to our own citizens, and to our own conception of what is right for the world. We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America."

The gibe was clearly aimed at Mr. Blair, who faced hostile protesters in Lebanon on Monday because of his support for the American and Israeli positions during the Lebanon war.

DOJ_NMG_0061714

Senior Conservatives acknowledged that Mr. Cameron seemed to be positioning himself for a post-Bush White House. “He’s unlikely to be prime minister when George Bush is president,” the Conservative official said. Britain’s next general election is due some time before 2010, probably long after the 2008 American presidential vote.

Before his speech, Mr. Cameron met with Robert H. Tuttle, the American ambassador, and asked him to “take the speech as a whole and not bits and pieces of it,” said David T. Johnson, the deputy chief of mission, the No. 2 diplomat at the American Embassy. “Some of the things we disagree with,” Mr. Johnson said in an interview, singling out a reference in the text of the speech to “illiberalism,” referring to repressive behavior at the American detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

But, he said, “I take him at his word that he did not intend it to be anything other than pro-American.”

Much of the speech seemed intended for a British rather than an American audience, Mr. Johnson said. For instance, in the address, Mr. Cameron said that Mr. Blair had “lost the art” familiar to British leaders going back to Winston Churchill of effectively playing what he called the junior partner in the so-called “special relationship” with Washington.

“I fear that if we continue as at present we may combine the maximum of exposure with the minimum of real influence over decisions,” Mr. Cameron said.

He assailed Mr. Blair’s and Mr. Bush’s view of the effort to prevent terrorism, saying he was “skeptical of grand schemes to remake the world” and asserting that Western policy had lacked “humility and patience.”

He also attacked the notion that counterterrorism was “a single struggle between single protagonists.’’

“The danger is that by positing a single source of terrorism — a global jihad — and opposing it with a single global response — American-backed force — we will simply fulfill our own prophecy.”

George Osborne, a senior Conservative official, said in an interview: “He talks about the future. Most of the speech is about the future and how we get beyond neo-conservatism.”

Briton Urges Frankness Toward U.S. (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 11 -- Conservative Party leader David Cameron said Monday that Britain should be a frank "junior partner" to the United States instead of the "uncritical ally" he said it has become since the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

"We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America," Cameron, 39, said in a major foreign policy speech that distanced him from Prime Minister Tony Blair, who has been criticized as unfailingly supportive of President Bush, especially on the Iraq war.

"We have for more than half a century acted as a junior partner to the United States," Cameron told a group of U.S. and British business and political leaders. He called Winston Churchill junior partner to Franklin Roosevelt during World War II, as was Margaret Thatcher to Ronald Reagan in the 1980s and John Major to George H.W. Bush during the Persian Gulf War, he said.

"It is not an easy part to play, but these three prime ministers learned to carry it through with skill and success," said Cameron, who hopes to regain the prime minister's job that his party lost to Blair and the Labor Party in 1997. "I worry that we have recently lost the art. . . . The sooner we rediscover the right balance, the better for Britain and our alliance."

Thatcher was in Washington on Monday for ceremonies marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Describing his own party members as "instinctive friends" of the United States, Cameron indicated that close ties would continue under a Conservative government but with that balance.

His speech came four days after Blair reluctantly announced that he would step down within 12 months. The prime minister has been facing diving approval ratings, caused in large part by disillusionment with the Iraq war and Blair's closeness to Bush.

A poll for the BBC released Monday found that 56 percent of Britons who were questioned believed the West was losing the "war on terror" and that only 20 percent thought it was winning. Fifty-five percent said they believed Britain was too closely aligned with U.S. foreign policy, while 19 percent said the relationship was about right.

Blair and his presumed successor, Chancellor Gordon Brown, have been openly feuding, causing many in Labor to worry that a wounded, infighting party might have a hard time defeating Cameron's Conservatives in elections that must be held by 2010. An ICM poll in the Guardian newspaper last month showed that Conservative support had risen sharply, to 40 percent, while Labor support had dropped to 31 percent, its lowest level in 19 years.

Blair's woes were underscored Monday when he was greeted by crowds of angry protesters in Lebanon, some carrying placards saying "killer" and "war criminal." Blair was widely criticized in Britain, as well as across Europe and the Middle East, for joining Bush in refusing to call for an immediate cease-fire during the recent Israel-Hezbollah armed conflict in Lebanon.

Cameron said Britain must not "turn a blind eye to the excesses of our allies," including "disproportionate Israeli bombing in Lebanon."

Rice Warns Sudan Of Relations With U.S. (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she told Sudan on Monday there is no chance of improved relations with the United States if it flouts the world's demand for U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

Rice gave reporters a brief account of her morning meeting in Washington with Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol. She was visiting Canada to thank that ally for its generosity in helping stranded American air passengers during the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I won't say that we made progress, but I will say that I delivered the strongest possible message in the strongest possible terms to the Sudanese government that any hope for bettering relations between the United States and Sudan rests on Sudan's cooperation with the United Nations Security Council resolution," she said.

In August, the U.N. passed a resolution that would give the world body authority over peacekeepers in the Western Sudanese province of Darfur and is meant to give more power and funding to a force, now run by the African Union, that has been unable to stop the humanitarian catastrophe there. The violence has killed more than 200,000 people and continues to worsen.

Rice said Akol carried a letter to President Bush, which she had not seen. He also "brought hope for better relations between the United States and Sudan, and I told him in no uncertain terms that wasn't on the agenda unless Sudan acted responsibly," she said.

The Bush administration has had strained relations with Sudan over the deaths and displacement of villagers in Darfur. Rice found herself in the middle of a diplomatic incident when she visited the Sudanese capital of Khartoum last summer. She asked for and demanded an apology from the Sudanese government after security agents for President Omar al-Bashir treated members of Rice's traveling party, including reporters, roughly.

Also pressuring the Sudanese government, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee introduced legislation Monday calling for targeted sanctions against those responsible for atrocities in Darfur.

The bill by Indiana Republican Richard Lugar calls for sanctions against people determined by the president to be "complicit in, or responsible for, acts of genocide, war crimes or crimes against humanity in Darfur."

Sudan Flouting Peace Treaty, Annan Charges (WP)

From News Services

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Sudan's government has violated the Darfur peace agreement with military attacks that are "legally and morally unacceptable," U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan said yesterday.

Annan said in a meeting of the U.N. Security Council that thousands of Sudanese troops have been sent to western Sudan, in violation of the peace accord, and North Darfur has been bombed. The violence has cut off food aid to 355,000 people in the northern part of the region, he said.

"I strongly condemn this escalation," Annan said.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) introduced legislation that would authorize U.S. assistance to the 7,000 African Union troops in Darfur and call on President Bush to name a special envoy for the crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0061716

The African Union has said it would begin withdrawing its troops next month. Last month, the Security Council authorized up to 21,000 U.N. troops to replace them, but their deployment requires Sudan's approval, which its government has thus far refused.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met in Washington with Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol and said later she had urged Sudan "in the strongest possible terms" to accept the U.N. force.

"I won't say that we made progress," Rice acknowledged.

Violence and disease have left as many as 450,000 people dead and 2.5 million homeless in Darfur.

Mystery Lingers In Kyrgyz 'Kidnapping' (WT/AP)

By Leila Saralayeva

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan -- A U.S. servicewoman who reappeared as mysteriously as she vanished gave confused accounts of her three-day absence and refused to make further statements after consulting with the U.S. Embassy, a Kyrgyz police official said yesterday.

Air Force Maj. Jill Metzger, who had been stationed at the U.S. base in Manas, outside the Kyrgyz capital, Bishkek, disappeared Sept. 5 while shopping in the city. She resurfaced Friday night when she knocked on the door of a house in Kant, about 15 miles outside Bishkek, and claimed she had been kidnapped.

Maj. Metzger was flown out of Kyrgyzstan within a few hours of her reappearance and was admitted Sunday to a U.S. military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany. There was no immediate word regarding what she was being treated for.

Kyrgyz authorities have said her swift departure could impede their investigation, because they wanted to question her further to clarify her account. According to investigators, Maj. Metzger said an object with a note saying it was a bomb was placed in her pocket in a Bishkek department store and that she was kidnapped after following the note's instructions on where to go.

"It seemed to me that her testimony was little believable. She was confused in her evidence," said Batmirza Dzhailobayev, head of the Kant police department.

"After she spoke with somebody from the embassy, she categorically refused to give testimony. Then people from the U.S. Embassy took her away," he said.

Mr. Dzhailobayev noted that although Maj. Metzger had told police that her abductors had stolen her necklace, she was still wearing an expensive-looking wedding ring.

Also yesterday, a resident of the house where Maj. Metzger appeared said the 33-year-old was clearly in distress.

"Our first impression was that the woman was severely drunk ... [but] there was no smell of alcohol, and we then understood that she was in shock," Svetlana Ivashenko said. She said Maj. Metzger was dressed in clothes that appeared to be several sizes too large for her.

Mrs. Ivashenko said Maj. Metzger spoke only in English, which neither she nor her husband understand, so they awoke their daughter to try to help understand.

"Who had seized her, why and where they had held her all this time, she couldn't clarify," Mrs. Ivashenko said. "As she told all this, she didn't weep -- she just sobbed and held her head."

Mrs. Ivashenko said there was blood on Maj. Metzger's feet and that she said she had walked a considerable distance. She also said the right side of Maj. Metzger's face appeared to be badly bruised, although Mr. Dzhailobayev said that "it was my impression that there were no bruises on her face."

Maj. Metzger was serving a four-month stint with the 376th Air Expeditionary Wing at Manas, where the U.S. military has maintained a base since 2001 to support operations in nearby Afghanistan. She had been scheduled to return Friday to her regular post at Moody Air Force Base, Ga.

Senator Shoots Down Reports Of Close Call (HILL)

By Emily Heil

The Hill, September 12, 2006

The headlines sounded frightening.

DOJ_NMG_0061717

"Missile Fired at McCain's Helicopter," one read, referring to an apparent Aug. 28 incident in the Republic of Georgia during a codel led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), which included six senators.

According to news stories, the Georgian Interior Ministry said a helicopter escorting a delegation of U.S. senators was fired on.

But returning from the month-long recess, senators on the codel, including Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), said they heard of the purported missile fire only after they had returned home. It turned out the statement is inaccurate, and that the senators' helicopter was never under fire. The U.S. embassy in Georgia on Sep. 5 released a statement setting the record straight.

"A thorough investigation by Georgia's Ministry of Internal Affairs and the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), confirms that, contrary to initial reports, no missile was fired at any helicopter transporting the U.S. Senate Delegation led by McCain on August 28, 2006," the statement read. "It appears that another helicopter, which was on the way from Tbilisi to join the Senate delegation helicopters in western Georgia, was the intended target of the missile."

Even though the senators were never in the line of fire, the incident at least made for a colorful what-I did-on-my-summer-vacation exchange.

"Did you get shot at over there?" Graham asked Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), who had been part of a separate, earlier codel to Georgia.

"Yeah, they missed," Lugar joked.

Lightening bolt more likely to hit Senate

For House staffers who continuously gripe about the Senate's lack of good faith, it's official. The Senate is in fact more "godless" than the House when it comes to upholding the separation of church and state.

The folks at the Secular Coalition for America awarded 18 members of the Senate (and only seven in the House) a "perfect score" for "commitment to the separation of church and state, and their willingness to protect the interests of the non-theistic community."

The group based the grades on 10 key votes in each chamber, including those on judicial nominees in the Senate.

Senators earning the aetheists' praise are: Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), John Kerry (D-Mass.), Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), Carl Levin (D-Mich.), Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.), Patty Murray (D-Wash.), Jack Reed (D-R.I.), Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.).

House members with perfect scores are: Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), Barbara Lee (D-Calif.), Jim McDermott (D-Wash.), Pete Stark (D-Calif.), and Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.).

Crikey! Hill's Aussie pays tribute to croc hunter

As the Hill's lone Aussie (at least by his own count), Greg Keeley is shedding more than crocodile tears over the death last week of Steve Irwin. The outdoorsman and TV personality known as the "Crocodile Hunter" had a special place in the hearts of Australians, particularly those living abroad, says Keeley, who is the communications director and military advisor for Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.).

The beloved Irwin was a great ambassador for the land Down Under, he notes.

"He's done wonders for me personally," Keeley says. "Everyone thinks I wrestle crocodiles and have a kangaroo in my backyard."

Keeley and his wife, Katie, met Irwin at a dinner in Los Angeles, and were impressed by Irwin's energy and easygoing manner.

"The personality you see on TV is exactly the way he was in real life," Keeley says.

Since Irwin's death, condolences have been pouring in from fellow Hill staffers, journalists, and military officials, Keeley says, and he's touched by the sentiments.

"It literally stopped the country," he said.

Feehery turns into a TV talker

DOJ_NMG_0061718

It's nearly impossible to throw a Blackberry in D.C. without hitting a pundit. Now, there's one more target. John Feehery, the former spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) turned flack for the Motion Picture Association of America, has become a talking head, at least part time.

Feehery has a regular gig on Bloomberg TV, appearing every other week to gab about the usual roundup of politics and what's ahead in the next week's news. He alternates with former Clinton spokesman Joe Lockheart in a seven-minute segment every Friday on the show "Money & Politics."

Feehery says the new role (for which he isn't paid and does not represent the views of the MPAA) is much the same as his current and former jobs.

"It's just talking," he laughs.

Hill cable junkies have noted an uptick in the wattage of the guests on Bloomberg TV of late, and we hear Washington bureau chief Al Hunt—and his A-list Rolodex—is behind the change. Alexander Bolton and Elana Schor contributed to this page.

US And EU Condemn China's News Rules (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration joined the European Commission on Monday in criticising Beijing's imposition of new restrictions on the distribution of foreign news in China, saying it viewed the rules with "great concern".

A State Department official said Beijing's media policies in general were "incompatible with China's aspirations to build a modern information-based economy" and were a breach of fundamental rights.

The regulations announced at the weekend by Xinhua, Beijing's propaganda arm and China's biggest news agency, require international news services...to censor information distributed inside the country. The rules also ban the agencies from selling directly to local customers, including banks and other financial services companies.

The European Commission on Monday condemned moves by China to tighten controls on foreign news agencies, saying the new rules were a "real cause for concern".

Johannes Laitenberger, spokesman for the Commission, told a news conference in Brussels: "We oppose strongly this kind of restrictive practice."

The European protest was the first sign of the potential diplomatic cost of the moves by Xinhua to limit more closely the operations of international news agencies.

Leading agencies have yet to react in detail to the rules, which allow Xinhua to revoke the licence of any found distributing content that "harms China's national security or honour", or "disturbs the Chinese economy" or "hurts ethnic feelings".

A representative for one of the foreign news and information groups, who would not be named, said: "One of the big issues is does this just impact news agencies or does it affect financial information services as well."

Dow Jones declined to comment on the rules and Bloomberg said it would not be making a comment.

Old China News Agency (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

China's state-run news agency, Xinhua, literally means "New China." How ironic, given its very old business tactics.

Xinhua has released a sweeping update to a 1996 law on foreign news agencies that smacks of expropriation and may violate China's World Trade Organization commitments. The document asserts the Chinese government's right to broadly censor foreign news companies' content over a range of sensitive subjects, including "sovereignty" (read: Taiwan), "religion" (Falun Gong), or China's "interests" (Iran, Burma, Sudan). Article 12 of the new regulations gives Xinhua "the right to select the news and information released by foreign news agencies" and to "delete" offending material.

We doubt they'll succeed. No self-respecting foreign news agency will allow the Chinese government to read an article before it's published on the mainland. For financial newswires that provide real-time pricing and market information -- such as the one owned by this newspaper's parent company, Dow Jones -- censorship would be literally impossible. Chinese banks, brokers, insurers and traders -- the bulk of which get their information from foreign news companies -- also won't appreciate seeing markets move against them because they received their information late.

The real story here, then, may be Xinhua's ambitions. According to Sunday's document, "foreign news agencies" will no longer have the right to sell news directly to their customers. They'll have to ply their wares through a Chinese "agent," which presumably will require a few yuan for its trouble. The Journal reported yesterday that this "agent" will be the China Economic Information Service, which, no surprise, is appointed by Xinhua.

As recently as 1996, Xinhua tried unsuccessfully to push through censorship rules on foreign news organizations. It also tried to bar government institutions from buying news products directly from foreigners, and to fix subscription prices. After a pitched battle...news organizations agreed to register with Xinhua on an annual basis. But they refused to submit to censorship, price setting, or government middlemen who'd take a cut of their profits.

From a business standpoint, Xinhua may now feel that it has no other option than to assert monopoly control. In the decade since the prior rules were promulgated, domestic news organizations have proliferated. Media Partners Asia Ltd. in Hong Kong estimates there are some 3,000 registered newspaper titles, and more than 9,000 magazines, not to mention proliferating blogs. In the most profitable and fast-growing segments, such as financial newswires, Xinhua has essentially been left in the dust.

But why muscle in now? Perhaps Beijing's political elite feel threatened . Freedom of information is unsettling to any authoritarian state. In recent years Beijing has alternatively creaked opened, then slammed shut, the television industry and lifestyle magazines. In recent months, the Communist government has also floated new rules restricting reporting of natural disasters and riots; increased oversight of local television broadcasters; convicted New York Times news assistant Zhao Yan and Singapore's Straits Times reporter Ching Cheong, and so on.

Xinhua is the Communist Party's mouthpiece, a symbol of what China really is. The reformers among Beijing's elites need to explain to their colleagues that returning to old habits of censorship won't protect their future.

No More Chinese Whispers (WSJ)

By James McGregor

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

It took an undiplomatic Chinese diplomat to tell China and America what we both need to hear: "It is high time to shut up!"

In a mid-August BBC interview Sha Zukang, China's ambassador to the U.N. in Geneva, used those words to tell American politicians to stifle complaints about Beijing's rapidly growing military budget. He noted that defense spending in China, with a population five times larger than the U.S., is a small fraction of the American military budget, which accounts for nearly 50% of global arms spending. "It is the U.S.'s sovereign right to do whatever they deem good for them," Mr. Sha said. "But don't tell us what is good for China." As Mr. Sha's comments indicate, after 25 years of economic reforms and more than a decade of nearly 10% annual growth, Beijing is weary of and angry about America's constant criticism. The Communist Party leadership is turning this hectoring to its advantage at home, where the leaders understand that, while in the age of the Internet they can't stop information from coming in, they can shape how the people think about what they learn from abroad.

Since the early '90s, the Chinese leadership has been teaching its people that China is re-emerging as a benevolent great power while America is determined to hold China back. School textbooks portray the U.S. as a hegemonic power seeking world domination, and rank us equal to terrorism as a threat to world peace and stability. The state media echoes that message, depicting American advocacy of democracy, press freedom and individual rights in China as a cynical plot to destabilize the country.

Their efforts are effective. A March 2006 opinion survey by the Global Times, a Chinese newspaper, showed that 59% of city-dwellers believe the U.S. seeks to contain China. The 2005 Pew Global Attitudes Project survey showed that only 42% of Chinese view the U.S. favorably. A 2003 survey by Duke University of hundreds of Chinese cities and rural counties indicated that the more educated people are, the more likely they are to hold negative views of the U.S. * * *

My personal experiences after 15 years in Beijing reflect those results, even among Chinese who studied in the U.S. At a lunch I hosted to bring Henry Kissinger together with young Chinese entrepreneurs, he looked around the table and asked: "Now that we have such impressive economic progress in China when and how do you envision democracy developing?" They looked at him, aghast. Finally, one answered for the group: "Do we want to destroy all the progress China has made?"

When the Chinese look at America, they see a media-driven political system with election campaigns featuring crass manipulation of wedge issues that divide the population, while failing to focus on America's real problems. When they look at their own system they see a political strategy that attempts to hold the people together as tightly as possible for as long as possible -- albeit by brutalizing those who get in the way -- to make the necessary wrenching changes China must go through to prosper.

The Chinese people want the rule of law and fairness. But they also want a government that solves problems and focuses on progress. The many vainglorious and venal local Communist Party cadres are roundly detested. But Chinese who experienced the chaos of the Cultural Revolution also believe that America must be purposely seeking to destabilize China. Surely the U.S. isn't so naïve as to think instant democracy would make China a better place?

Half a world away, our sensationalist broadcast media is equally adept at demonizing China for the American populace. When CNN's Lou Dobbs discovered that ranting generates ratings, he quit asking CEOs thoughtful questions about China and now focuses on flogging it for stealing jobs and unfairly threatening U.S. economic preeminence. Bill O'Reilly and his infotainment-obsessed brethren at Fox stir up a similar stew of angry anti-Chinese cornpone. And neither network has any trouble finding like-minded and uninformed talking heads from the Congress eager to obscure their own leadership and policy failings by laying America's economic insecurities and difficulties at China's doorstep. During a book tour that took me to many American broadcast outlets in the past year the producers invariably asked: "Are you our anti-China or our pro-China guest?" They were baffled when I answered that I was the "let's-try-to-understand-China guest." Our TV screens may be in color, but discussions of China are exclusively in black and white.

The rest of the world doesn't share our fear and loathing of China. For the past 15 years, its diplomats have undertaken a very effective charm offensive to build a positive image abroad. People-to-people contacts abound, with Chinese students filling universities around the globe. Outbound Chinese tourists now outnumber those from Japan. China's slogan for dealing with its neighbors is: mulin, anlin, fulin, which translates as: be friendly, make them feel secure and help make them rich. It works. A 2004 BBC poll of 23,000 people in 22 countries showed that 48% considered China a positive global influence -- 10 points higher than the U.S. Moreover, the survey showed that 58% of the respondents ages 18-to-29 had a positive view of China.

So what should an insecure and out-of-sorts superpower and a paranoid and increasingly pugnacious aspiring superpower do to avoid a collision? First, do as Ambassador Sha requests: "Shut up!" Second, both sides need to designate statesmen with the stature, credibility, influence and wisdom to shape public opinion and bring a halt to the systematic demonizing of one another. From America's side, I nominate Hank Paulson, the Treasury secretary. He is well-regarded in China and well-informed as a result of making some 70 trips there during his Goldman Sachs days. His business background is a huge plus. After two decades of on-the-ground experience investing billions of dollars and employing millions of people in China, the U.S. business community is far ahead of politicians in understanding the Chinese government and people.

Mr. Paulson also has a ripe opportunity. Both President Bush and Condoleezza Rice are too bogged down in the Middle East, and ideologically uncomfortable with China, to do more than occasionally trim the weeds of the U.S.-China relationship. While Mr. Paulson comes to his new office too late to become Mr. Bush's Bob Rubin, he does have three years to set himself up to be the next Kissinger for China. The business community, both governments and the media will listen to him if he is forceful and forthright.

It will be easier for Mr. Paulson to influence China than many think. Behind the bluster, the Chinese leadership under President Hu Jintao is uncertain and searching for where to take the country as it becomes an integrated part of the global community for the first time. China doesn't really know what it wants to be next. It just knows that it doesn't want to be what it used to be: a feudal country that foreigners could carve up like a ripe melon, eventually becoming a dysfunctional civilization that a messianic leader could bring to the edge of social and economic insanity. With WTO membership, China's doors are now permanently open. Foreigners are part of the Chinese business and social fabric and a restive Chinese population is increasingly demanding an accountable and honest government. Chinese leaders understand that there is a mismatch between their economic and political systems that needs to be aligned, but they aren't sure how to do it.

The current danger is that Chinese leaders will believe their own baloney, that America's main goal is to keep China poor and weak, and base their future course on that premise. The truth is, some in America have that agenda. But another truth is, we couldn't do it even if we wanted to.

We can't afford to let the ignorant and insular in both China and America teach, tease and taunt our two nations into an unnecessary and potentially cataclysmic collision. Mr. Paulson is 60 years old, wealthy as hell, and intrigued by China. What else does he have to do for the next couple of decades?

Uruguay At Center Of Lively U.S.-Venezuela Chess Game (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay — Long taken for granted by its much larger neighbors, Uruguay suddenly finds itself one of the main fronts in the struggle between the United States and Venezuela for dominance in South America. The Bush administration and President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela are jockeying for position here, each trying to undercut the other by winning over Uruguay's left-wing government.

Washington is offering a free-trade agreement that would pull Uruguay into the United States' orbit and weaken Mercosur, the regional trade group to which Uruguay and Venezuela belong. Mr. Chávez has countered with attention-getting investments, subsidized oil, acts of charity and a growing alliance with left-wing factions of the ruling Broad Front.

Pablo da Silveira, a professor of political philosophy at Catholic University of Uruguay and a political commentator, likens what is happening to "a geopolitical chess game, in which Venezuela is playing the black pieces, in other words, oil" in an effort to gain influence. In this small, strategically situated place, he added, "Chávez and the United States are seeking the same thing, and for the same reason: to make Uruguay a test case" for their widely varying visions of the region.

Mr. Chávez, for example, has pledged to invest an estimated $500 million in an oil refinery here and has invited the Uruguayan state oil company to join its Venezuelan counterpart in exploration projects. As it has done in Cuba and the Caribbean, Venezuela is supplying petroleum products at a discount, and Mr. Chávez has promised that a gas pipeline he wants to build from Caracas to Buenos Aires will pass through here.

Venezuela has also put up money that allows some unprofitable ventures in Uruguay that employ relatively large numbers of people — like tire, glass and sugar plants — to stay in business. Most recently, the Chávez government has offered support for an ailing government financial cooperative that makes small loans to people and small businesses that normally do not qualify for bank loans.

"It doesn't cost Chávez a lot of money, but it generates a lot of good will," said Danilo Arbilla, a former editor in chief at the weekly magazine Búsqueda. "That way, when he comes here, he's solved people's problems, and they will go out for him."

Not to be outdone, the United States has countered with a proposal to build a medical and dental clinic near a working-class area of Montevideo. Left-wing groups aligned with Mr. Chávez maintain that the offer is really a plot by the Pentagon to establish a military base in Uruguay.

The Bush administration's main thrust, however, is its offer of a free-trade accord that would allow Uruguay to increase exports of meat, leather, cheese and other products to the United States.

Uruguay's population and economy are small, with barely three million people and total trade with the United States amounting to slightly more than $1 billion last year. But the country is a member of the Mercosur customs union, which includes Brazil and Argentina, and a free-trade agreement with the United States would weaken the group and put pressure on Uruguay's two big neighbors to negotiate bilateral accords with Washington.

Uruguay's relations with Argentina and Brazil have been tense recently. Argentina is trying to block work by a Finnish-Swedish consortium and a Spanish company on two cellulose plants, the largest foreign investment in Uruguay's history.

Brazil declined Uruguay's request to mediate the dispute — Argentina says the plants violate a border treaty — which has raised what Uruguayans consider unreasonable barriers to trade and torpedoed the candidacy of an Uruguayan, Carlos Pérez del Castillo, to be director of the World Trade Organization.

Early this year, Tabaré Vázquez, Uruguay's first Socialist president, told a radio station here that "Mercosur has become more a problem than a solution." But in an interview in late August, he said his country had no intention of leaving the group, but wanted instead "more and better Mercosur," without "giving up our right to open ourselves to the rest of the world."

Mr. Vázquez was reluctant, though, to say explicitly that he favored a free-trade agreement with the United States. Brazil and Argentina have suggested at various times that such an accord with the United States would be incompatible with membership in Mercosur and could be grounds for expulsion.

"Both countries want to improve their commercial exchanges with each other, and we have agreed that paths exists that allow us to achieve that objective," he said, referring to the United States and Uruguay. "We've set a methodology and a timetable," he added, a reference to the fact that President Bush will lose his authority to negotiate "fast track" trade agreements June 30, 2007, unless Congress renews it. Though the United States has already signed an investment treaty with Uruguay, Washington initially showed little interest in a free-trade accord. Two Bush administration officials had all but ruled out the idea before Mr. Bush announced, during a visit by Mr. Vázquez to the White House in May, that he favored "extending our commercial relations" and suggested that talks begin here as soon as possible.

Mr. Bush made his offer as Venezuela was preparing to join the Mercosur group, which was founded in 1991 and is based here. Venezuela was formally accepted into the group in July, and Mr. Chávez's public statements have made it clear that he would like to transform Mercosur into more of a political alliance with an anti-American tint.

But Mr. Chávez may have overplayed his hand by suggesting the creation of a NATO-like alliance and a common Mercosur army. That proposal was not well received in the four original member countries, Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay, all of which endured military dictatorships in the 1970's that committed major rights violations, and Mr. Vázquez said in the interview that the idea did not interest him.

Within Mr. Vázquez's governing coalition, though, left-wing groups close to Mr. Chávez and his "Bolivarian Revolution" to raise living standards for the poor have been working to undermine Mr. Vázquez's flirtation with Washington. Montevideo is awash in graffiti that emphatically proclaim "No F.T.A. with the Yankees!" and an "anti-imperialist forum" held here late in August called for closer ties with Venezuela.

At a 10-hour televised congressional hearing here in late August, those differences were on display.

Uruguay's finance minister, Danilo Astori, argued for an accord with Washington. Its foreign minister, Reinaldo Gargano, made the case for Venezuela: a 314 percent increase in trade in the first half of this year, more than a score of cooperation accords signed in the last 18 months and the strengthening of what he called "South-South relations."

But "the Chávez option is only interesting if he can compensate what we lose in trade opportunities each year by being inside Mercosur," an official, speaking on condition of anonymity because Mr. Vázquez has said only he is authorized to speak on the subject. "But his internal situation won't let him spend that kind of money year after year. He can afford millions, but not billions."

The U.S.-Korea Tie: Myth And Reality (WP)

By Daniel Sneider

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The U.S. visit this week by South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun offers yet another opportunity to bemoan the crisis of confidence in our alliance. Anti-American views, particularly among the young, remain widespread in South Korea. On an official level, there are strains over the role of U.S. troops based in Korea and a stark divergence in approaches toward North Korea.

This portrait of a troubled alliance is often contrasted with a supposed golden age in U.S.-Korean relations during the Cold War. But that view obscures a history of sharp disagreement between the two allies. It is a mythical past that stands in the way of repairing our alliance today. In reality, Korean nationalism and American strategic policy goals have often clashed. Differences over North Korea have arisen repeatedly. And anti-Americanism has been a feature of Korean life for decades.

This was true from the earliest postwar days, in a relationship born out of a fateful and poorly considered decision to divide Korea, after decades of Japanese colonial rule, into American and Soviet zones of occupation. Syngman Rhee, South Korea's first leader, was often at odds with his American backers. Washington feared Rhee would provoke a war with the communist North, even after the end of the Korean War.

Relations with Park Chung Hee, who came to power in a military coup in 1961, were even thornier. Park was a fierce Korean nationalist and, according to a close former aide, uncomfortable with Americans. The two countries collided over North Korea policy, economic goals, human rights and democracy.

In the 1970s, South Koreans developed deep doubts about the durability of the alliance, an uneasiness fed by the Vietnam debacle and the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Korea. Park defied U.S. pressure in declaring martial law in 1972, junking the constitution and jailing leading opposition figures. He launched a secret campaign of influence-peddling and bribery of American congressmen to counter U.S. criticism of his policies.

While Park feared abandonment by the United States, North Korea's Kim Il Sung worried that China, after developing ties to Washington, might sell him out. Thus Park, even though he had been the victim of two assassination attempts by North Korea, reached out to Pyongyang. During high-level talks in 1972, there was a remarkable shared belief that the major powers were the obstacle to Korean reunification.

The most alarming sign of an alliance in crisis was Park's dangerous decision to develop nuclear weapons, made in secret in 1971 after Richard Nixon's withdrawal of one of the two American infantry divisions. According to my research, American officials became alarmed over the seriousness of this effort when a young CIA agent provided evidence of a crude design for a nuclear warhead.

In the spring of 1975, my father, the late ambassador Richard Sneider, sent a top-secret cable to Washington calling for an urgent review of the U.S.-South Korean alliance. Korea was "no longer a client state," he wrote, but was "well on its way to middle power status with ambitions for full self-reliance including its own nuclear potential."

Sneider recommended creation of a new partnership, one more akin to our alliances with NATO or Japan. He also pushed for quiet but tough diplomacy to dissuade Park from heading down the nuclear road. That campaign succeeded finally, but not before my father warned Park that the entire security alliance was jeopardized.

Park was assassinated in 1979 by his own intelligence chief, who claimed to have acted at American instigation. The charge was false, but it remains widely believed in Korea. The perilous state of our alliance reached a peak with the Kwangju uprising against military rule the following year, when hundreds of Koreans were killed by troops deployed with the alleged acquiescence of the United States.

Dispelling the myth of the previous golden era in U.S.-Korean relations does not mean that our relations lacked a foundation of shared interest or that the difficulties we face today are not serious. The gap over how to handle the threat from the North is certainly wider and more evident than in the past. And the democratization of South Korea makes our differences visible and harder to manage.

As policymakers from both countries meet this week, they need to take a deep breath and remember that our alliance survived tremendous stresses in the past. The task before us is not to focus on our divergence but to pick up the challenge left unmet 30 years ago -- to define the basis for a long-term relationship that is durable and reciprocal and that finally sheds the shackles of dependency.

The writer, a former foreign correspondent, is associate director for research at Stanford's Shorenstein Asia-Pacific Research Center. He is working on a diplomatic history of the American alliances with South Korea and Japan during the Cold War.

A Sensitive Seoul Isn't Always A Good Thing (WSJ)

By Mary Kissel

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

SEOUL -- "Frustrating!" Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, said of his job, jovially echoing my own assessment at a recent, soju-soaked dinner here. "Frustrating, how?" I probe. There are plenty of foreign-policy sores: a growing rift with the U.S., China's expanding influence on the peninsula, and the prospect of a North Korean nuclear test. The foreign minister, a genteel man who's the leading candidate to succeed Kofi Annan at the United Nations, shrugs and laughs heartily; diplomatically, his tongue is tied.

"Fearful" might be a more frank characterization of South Korea's foreign policy. Not fearful that the North will attack the South -- President Roh Moo Hyun's government won't publicly acknowledge that as a possibility. Rather, Seoul's foreign policy is based on a deep-seated fear of the North's collapse and the prospect of China's military involvement in the ensuing turmoil. That's pushed the Roh administration to pursue an agenda whose chief goal is maintaining the status quo in the totalitarian North, where 23 million fellow Koreans eke out a rude existence in the world's most brutal regime. This foreign policy is based on an increasingly twisted rationale for appeasement of Kim Jong Il -- and is accompanied by a slow ideological drift away from the U.S., the nation which has kept the peninsula secure over the past 50-odd years.

The U.S.-South Korea alliance has proved a bedrock of security for North Asia's democracies, including Japan. Until Mr. Roh won in 2002, South Korean presidents -- even his immediate predecessor, "sunshine" advocate Kim Dae Jung -- understood why they needed the U.S. shield. Without it, Seoul would be privy to the whims of China -- which historically has treated the peninsula as an appendage -- or Pyongyang, which is tacitly backed by Beijing.

But Mr. Roh's administration just doesn't see it that way. Mr. Ban, picking at the noodles, fish and beef arrayed before us at dinner, discusses how to construct a "harmonious relationship" with the North that's based on building "mutual trust." On a swing through Europe last week, his boss, Mr. Roh, claimed that the North's recent missile launches were "aimed at achieving political purposes rather than posing military threats." Given that nearly 30,000 U.S. troops are stationed in South Korea, that kind of talk doesn't sit well in Washington.

Could Seoul and Washington be sliding toward an "amicable divorce," as some Korea-watchers are terming it? Under this view, this week's White House summit between Mr. Roh and President Bush is marriage counseling. Expectations are low, as prickly agenda items are plentiful: the timing of the transfer of wartime Korean troop control to Seoul (an idea that the Pentagon has almost gleefully embraced); increasingly frayed Seoul-Tokyo relations; shaky negotiations for a South Korea-U.S. free trade agreement; and Mr. Roh's re-establishment of emergency food aid, along with verbal niceties for Kim Jong Il.

Mr. Ban sometimes sounds like he's in denial. He insists that the U.S.-Korea relationship is fine, and says he's "hugely troubled" by the perception that anything's amiss between Seoul and Washington. South Korea, he points out, cooperates with the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which aims to stem the trade of WMD. (The South hasn't signed up formally, however, because it's afraid of upsetting the North.) South Korea, like the U.S., claims it wants better human rights in North Korea. But it won't sign a U.N. resolution condemning the North's brutal repression of its citizens -- again, for fear of upsetting Pyongyang. Like the U.S., the South wants to see a unified, democratic Korean peninsula, which would imply regime change. But again, Mr. Ban could never say so outright because it would -- you guessed it -- offend the North.

Outside the government, ties between the two nations remain strong. The world's biggest and 10th-biggest economies are broadly and deeply linked. Cultural exchanges, including the more than 80,000 students who study in the U.S. every year, are rock solid. The U.S. Embassy in Seoul issues more visas daily than any other American embassy in the world.

So from where does this fear swilling around Seoul originate? For a start, the demilitarized zone is a mere 40 minutes' drive outside of Seoul, and over time, that threat has psychologically neutered South Korea's policy makers. Missile defense isn't an option, Mr. Ban points out, as defensive measures couldn't be launched fast enough to counter a concerted Northern offensive. And he stresses, somewhat incongruously for an economy larger than Russia's, that South Korea is still a "middle power." The U.S. alliance is important, that reasoning goes, because it's the only thing keeping the North checked. But this logic is at odds with his government's insistence that the North wouldn't threaten the South at all.

Any military option against the North is "out of consideration," Mr. Ban says emphatically. But what if Kim Jong Il's regime falls, and China installs its own dictator or exerts its own control? Mr. Ban insists that Seoul's goal is "unification," without a timeframe. But it would be awfully convenient to see Beijing impose a little order north of the border.

China might like that, too. It's certainly not in its interest to see a strong, democratic, unified Korean peninsula that's more closely aligned with the U.S. Beijing has already established strong political links with the North through energy and food donations. The Chinese are putting money into North Korean mining projects, infrastructure, tourism and trade. The six-party talks, Mr. Ban hints -- but doesn't say outright -- don't get anywhere because of Chinese intransigence.

DOJ_NMG_0061725

For more than half a century, Pax Americana has ruled on the peninsula. But today, even South Korea's opposition Grand National Party, for all its hawkish rhetoric, doesn't really envision a military option for dealing with North Korea. It will take more than a frosty summit this week -- a further U.S. troop drawdown, perhaps? -- to stimulate some real fear among the Korean people about who's protecting their interests and ensuring their security. "I would be sensitive to term it [North Korea] as a threat," Mr. Ban said, at the start of our dinner together. Maybe that's the problem.

It's A Boy! (WP)

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The little prince lets Japan off the hook -- for now.

THE BIRTH of a child is always a joyous occasion, but the birth of a 5-pound, 10-ounce son to Japanese Prince Akishino and his wife, Princess Kiko, has been a cause for particular celebration there for a single reason: the baby's gender. The baby is the first boy to be born in the imperial household in 41 years, thereby allowing the country to sidestep, at least for now, an emotional national debate about whether to permit a female to ascend the Chrysanthemum Throne. As the conservative newspaper Sankei Shimbun exulted, "The birth of the little prince has completely erased the dark mood of Japanese worried about the nation's future."

Our best wishes to the family, but it's too bad the arrival of the little prince is letting the country and its archaic system of royal succession off the hook. The baby had hardly had his first diaper changed when politicians rushed to postpone consideration of a measure that would have allowed female succession; Crown Prince Naruhito and his wife, Princess Masako, have a 4-year-old daughter.

It's a bit odd to complain that the rules of any particular monarchy are outmoded; in this democratic age, the entire institution is anachronistic. Yet the Japanese emperor has evolved with the times: Once revered as a living god, the emperor renounced his divine status after World War II to become, as the Japanese constitution provides, "the symbol of the state and of the unity of the people." Symbols matter, and in a country whose institutions and society remain pervaded with sexism, a female emperor could hardly be a better one.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney, Rumsfeld Call For Perseverance At Pentagon Ceremony (AFP)

By Jim Mannion

AFP, September 12, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney called on Americans to stay united and persevere in an increasingly divisive war against terrorism five years after the September 11 attacks on the United States.

Cheney joined US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld at a memorial ceremony at the site where a hijacked American Airlines jet struck the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, killing 189 people, including the five Al-Qaeda hijackers.

"We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power," Cheney told a gathering that included families of the victims.

President George W. Bush later visited the Pentagon where he consoled and embraced relatives of the victims, ending an emotional round of visits that took him to "Ground Zero" in New York on Sunday and Shanksville, Pennsylvania on Monday.

Hijackers flew two airliners into the World Trade Center, followed by another into the Pentagon and a fourth into a field in Pennsylvania, killing nearly 3,000 people in the worst attack on US soil.

The anniversary comes amid deepening public disenchantment with the war in Iraq and a resurgence in Afghanistan of the Taliban, the Islamic fundamentalists toppled in a US-led offensive within months of the September 11 attacks.

At the ceremony, hundreds of guests, dignitaries and military observed in silence as bagpipes played and a giant American flag was unfurled over the side of the Pentagon as firefighters did on the day of the attack.

Cheney and Rumsfeld, key architects of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, alluded only indirectly to the bitter divisions that have opened since the attacks on New York and Washington.

Both, however, sounded themes of national unity and determination in their speeches, and broadly defended the administration's performance.

Cheney called September 11 "a day of national unity."

"When that giant flag was unfurled here, it rallied the country," Cheney said. "And everyone was reminded how fortunate we are every day to have the men and women of the Pentagon on duty for the United States of America."

Cheney said the United States has learned "that there is a certain kind of enemy whose ambitions have no limits and whose cruelty is only fed by the grief of others."

"And in these years, we also found our mission: to defend America against a present danger and to offer a democracy and hope as the alternative to extremism and terror.

"This struggle is fierce and it will be lengthy, but it is not endless," Cheney said. "Our cause is right. Our will is strong. This great nation will prevail."

A video tape released by Al-Qaeda's number two leader Ayman Al-Zawahiri on the anniversary threatened continued attacks on US and western interests in the Gulf and on Israel.

Rumsfeld, praising Cheney's resolve and "fierce determination to bring our enemies to justice," said the attacks drew the United States into "a war not of our making."

"On this fifth anniversary and on the anniversaries to come, we must ask ourselves, are they succeeding?" Rumsfeld said.

"Well, in many ways, the enemy's failing," he said.

He said many of those who have not been killed or captured are "on the run" and they had lost a sanctuary in Afghanistan.

Rumsfeld implicitly linked Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to the September 11 attackers, saying, "They've lost a supporter in Iraq that was paying the families of suicide bombers 25,000 dollars each."

"But they still try every day to convince us to doubt our prospects, to distrust one another, and to believe that the battle against them cannot be won or is not worth the cost," he said.

Cheney Defends Homeland Security Policy (AP)

The Associated Press, September 11, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney says the fact that there has not been another attack on U.S. soil shows "we've done a pretty good job" of protecting the country against terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0061730

"I don't know how much better you can do than no, no attacks for the past five years," said Cheney, dismissing Democratic charges that serious security gaps remain.

On Monday, as the country marked the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Cheney attended a service of remembrance across the street from the White House at St. John's Episcopal Church, where former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was among those at the service.

Cheney then presided at a moment of silence on the South Lawn, where the Marine Band played "Amazing Grace," "America the Beautiful" and "Taps" as Cheney and his wife, Lynne, stood solemnly with Mrs. Thatcher, Cabinet members and White House staffers.

Later, at a memorial observance near the site where an American Airlines plane slammed into the Pentagon five years ago, Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld walked side-by-side to the speaker's platform as somber music played. Rumsfeld's arm was in a sling; he is recovering from shoulder surgery.

A moment of silence was observed at 9:37 a.m. EDT, the exact time the plane struck, killing 184 people.

Also in attendance was retired Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, who was vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff the day of the attack.

The Bush administration has been on the defensive over its policies in Iraq, where insurgents have been escalating their attacks.

Cheney, in an hour-long interview Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press," acknowledged the Iraqi insurgency was underestimated and that he was wrong when in May, 2005 he declared the insurgency "in its last throes."

"I think there is no question but that we did not anticipate an insurgency that would last this long," the vice president said, adding that "major, major work ... is ahead of us."

"But the fact is, the world is better off today with Saddam Hussein out of power. Think where we'd be if he was still there," Cheney said.

Democrats countered that the country is now less safe.

"Vice President Cheney's influence over our nation's foreign policy has made America less safe," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Vice President Cheney's appearance (Sunday) proves that he just doesn't get it."

Cheney refused to separate Iraq from the overall terrorist threat, although a Senate Intelligence Committee report last week said there's no evidence Saddam Hussein had ties with al-Qaida. He said the war in Iraq is now the central front in the fight against terrorism.

Cheney defended his role as a leading advocate for invading Iraq, for a warrantless surveillance program and for harsh treatment of suspected terrorists.

"Part of my job is to think about the unthinkable, to focus upon what in fact the terrorists may have in store for us," Cheney said when asked about his "dark side."

Cheney shrugged off news reports that his influence was waning, partly as a result of foreign policy miscalculations and partly as other advisers, especially Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, were getting more attention from President Bush.

The vice president said the reports were about as valid "as the ones that said I was in charge of everything."

Rice told "Fox News Sunday" that "these stories float around Washington — who's up, who's down. The vice president remains a crucial adviser to the president. His role is different than my role. ... These stories are simply ridiculous."

Asked if the United States still would have invaded Iraq had the CIA told Bush and him that Iraq had no weapons of mass destruction in 2003, Cheney answered yes. He said Iraq had the capability of obtaining such weapons and would have done so once U.N. penalties were eased.

President Bush's Reality (NYT)

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Last night, President Bush once again urged Americans to take terrorism seriously — a warning that hardly seems necessary. One aspect of that terrible day five years ago that seems immune to politicization or trivialization is the dread of another attack. When Mr. Bush warns that Al Qaeda means what it says, that there are Islamist fanatics around the world who wish us harm and that the next assault could be even worse than the last, he does not need to press the argument.

After that, paths diverge. Mr. Bush has been marking the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 with a series of speeches about terrorism that culminated with his televised address last night. He has described a world where Iraq is a young but hopeful democracy with a "unity government" that represents its diverse population. Al Qaeda-trained terrorists who are terrified by "the sight of an old man pulling the election lever" are trying to stop the march of progress. The United States and its friends are holding firm in a battle that will decide whether freedom or terror will rule the 21st century.

If that were actual reality, the president's call to "put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us" would be inspiring, instead of frustrating and depressing.

Iraq had nothing to do with the war on terror until the Bush administration decided to invade it. The president now admits that Saddam Hussein was not responsible for 9/11 (although he claimed last night that the invasion was necessary because Iraq posed a "risk"). But he has failed to offer the country a new, realistic reason for being there.

Establishing democracy at the heart of the Middle East no longer qualifies, desirable as that would be. Where Mr. Bush sees an infant secular Iraqi government, most of the world sees a collection of ethnic and religious factional leaders, armed with private militias, presiding over growing strife between Shiites and Sunnis. Warning that American withdrawal would "embolden" the enemy is far from an argument as long as there is constant evidence that American presence is creating a fearful backlash throughout the Muslim world that empowers the fanatics far more than it frightens them.

Fending off the chaos that would almost certainly come with civil war would be a reason to stay the course, although it does not inspire the full-throated rhetoric about freedom that Mr. Bush offered last night. But the nation needs to hear a workable plan to stabilize a fractured, disintegrating country and end the violence. If such a strategy exists, it seems unlikely that Mr. Bush could see it through the filter of his fantasies.

It's hard to figure out how to build consensus when the men in charge embrace a series of myths. Vice President Dick Cheney suggested last weekend that the White House is even more delusional than Mr. Bush's rhetoric suggests. The vice president volunteered to NBC's Tim Russert that not only was the Iraq invasion the right thing to do, "if we had it to do over again, we'd do exactly the same thing."

It is a breathtaking thought. If we could return to Sept. 12, 2001, knowing all we have seen since, Mr. Cheney and the president would march right out and "do exactly the same thing" all over again. It will be hard to hear the phrase "lessons of Sept. 11" again without contemplating that statement.

Democrats Answer Cheney (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Perhaps Vice President Cheney should quit his current job and work within a political system more to his liking, the kind in which those in charge can protect national security by telling everyone what not to say and what not to think.

Cheney seemed terribly impatient with democracy Sunday on "Meet the Press" when he suggested that those who oppose President Bush's Iraq policies are helping -- excuse me, validating -- the terrorists.

Our allies in the war on terror, Cheney said, "want to know whether or not if they stick their heads up, the United States, in fact, is going to be there to complete the mission."

Then the punch: "And those doubts are encouraged, obviously, when they see the kind of debate that we've had in the United States. Suggestions, for example, that we should withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq, simply feed into that whole notion, validates the strategy of the terrorists."

Meaning what, exactly? If Cheney doesn't like "the kind of debate that we've had in the United States," is there any other "kind," short of a lock-step endorsement of all of Bush's choices, he'd endorse?

It's no wonder that Cheney isn't happy with the spread of democracy to the American foreign policy debate. Not only did Cheney have to answer Tim Russert for a whole series of spurious prewar claims and badly mistaken predictions. He must also be distressed with how different the political world is now from what it was four years ago, when he and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld began building their case for the Iraq war.

Back then, Democrats were petrified. They desperately wanted to change the subject from foreign policy to . . . well, anything else. Cheney loved it when tormented Democrats failed to see that they could never win the electorate's confidence if they left national security to the other party.

Yes, there were honorable exceptions proposing alternatives to the administration's approach, including (from somewhat different points of view) Sens. Joe Biden, Carl Levin, Richard Durbin and the late Paul Wellstone. But far more than was healthy, the foreign policy debate back then was largely a Republican and conservative affair.

That's changed. As the administration's failures have become obvious to an American majority, Democrats have begun to play the opposition's essential role of offering alternatives. Voters trying to get beneath slogans such as "cut and run" might usefully consult two speeches given in the past week, one by Biden, the other by Sen. John Kerry. These days Biden is seen as a bit more "hawkish" than Kerry, but what's striking is that both speeches focused on ending the impasse Bush's policies have created.

Both emphasized what should be a central element in the debate, the potential disaster looming in Afghanistan. The administration, Biden said last Thursday, "has picked the wrong fights at the wrong times, failing to finish the job in Afghanistan, which the world agreed was the central front in the war on radical fundamentalism, and instead rushing to war in Iraq, which was not a central front in that struggle."

On Saturday, Kerry condemned the administration's "stand-still-and-lose strategy" and called on the administration to send 5,000 more troops to Afghanistan to quell the Taliban insurgency.

Biden made an important point in arguing that elections alone, absent efforts to "build democratic institutions and bolster moderates," do not guarantee democracy.

Biden also pushed his proposal for radically decentralizing Iraq's government so that Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds can find "breathing room in their own regions" and create a circumstance in which most American troops could be home "by the end of 2007, without leaving chaos behind."

Kerry's speech put greater emphasis on the need to "redeploy" from Iraq, but even the Democrats' 2004 nominee argued for leaving a "residual force to complete the training" of Iraqi troops and "deter foreign intervention."

These speeches reflect a growing consensus within a broad swath of Democratic opinion: First, that Iraq is a blind alley, a distraction from the war on terrorism, not its "central front." Second, that the United States needs a responsible way to disengage from Iraq, reengage in Afghanistan and prepare itself to deal with the rising power of Iran, so far a real winner from Bush's Iraq policies.

The administration, in the meantime, is offering -- stasis. It seems to define victory as maintaining our troops in Iraq through the end of Bush's term without telling us exactly why doing so will make the situation there any better.

A debate about alternative futures is what the country needs. Who can be surprised that Vice President Cheney doesn't want it to happen?

N.J. Prosecutors Defend Effort To Get Phone Company Records Against Federal Lawsuit (AP)

By Beth Defalco, Associated Press

AP, September 12, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. – New Jersey has the right to obtain information about a federal domestic surveillance program because that program is no longer a secret, the state argued in response to federal efforts to quash its investigation.

The Justice Department wants to throw “an impenetrable cloak insulating the federal government's domestic surveillance activities from all judicial scrutiny,” acting New Jersey Attorney General Anne Milgram said in a statement Monday.

New Jersey prosecutors subpoenaed 10 phone companies in May because of suspicion that state consumer protection laws may have been violated if phone companies were turning over records to the National Security Agency.

The federal government sued the New Jersey attorney general's office in federal court June 14, claiming compliance with the state's subpoenas or even acknowledging the existence of such a program would threaten national security.

The state in its response, filed late Friday, argued: “There is no secret for the state secret privilege to protect.”

The program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people the government suspects have terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to take action.

The federal government considers the program vital to fighting terrorism, but critics say it unconstitutionally gathers private information.

Federal officials have objected to efforts by several states and civil liberties groups to investigate or shut down the NSA program. Most recently, it filed a lawsuit against a Connecticut state agency last week and against Maine utility regulators last month.

The courts have been split on that argument: A judge in Chicago agreed with the government that state secrets would be exposed if a case there went forward there, but another judge in San Francisco said the surveillance is already so well known that there is was no danger of spilling secrets.

A judge in Detroit last month ordered an immediate end to the program, saying it violates free speech and privacy rights as well as the separation of powers, but the plaintiffs agreed to keep the ruling on hold until the judge decides whether to issue a stay.

Where's The Outrage? (USAT)

By Karen Hughes

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, one essential ingredient is still lacking in our international response to terrorism: the concerted moral outrage of everyday citizens of every faith and country.

DOJ_NMG_0061733

The names of the people murdered that morning read like a roll call of the world's family: Ahmed, Alonso, Chung, Fazio, Fitzgerald, Goldstein, Gonzalez, Jablonski, Mbaya, McSweeney, Mohammed, Rizzo, Wallendorf and Zukelman. The victims, citizens of more than 90 countries, included a young Muslim woman, seven months pregnant, on her way to attend a friend's wedding; an Iranian grandmother who had overcome her fear of flying to visit her grandsons in Boston; a German businessman in New York to attend a meeting. His son, 4 at the time, said, "If the terrorists knew how much we love Papa, they wouldn't have flown the plane into the tower."

Unfortunately, the extremists we face don't care. Since that fateful day, hundreds of others have been torn from their families, murdered as terrorists targeted morning commuters in London, Madrid and India, wedding guests at a hotel in Jordan, children in school in Russia and lining up for candy in Iraq, tourists in Egypt and Bali, Indonesia.

This is not right, or normal, or acceptable, and a much louder chorus of voices needs to join in condemning it. Terrorism threatens all of us. It targets the very foundations of a free society. Yet where are the mothers organizing against terrorism as American mothers did against drunken driving? Where are the fathers promising to teach their sons to choose to live rather than choose to die? Where are the religious clerics and congregations of all faiths arguing that no just and loving God would call on young men and women to kill themselves and others in the name of religion?

To be fair, many voices, Western and Eastern, Islamic and Christian, have spoken out against the violence. Yet the criticism seems oddly muted. Offensive cartoons sparked massive protests in nations across the Islamic world. The international outcry was immediate when civilians were killed in the recent conflict between Israel and Hezbollah.

Yet we have seen no similar mass condemnation of terrorist violence and murder, and no hint of remorse from those engaged in these acts. As I have traveled the world, I have met those who try to justify the violence based on policy differences, long-held grievances or a perceived threat from the West.

Those who speak of a clash of civilizations seem to forget that Islam is part of America, that an estimated six to seven million Muslims live and worship freely in America. America and our international partners went to war to protect Muslims in the Balkans and gave generously to help Muslims rebuild their lives after the tsunami in Indonesia and the earthquake in Pakistan, just as many Muslim-majority countries reached out generously to help Americans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

We do this because we believe in the dignity and value of every person. The fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 is both a reminder of the inhumanity of the extremists we are up against and the humanity shared by most citizens of the world. The color of our skin, the language we speak and the way we worship may be different, but much more unites us than divides us.

So why aren't more of us doing more to stop the terror?

First, I believe most of us hope that terrorism is an aberration. Unfortunately, I do not believe it is true. Part of my job is to look at the propaganda being spread on Internet sites and TV sets around the world. It is chilling. Bombings are depicted as acts of glory. Children are being taught the language of hate. Thousands of people have been trained in terror training camps, convinced the only way to defend their faith is to kill all others who have a different point of view.

Second, the presence of religion in this debate makes governments and individuals nervous. We are unsure how to engage; we hesitate to offend. Yet all major faiths — including Christianity, Islam and Judaism — teach that life is precious. We cannot allow what is essentially a death cult to get away with murder in the name of religion.

It is in the best interest of all the civilized people that the terror stop. And we have a model. Slavery's path from international norm to pariah began with moral outrage. In 1833, one of every seven adults in Britain signed a petition against slavery. That was twice the number of people eligible to vote at the time and the largest public petitioning of Parliament to that date. The grassroots petition drive was born of the conviction that every person has value — a conviction that should guide us today.

Our challenge is to launch a new grassroots movement across all faiths and continents, a movement that clearly states that no grievance, no complaint, no matter how legitimate, can ever justify the targeting and killing of innocent civilians. A movement that commits to teach our children that life is precious, diversity should be celebrated, and hope can conquer hate.

I have read many stories of lives cut short by acts of terrorism. Almost all the victims' families speak of the joy their loved ones brought to those around them. They didn't deserve to die. And those who killed them earned only shame, not glory. The least the rest of us can do is say so loudly and in concert.

Karen Hughes is under secretary for public diplomacy and public affairs at the State Department.

Al-Qaida Lieutenant Warns Of New Attacks (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, September 11, 2006

Al-Qaida's No. 2 condemned U.N. peacekeepers in Lebanon as enemies of Islam and warned the terror group will strike the Persian Gulf and Israel, suggesting new fronts in its war against the West in a video Monday marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0061734

The video of Ayman al-Zawahri was one of three al-Qaida released for the anniversary, showing increasingly sophisticated techniques as the group tries to demonstrate that it remains a powerful, confident force five years into the U.S. war on terror.

One video showed images of the planes striking the World Trade Center, lionizing the 19 suicide hijackers as men "who changed history." Another was a 91-minute documentary-style video in which Osama bin Laden is seen smiling and chatting with the planners of the Sept. 11 attacks in an Afghan mountain camp.

Al-Zawahri spoke in the third and longest video, warning Americans of more attacks to come.

"We have repeatedly warned you and offered a truce with you. Now we have all the legal and rational justification to continue to fight you until your power is destroyed or you give in and surrender," he said. "The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events."

He also called on his followers to attack the U.S. in response to its jailing of a prominent Muslim cleric.

"I call on every Muslim to make use of every opportunity afforded him to take revenge on America for its imprisonment of Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman," he said.

Abdel-Rahman, a blind cleric from Egypt, was convicted in the U.S. of seditious conspiracy for his advisory role in a plot to blow up five New York City landmarks, including the United Nations in 1995.

Al-Zawahri's comments also pointed to new fronts for al-Qaida attacks. The terror network has had few operations in Lebanon, Israel or in the Gulf region — except for in Saudi Arabia, where its branch carried out a campaign of violence in recent years but has been heavily damaged by a government crackdown.

He urged his followers to attack Western targets to stop what he said was the stealing of oil from Muslim countries.

Both Lebanon and Israel have warned of a possible growing al-Qaida presence.

"We have seen over the last months increased al-Qaida activity in our area," in Lebanon, Jordan and Egypt's Sinai peninsula, Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said. "We've seen an attempt by al-Qaida to also infiltrate in Gaza and even in the West Bank, so we take the threat very seriously and we're taking the appropriate countermeasures," he said, without elaborating.

Addressing the United States, al-Zawahri said "you should not waste your time" reinforcing troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, "because they are doomed to defeat."

"Instead, you have to reinforce your troops in two regions. First is the Gulf, where you will be thrown out after you are defeated in Iraq, at which point your economic ruin will be achieved," he said. "The second is Israel, because the jihad reinforcements are getting closer to it."

He also denounced the U.N. peacekeeping force now moving into Lebanon under terms set out in a U.N. cease-fire resolution that on Aug. 14 ended fighting between Israel and Hezbollah guerrillas. He suggested Muslims should prevent the peacekeepers' deployment.

"What is so terrible in this resolution ... is that it approves the existence of the Jewish state and isolates our mujahedeen in Palestine from Muslims in Lebanon," he said. "This is consecrated by the presence of international troops who are hostile to Islam."

"Anyone who accepts this resolution means that he accepts all these catastrophes," he said.

The Egyptian-born al-Zawahri called on the Muslim world "to rush with everything at its disposal to the aid of its Muslim brothers in Lebanon and Gaza" and accused Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia of being "traitors" when it came to those two conflicts.

The comments about Lebanon — which indicated the video was recent — were the first indirect threat against the French-led force deploying there, tasked with enforcing a border zone free of Hezbollah weapons.

But it is not clear al-Qaida has the means to carry out significant attacks in Lebanon. The Sunni-led al-Qaida and Shiite Hezbollah are considered enemies. The Shiite guerrillas were angered over the terror group's interference in December, when al-Qaida in Iraq claimed a rocket attack from Lebanon into northern Israel, provoking Israeli airstrikes on a Palestinian base in Lebanon.

Al-Zawahri also called on Iraq's Kurds to shun America and Israel.

"I appeal to my brothers in Islam, the Kurds, to renounce these calls which support America and Israel," he said.

Bin Laden and al-Zawahri are believed to be on the run in the Afghan-Pakistan border region. Many analysts believe that they no longer have centralized control to order or organize attacks by militants around the world. The capture and killing of many midlevel commanders has left the organization more diffuse and amorphous.

At the same time, the central leadership's propaganda machine has gotten more sophisticated, aiming to rally militants and romanticizing the jihad, or holy war, against the United States as a heroic fight.

The three videos were all issued by As-Sahab, al-Qaida's media production arm.

Al Qaeda Threatens More Terror Attacks (WT/AP)

By Elaine Ganley

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

PARIS -- Al Qaeda yesterday marked the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks with threats of more assaults as the world remembered the day in solemn observances and some expressions of resentment over the U.S. response to the attacks.

"We have repeatedly warned you and offered a truce with you. Now we have all the legal and rational justification to continue to fight you until your power is destroyed or you give in and surrender," al Qaeda No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri said in one of three videos the group released yesterday.

"The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events," he said and warned that Persian Gulf countries and Israel would be al Qaeda's next targets. He accused the governments of Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia of supporting Israel's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Elsewhere, somber remembrances marked the day. From Europe to Asia, heads bowed in moments of silence for the nearly 3,000 people killed in the attacks five years ago.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani wrote President Bush on behalf of the Iraqi people, expressing condolences to the families of the September 11 victims.

"On this sad and memorable day, I would like to reiterate the gratitude of the people of Iraq for the people of America and for your leadership," Mr. Talabani wrote. "The people of Iraq will never forget those who helped them in getting rid of the most brutal and terrorist regime of Saddam Hussein."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who won the country's first post-Taliban election in 2004, expressed the appreciation of the Afghan people to the United States for the "sacrifices of your sons and daughters" in rebuilding his country.

Saudi Arabia, birthplace of 15 of the 19 September 11 hijackers, sent a message of sympathy to the American people and relatives of the victims.

But it also noted that "the hand of terrorism has reached innocent people of various nationalities and religions" and reminded Americans that Islamic nations have repeatedly been targeted by terrorists.

In Europe, the scene of three terrorist attacks since September 11, commemorations touched each nation.

Bells tolled in Rome's city hall square.

"9/11 will be in our memory forever," said Rome Mayor Walter Veltroni during a ceremony in a downtown piazza designed by Michelangelo. "We all remember where we were, what we were doing, what our first reaction was."

In London, bouquets of white roses and yellow carnations were piled in a memorial garden where the names of 67 Britons killed in the New York attacks are inscribed -- and where a steel girder from the wreckage of the World Trade Center is buried. Relatives tearfully remembered their dead.

"It doesn't get any easier, but our minds are much calmer, and we can think through all the events without being flooded by tears and sadness," said Adrian Bennett, 55, whose 29-year-old son, Oliver, was among the victims.

French President Jacques Chirac, in a written message to President Bush, reiterated his nation's "friendship" in the fight against terrorism.

A week after the September 11 attacks, Mr. Chirac flew over the World Trade Center site. But that solidarity quickly dissipated into rancor in the buildup to the Iraq war, when Mr. Chirac led opposition to Mr. Bush's plans.

Many foreign leaders still think the war and other U.S. policies have made the world less safe in the five years since. Even German Chancellor Angela Merkel -- an advocate of closer ties with Washington -- had criticism of the United States yesterday, saying: "The ends cannot justify the means."

"In the fight against international terror ... respect for human rights, tolerance and respect for other cultures must be the maxim of our actions, along with decisiveness and international cooperation," she said.

New Zealand's Prime Minister Helen Clark joined many when she said: "No, we're not more secure since 9/11."

She said more should be done to reach out to moderate states and leaders in the Islamic world to encourage understanding between different peoples, and to help end the sense of alienation and exclusion among some young Muslims that fuels extremism.

Bin Laden's Deputy Warns Of Attacks In The Middle East (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061736

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — Osama bin Laden's top deputy used the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks on Monday to urge fellow Muslims around the world to take up arms against the United States, and he warned of new attacks by Al Qaeda throughout the Middle East.

Dressed in a white robe and turban and seated in front of shelves filled with books, the deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, said American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan were "doomed to defeat" and pledged that the United States military would be expelled entirely from its bases in the Persian Gulf region.

Mr. Zawahri criticized America's military support for Israel during the country's recent war with Hezbollah, and he called on the Muslim world "to rush with everything at its disposal to the aid of its Muslim brothers in Lebanon and Gaza," according to a full transcript of the video provided by the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups.

Mr. Zawahri said Al Qaeda would strike again in coming weeks, but he gave no indication of the type of targets or specific locations.

"The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events with God's permission and guidance," he said in the video, during which he is asked a series of questions by an anonymous interviewer.

Running more than an hour, the Zawahri video, broadcast on CNN and the Internet, was unusually long compared with previous videos released by As-Sahab, Al Qaeda's clandestine media production arm, based in Pakistan.

Terrorism experts in Washington were examining the tape on Monday to find any coded messages that Mr. Zawahri might be sending to his followers. American government officials did not seem to be concerned that the tape might signal an impending attack. "It's one tape of what they said was going to be a media blitz," said an American intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity under ground rules imposed by his agency. "We take it as propaganda. We take all these tapes seriously, but over the years they have been propaganda and not substance."

The video message from Mr. Zawahri was released along with a separate, documentary-like video showing footage of Qaeda operatives planning the Sept. 11 attacks, as well as two of the Sept. 11 hijackers reading from their wills.

They were part of a flurry of audio and video messages that the terrorist organization has released in recent weeks.

President Bush has used several speeches over the past week to highlight what he described as his administration's successes since the 2001 attacks in dismantling Al Qaeda and keeping the organization's senior leaders on the run.

At the same time, Mr. bin Laden and Mr. Zawahri have been able to produce a record number of recordings this year — messages that seem intended both to inspire their followers and to taunt their adversaries.

According to IntelCenter, a company based in Virginia that monitors Qaeda videos, the terrorist group has released 46 videos so far this year, nearly three times the number it has produced in any previous year.

Mr. Zawahri discussed the internal politics of the jihadist movement, announcing that an Algerian separatist organization called the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat had formally joined with Al Qaeda.

He held forth on historical events like the Sykes-Picot agreement between the French and British to redraw the borders within the Middle East after World War I.

Al-Qaeda Calls On Muslims To Fight In Lebanon, Israel (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Al-Qaeda marked the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks with a call for Muslims throughout the world to violently oppose the international peacekeeping force gathering in southern Lebanon and position themselves for direct assaults against Israel and Persian Gulf governments.

In a lengthy video posted on Islamic Web sites late Sunday, al-Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahiri, described last month's U.N.-authored cease-fire between Israel and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon as a Western plot to separate and isolate "the mujaheddin in Palestine . . . from the Muslims in Lebanon."

The Lebanon crisis, Zawahiri said, was a subset of the primary issue of Israel and its occupation of Palestinian territories. Every "sincere Muslim," he said, should "hurry" to southern Lebanon to aid in setting up "a jihad base on the borders of Palestine to connect" with those on the inside.

His comments reflected an ongoing al-Qaeda effort to position itself as the vanguard of the Palestinian fight against Israel and to capitalize on the outrage the conflict generates in the Muslim world.

Zawahiri's 76-minute video, aired in part yesterday by the al-Jazeera satellite television network and CNN, was one of several released before the anniversary. Titled "Hot Issues," it showed Zawahiri, in a white robe and a turban, sitting in front of a bookcase stocked with volumes in Arabic.

Earlier Sunday, al-Qaeda posted a 90-minute documentary, titled "Knowledge is for Acting Upon." Subtitled in English and narrated by an unknown figure, it was a history of al-Qaeda grievances against the West, including the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948, the alleged desire of the West to occupy Arab lands in pursuit of oil and the stationing of U.S. troops in the Persian Gulf region.

The video combined old footage of al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden with previously unseen video, including images of Sept. 11 hijackers Hamza Alghamdi and Wail M. Alshehri reading portions of their wills and of bin Laden apparently consulting with his commanders before the 2001 attacks.

It also showed bin Laden, dressed in a dark robe, sitting with Muhammad Atef, a senior al-Qaeda figure who was killed in Afghanistan, and Ramzi Binalshibh, who helped facilitate the attacks and was captured four years ago in Pakistan. Binalshibh is among those President Bush said last week had been transferred from secret prisons to the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Although bin Laden has recorded frequent audiotapes -- the most recent one was released July 1 -- his last known appearance on video was in October 2004. Both he and Zawahiri are believed to be hiding in the mountainous region along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

The Zawahiri video, translated by the Washington-based SITE Institute, was done as an interview conducted by an unseen questioner. In addition to calling on Muslims not to recognize the cease-fire agreement in Lebanon, Zawahiri:

Â· Described the government of Iraq as being made up of "traitors and charlatans" who had lost their place in the afterlife by cooperating with U.S. forces. He called on Iraqi Kurds to stop cooperating with it.

Â· Cited the "good news" that al-Qaeda had joined in a formal alliance with the Algeria-based Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat. U.S. intelligence officials confirmed the alliance, which they said had been "in the works for months."

Â· Repeated long-standing denunciations of governments in Turkey, Egypt, Jordan and elsewhere in the Middle East.

Â· Called NATO forces in Afghanistan "second-rate crusaders" who had been shoved into the line of fire by withdrawing U.S. forces.

Â· Invited "all victims of America," including non-Muslims, to "take advantage of the opportunity" offered by the Islamic campaign and U.S. weakness as a result of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq "to ward off America's aggression against them and overcome it, each in his own way, and under his own banner and with whatever means."

Zawahiri claimed that U.S. defeat in Iraq is near and that "jihadi reinforcements" are closing in on Israel. He warned "Western peoples" that "your leaders are hiding from you the true extent of the disaster which will shock you, and the days are pregnant and giving birth to new events."

Republican Pushes Hardline Tribunal Bill (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 12, 2006

A House Republican has drafted a bill largely mimicking an administration plan to create military commissions to prosecute terror suspects.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, will propose on Wednesday that his panel approve a bill that would allow the exclusion of evidence to protect classified information. A floor vote is expected next week.

The bill puts Hunter, R-Calif., in line with the White House and Senate leadership, but at odds with his counterpart, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va. Warner and some of his colleagues have drafted a rival bill that would ensure defendants are allowed access to all evidence against them.

Hunter's bill would require the commission members, who act as a jury, to be informed if such a step is taken and instruct them to grant appropriate weight to the evidence, according to a copy of the draft.

That extra step, not included in the administration's proposal, was added to Hunter's proposal after the military's top lawyers testified last week that not allowing a defendant access to evidence would undermine the court's credibility.

"Our foremost consideration in writing this legislation was to protect American troops and American citizens from harm," Hunter said in a statement Monday.

John Hutson, a former Navy judge advocate general and critic of the administration's plan, said Hunter's legislation would not represent a notable departure from the White House position. "It doesn't in any way solve the problem" of ensuring a defendant can dispute a false charge, said Hutson, now president and dean of Franklin Pierce Law Center in Concord, N.H.

Hunter's proposal includes other slight deviations from the administration proposal, including a requirement that no fewer than nine members of the commission be present in a case involving a potential death sentence. The administration bill could allow five members to deliver a death sentence in certain cases.

Hunter's bill also says the administration would be given authority to convene commissions only in the cases of "alien illegal enemy combatants." The administration's plan is said to seek broader authority for the president.

Being allowed access to evidence is considered a fundamental right in civilian and military courts for a defendant to mount an adequate defense. President Bush's proposal, delivered to Congress last week, would let a defense counsel with security clearance see the information but not show it to a client.

The provision has been a major sticking point in negotiations between the White House and Warner. Warner, working with Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., are expected to insist upon their position that a defendant be allowed access to all evidence.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Monday he wants to vote on the legislation by the end of the month and hopes the memory of the Sept. 11 attacks will help rally lawmakers behind the White House proposal.

Frist and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell traveled last weekend to the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba to hear from the "front lines" on the detainee and interrogation program.

"The goal is to make sure our government, whether it's intelligence or armed forces, has the tools we need to prevent the attack we all solemnly recognize today," Frist said.

McConnell, R-Ky., said the program has helped prevent attacks since 2001. The administration has often been criticized for not implementing changes to improve security against terrorism.

"Among the things we're doing right is glean information" from terrorists, he said.

The leaders said they did not visit the 14 "high-value" detainees recently transferred to Guantanamo from the CIA's secret prison system. The terror suspects' cases are considered the driving force behind the administration's proposal; because of a Supreme Court ruling in June that determined Bush's tribunal system was illegal, the president wants to pass legislation allowing it to move forward with the prosecutions.

"Our job here is to make sure we do get it right," Frist said.

White House Gains Concessions In Senate Measure On Tribunals (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration has won concessions from key Senate Republicans in proposed legislation on standards for detainee treatment and the rules for military trials of terrorism suspects, although some disagreements persist between the lawmakers and the White House, Senate sources said yesterday.

The disagreements that remain involve whether suspects can be convicted with evidence they are never allowed to see, an approach favored by the administration but opposed by the Republican senators. The two sides also still differ over the terms of a related amendment to the U.S. War Crimes Act that would limit the exposure of CIA officials and other civilian personnel to prosecution for abusive treatment of detainees, the sources said.

In a sign that Congress is nonetheless preparing to act quickly to establish "military commissions," as the trials are known, and provide other legal relief sought by the administration, the Senate trio at odds with the White House circulated a revised bill yesterday containing their concessions.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) last week had circulated a draft that diverged more sharply from the White House's version. But President Bush's speech on the plan Wednesday, when he announced his intention to put 14 key terrorism suspects on trial, has made Senate Republicans more wary of bucking the White House.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), meanwhile, announced yesterday that he has drafted a competing bill that closely tracks the administration's preferences. He said it would be marked up by his committee on Wednesday.

Lawmakers thus will be considering three bills -- the Senate and House bills plus the administration's own bill -- that contain many provisions the administration has sought. This prospect has raised concerns among human rights groups and defense attorneys who say the plans offer inadequate protections for defendants and would set a precedent for the use of similarly worrisome rules at foreign trials of captured U.S. personnel.

The Senate bill for the first time includes language supporting the administration's position that detainee abuse can be prosecuted only if it, in effect, "shocks the conscience." Legal experts say that instead of setting an absolute standard for conduct, the bill's language would leave room for judges to weigh the urgency of the information extracted from detainees during rough interrogations.

The revised Senate bill also would bar detainees held by the United States from bringing legal action against the government to challenge the legality of their detention or treatment. It would bar the collection of damages by detainees for violations of the Geneva Conventions, which set the minimum standards for wartime treatment. Both provisions were sought by the administration, although their language is not as sweeping as the White House preferred.

The new Senate draft also requires that any evidence used at trial be declassified or summarized, a provision the administration strongly opposes. Under the measures, the military judge presiding over a trial could dismiss charges if the government refuses to turn over evidence to the defendant.

The Senate draft also contains other provisions the administration opposes, including one that would allow the prosecution of U.S. personnel for any degrading treatment of detainees and another that would prohibit the use of evidence obtained through cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. It further defines those subject to future military trials as people engaged in anti-U.S. hostilities, a narrower definition than the White House prefers.

Senate sources said they could not predict whether a compromise or showdown with the White House is looming. Although Warner has told colleagues he expects his version of the bill to win his committee's approval and move rapidly to the Senate floor, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has said he would bring the White House version of the bill to a vote first.

Yesterday, CIA Director Michael V. Hayden went to Capitol Hill to lobby senators for the administration's version of the bill.

The dispute over detainee treatment has been particularly awkward for McCain, a former prisoner of war who is a contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. Detainee treatment is one of McCain's signature political issues, and last year he forced the administration to accept a bill that prohibits cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment by the military.

Senate sources say that because of his political ambitions McCain has been wary of depending on Senate Democrats to provide the margin of victory for his provisions over White House opposition and has compromised to gain more widespread support from Republicans. A spokeswoman for Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) said she now supports the McCain bill.

Human Rights First, the Center for Victims of Torture and five other activist groups released a joint letter yesterday condemning the administration's version of the bill as "shockingly radical" and asserting that it would violate "fundamental notions of due process."

Graham Thinks Terror Trial Bill Fatally Flawed (TSSC)

By James Rosen

The State (SC), September 12, 2006

SENECA — U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham says he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them.

Graham, a military lawyer and a colonel in the Air Force Reserve, read the White House bill late Thursday on a flight from Washington to Greenville. He pored through the 86-page document until, on page 34, he reached a clause that would prohibit defense lawyers from sharing classified information with defendants they represent. He marked it with a red pen.

"That's the killer," the S.C. Republican said. "I fell over when I read it."

Graham said he supports 90 percent of the bill, which Bush sent to Congress on Wednesday. But "I don't feel good about telling someone — no matter who they are — 'We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why.'"

"It's a bridge too far, and it's not necessary," Graham said. "It will result in putting the (military) commissions in legal jeopardy and eroding our standing in the world community."

Graham, 51, said every general and admiral at the top of the country's military justice system agrees that classified information can be shared with accused terrorists without jeopardizing national security.

"I believe the accused should see that evidence," Maj. Gen. Scott Black, the judge advocate general of the Army, told the House Armed Services Committee on Thursday.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has given the Armed Services Committee until Tuesday to produce a bill, Graham said. The panel's chairman, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, and Sen. John McCain share Graham's view on the handling of classified evidence, setting up a possible clash in the Senate.

Graham said Frist has vowed to bring Bush's bill directly to the Senate floor Tuesday. Graham said he agrees with Frist that Congress must act soon so terrorist trials can begin at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bush called on lawmakers to pass his tribunals measure quickly so detainees can be tried. The president increased the political pressure by disclosing that 14 senior al-Qaida members, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, were being sent to Guantanamo Bay from secret CIA prisons overseas.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that the Bush administration had exceeded its authority in establishing military tribunals without congressional action, prompting the need for legislation.

The case was brought by lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Guantanamo detainee who had been a chauffeur for Osama bin Laden.

"The Hamdan decision has reinforced our need to ensure that military commissions are reflective of American values such as due process and the rule of law," Gen. Black, the head of the Army's legal apparatus, testified Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0061740

Senior lawyers at the White House, the Justice Department and the Pentagon argue that allowing terrorists to see classified evidence could expose how the U.S. has pursued al-Qaida and would put informants within the terror network in danger. But Graham said he's certain the Supreme Court would reject a law that denies accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"It would be a tragedy to take one of the masterminds of 9/11, hold them accountable, only to have the case rejected by the Supreme Court for no good reason," Graham said.

"I'm frustrated when people say we're trying to give terrorists classified information," he said. "Well, that's garbage. We're going to protect our classified information, and we're going to protect our methods and sources."

Graham said that if his differences with the White House cannot be bridged, he is prepared to push an amendment giving accused terrorists access to classified evidence against them.

"I think I will draft an amendment that will get majority support in the Senate, and there will be plenty of Republicans voting for it," Graham said. "I'm just predicting that we win. I don't know by what margin."

The House is set to take up tribunals legislation the week of Sept. 18.

Air Force Col. Morris Davis, who would run the Guantanamo trials, said accused terrorists will get fair trials, and his corps of lawyers will work with whatever legislation Congress passes.

U.S. Appeals Ruling On American Held In Iraq (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 (AP) — Government lawyers said Monday that American courts had no authority to stop the military from transferring an American citizen to an Iraqi court to face charges that he supported terrorists and insurgents.

Shawqi Omar, a citizen of both Jordan and the United States who once served in the Minnesota National Guard, was captured in Iraq in 2004. He is being held at Camp Bucca, a prison in southern Iraq, where his family says he has not been charged or allowed to speak with a lawyer.

His family is demanding that Mr. Omar be brought before an American court, where prosecutors would have to show probable cause for detaining him and he could consult with a lawyer.

The military, which says Mr. Omar was harboring insurgents and had bomb-making materials at the time of his arrest, wants to transfer him to an Iraqi court. A judge blocked that transfer in February.

On appeal Monday before the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, government lawyers said American courts did not have jurisdiction because Mr. Omar was being held by a multinational force, not the American military.

Defense lawyers say that is a legal gimmick.

The three-judge panel hearing the case also expressed skepticism, saying the government's theory might allow the military to arrest someone inside the United States and hold him without due process under the guise of a multinational force.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre said that would not happen, but the judges noted that it could. The judges also seemed wary of saying courts had no jurisdiction over an American citizen being held by his country's military.

Lawyers for Mr. Omar's family say he is innocent and is likely to be tortured if handed over to the Iraqi government. They say he is a businessman who was seeking reconstruction contracts in Iraq.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Gag Orders Lifted (NBH)

By Sara Capozzi

New Britain (CT) Herald, September 12, 2006

PLAINVILLE - American life has changed considerably in the five years since the terrorist attacks and those changes can be felt in the most unexpected places, even if they are not always seen or heard.

Public libraries in mid-sized Central Connecticut towns are not likely places for an FBI investigation involving a perceived threat to national security, but unbeknownst to their patrons and the majority of their staff, they were in the midst of one last summer.

In late June 2005, Library Connection Inc., a non-profit consortium of 26 central Connecticut libraries, received a National Security letter from the FBI, involving a top-secret investigation of patron Internet usage.

Subsequently, four executive members of the consortium were placed under life-long gag orders, made possible through the Patriot Act, which does not require court evidence or oversight. Although the names of the John Does were to be kept secret by the government, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union found the government had failed to redact one mention of Director of Plainville Public Library Peter Chase's name and other identifying information from the legal documents. From the identifying information that was not omitted, it didn't take long until the national press had identified Chase and the other John Does.

Soon, Chase was being bombarded with calls from newspapers all over the country and even in Japan and France. But even after all the media attention, the government would not allow the gag order to be lifted.

Through the ACLU, the four consortium members, Chase, George Christian, Library Connection Executive Director, Barbara Bailey, librarian at Glastonbury's Welles Turner Library and Janet Nocek, librarian at Portland Public Library, fought the gag order against Connecticut United States Attorney Kevin O'Connor under the alias John Doe.

Bridgeport Superior Court ruled the law was unconstitutional and the government appealed that decision, later withdrawing the appeal in May 2006, thus releasing the four librarians from the gag order.

The government had said other sections of the legal documents were blacked out for National Security, but when the original, previously sealed documents were released Aug. 30, it was clear one of the items omitted under the guise of National Security was actually a CT General Statute that deems all circulation resources in public libraries confidential.

"What made me so angry about this is that when usually someone like Kevin O'Connor ... says this is a matter of national security, you believe him," Chase said.

"You don't want to pry into stuff like that. No one wants to do something that would harm the nation. But he in fact was using that as an excuse to cover up that Connecticut had a public statute that protected these laws. He wasn't telling the truth."

Chase called the power given to the government through the Patriot Act, "frightening," in terms of the personal freedoms of Americans.

He said patrons should be able to check out some controversial titles which the Plainville library owns such as Hitler's autobiography "Mien Kampf" and the "Communist Manifesto" without fear.

"Just because you read [the Communist Manifesto] doesn't mean you're a communist," Chase said. "And if you read "Mien Kamf" it doesn't mean you're a Nazi. But you should be able to take that out in privacy. People shouldn't be spying on what you're reading, what you're researching on the Internet. That should be a private confidential matter and in fact is recognized as such in state law." There were 150,000 letters issued up to the date the revisions to the Patriot Act were made, Chase said. Chase and the other three plaintiffs were the only people out of possibly thousands who had their lifetime gag orders lifted.

Now that they are free to speak out, Chase, Christian, Bailey and Nocek plan to continue to speak publicly against the Patriot Act. They are planning to attend a press conference in Washington D.C. on Sept. 28 and a forum with O'Connor at the Hartford's Old State House next month.

"This is a significant attack on American democracy," Chase said. "We've always said people should be free to say what they want, people have to be free to read what they want and this is an attack on our country, on the principals that we have supported and fought for for all these years."

Chase and the other librarians still do not know what or who the FBI was looking for through its investigation. He said the library has no problem giving the government information through court orders if it would help with a criminal investigation.

"They don't have to explain to us what they're investigating - we don't care," he said. "We just want to know their investigation is legitimate."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush: Set Aside Differences On Terrorism (AP)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

The AP, September 12, 2006

Five years after the worst attack on U.S. soil, President Bush said Monday night the war against terrorism is "the calling of our generation" and urged Americans to put aside differences and fight to victory.

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over," Bush said in a prime-time address from the Oval Office. "The war is not over — and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

Bush also staunchly defended the war in Iraq though he acknowledged that Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people.

His address came at the end of a day in which he visited New York, Pennsylvania and the Pentagon to honor victims of the attacks that rocked his presidency and thrust the United States into a costly and unfinished war against terror.

"We are now in the early hours of this struggle between tyranny and freedom," the president said.

As for Iraq, he said Saddam's regime, while lacking weapons of mass destruction, was a threat that posed "a risk the world could not afford to take." At least 2,670 U.S. servicemen and women have died in Iraq, which Bush calls the central front in the war on terror.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone," the president said. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us."

The nation is split over the war in Iraq and Bush's handling of it, and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., accused Bush of playing politics.

"This should have been an occasion to bring everyone together, and focus on the tragedy, the many we lost, and the heroism of those who embodied the American spirit," Schumer said. "You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it."

Earlier, Bush visited a New York fire station, the wind-swept field in Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon to place wreaths and console relatives of attack victims.

"Five years ago, this date — Sept. 11 — was seared into America's memory," the president said. "Nineteen men attacked us with a barbarity unequaled in our history."

Bush said that Osama bin Laden, the mastermind of the attack, and other terrorists are still in hiding. He said, "Our message to them is clear: No matter how long it takes, America will find you and we will bring you to justice."

Bush said the war on terror was nothing less than "a struggle for civilization" and must be fought to the end. He said defeat would surrender the Middle East to radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons.

"We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations," the president said. Two months before the November elections, he attempted to spell out in graphic terms the stakes he sees in the unpopular war in Iraq and the broader war on terror.

He said Islamic radicals are trying to build an empire "where women are prisoners in their homes, men are beaten for missing prayer meetings and terrorists have a safe haven to plan and launch attacks on America and other civilized nations."

"The war against this enemy is more than a military conflict," the president said. "It is the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century and the calling of our generation."

Five years ago, the attacks transformed Bush's presidency and awakened the world to bin Laden and his band of al-Qaida terrorists. While the public has soured on the war in Iraq, the president still gets high marks for his handling of Sept. 11.

Terrorism has been a potent political issue for Republicans, and they hope to capitalize on it in the elections. GOP lawmakers are anxious about holding control of both houses of Congress.

Congress has approved $432 billion for Iraq and the war on terrorism.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," the president said. He quoted bin Laden as calling Iraq "the Third World War."

"Our nation has endured trials, and we face a difficult road ahead," the president said. "Winning this war will require the determined efforts of a unified country. So we must put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

While Bush urged resolve, the two co-chairs of the 9/11 Commission accused the Bush administration and Congress of a lack of urgency in protecting the country. About half of their 41 recommendations to better secure Americans, offered in July 2004, have become law.

"Where in the world have we been for five years?" said former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., who was joined by his Republican counterpart, former New Jersey Gov. Tom Kean. Hamilton spoke of failures to put first responders on the same radio spectrum so they can talk to each other during an emergency — as firefighters and police officers who died in the World Trade Center could not in 2001.

The 9/11 attacks changed the political tone in Washington and abroad — but only briefly.

"We had an astonishing moment of unity in America and around the world," former President Clinton told a Jewish conference in Washington. That has given way to bitter political divisions between Democrats and Republicans. Many nations that rushed to stand with the United States now accuse the Bush administration of failing to honor human rights, tolerance and diversity of cultures.

Still, dozens of lawmakers, Republicans and Democrats alike, joined on the steps of the Capitol Monday to remember the attacks, singing "God Bless America" as they had five years ago.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said Monday, "Five years later, we have to continue to move forward with unity, urgency and in the spirit of international cooperation, because we are not yet fully healed and not yet as safe as we should be."

Bush began the day in New York with firefighters and police officers at a Lower East Side firehouse. He stood in front of a door salvaged from a fire truck destroyed on Sept. 11. It was a cloudless morning reminiscent of the sunny day when two hijacked planes slammed into the twin towers of the World Trade Center.

The mourners silently bowed their heads, at 8:46 a.m. and again at 9:03 a.m., marking the moments when the planes slammed into the towers. The attacks killed 2,749 people.

Bush spent time talking with the first responders about what they had been through the last five years, spokesman Tony Snow said.

The next stop was in Shanksville, Pa., where Bush and his wife stood without umbrellas in a chilly rain to lay a wreath honoring the 40 passengers and crew killed when United Airlines Flight 93 plowed into a Pennsylvania field. The terrorists apparently had been planning on crashing the plane into the White House or the Capitol until passengers stormed the cockpit to take control.

Bush had an emotional meeting with relatives of the Shanksville victims. "There were some people who were still clearly grieving about what happened five years ago," Snow said.

Bush: 'The War Is Not Over' (LAT)

By Faye Fiore And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush led the nation on Monday in marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, making a solemn journey to the three sites where hijacked planes crashed in the terror strikes and declaring, in an evening address, that America's safety "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Until speaking to the nation from the Oval Office, the president commemorated the attacks quietly, attending ceremonies at three symbolic sites: a New York City firehouse, a grassy field in rural Pennsylvania and the mended Pentagon.

But with eight weeks until congressional elections in which national security is a dominant issue, Bush and other political leaders continued to battle over whether the nation had learned the proper lessons from the Sept. 11 attacks and was prepared to prevent new ones.

Bush's 16-minute speech reflected on the nearly 3,000 lives lost on Sept. 11 but also used dire warnings to caution that terrorists still intend to harm the country, and that Iraq remains the central front in stopping them. He repeated the themes he has laid out in a recent string of speeches designed to shore up flagging public support for the Iraq war and for his leadership on national security, which has left Republicans nervous about their prospects in the November elections.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone," Bush said. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Speaking more broadly of the fight against terrorists who aim to build a "radical Islamic empire," Bush said: "America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I. But the war is not over — and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

"This struggle has been called a clash of civilizations," he said. "In truth, it is a struggle for civilization. We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations."

Democrats said they were surprised by the muscular tone of the speech, after a day of carefully choreographed remembrances. They accused the president of trying to turn a solemn occasion to partisan advantage.

"This should have been an occasion to bring everyone together and focus on the tragedy…. You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Bush "should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning … to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had 'nothing' to do with 9/11."

"The president's misuse of the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attack shows he'll go to any lengths to divert attention from his failures in Iraq — failures that have diverted focus from the war on terrorism," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

The speech capped a day in which the president fulfilled a ceremonial role in leading the nation in mourning and remembrance. During his visits to New York, Pennsylvania and the Pentagon, Bush spoke not a word in public, but his face — tight-lipped with eyes downcast — suggested the welling of emotions that marked the day.

In ceremonies at the Pentagon, Bush stood at the point of impact and presented a lily wreath. He and First Lady Laura Bush, both dressed in black, appeared drawn as they shook hands and hugged the families of those who died there. At one point, the president appeared to wipe away tears.

In a similar fashion, other political leaders marked the day with solemnity and ceremony, even while pressing the political battle over which party could best lead the nation in a post-Sept. 11 world.

Vice President Dick Cheney, in a morning speech at the Pentagon, took a swipe at Democrats calling for a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq. "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power," Cheney said, quoting a 2002 speech by the president.

The word "appeasement" has carried an additional political charge in recent weeks, after Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld compared critics of the Iraq war with politicians who sought to appease Hitler.

During a ceremony at dusk outside the Capitol, where lawmakers from both parties marked the anniversary, Pelosi seemed to insert a partisan note, saying that "right now we are not fully safe and we are not fully healed."

Al Qaeda, the perpetrator of the Sept. 11 attacks, also sought to put its stamp on the day. The terrorist group's No. 2 leader warned in a videotape that it would strike Persian Gulf nations and Israel to damage the U.S. economy.

The political skirmishing echoed a debate of increasing intensity in Washington as the two major political parties position themselves for the November elections.

Democrats argue that the Iraq war has distracted the nation from the unfinished work of tracking down Al Qaeda leaders and securing ports, rail systems and nuclear materials. Bush and the Republican Party have been trying to rebuild support for the Iraq war and burnish their credentials as those best suited to protect the nation from future attacks.

Throughout the day from New York to Washington and across the country, bells tolled, wreaths were laid and prayers were spoken. In one moving tribute, in New York, Bush honored the memory of scores of firefighters. He stood beside the battered door of a truck that belonged to Ladder Co. 18, dented and covered with grime from the billowing fallout of the collapsed World Trade Center.

Rumsfeld was visibly moved at a Pentagon memorial, where he stood in a steady mist.

"I remember working — working our way through that long, tragic day," he said haltingly, choking back emotion.

Rumsfeld invoked images of bipartisanship, recalling how Democrats and Republicans stood together at the Capitol after the attacks and sang "God Bless America." He said making "every effort to stay united as a country" would be a good way to pay tribute to Sept. 11 victims.

Some in Washington took the occasion to advance a possible run for president. In a speech to the mostly conservative American Enterprise Institute, Newt Gingrich, the former Republican House speaker and potential candidate in 2008, criticized the administration.

"We are not where we wanted to be nor where we need to be," Gingrich said. "We have not captured Bin Laden. We have not defeated the Taliban…. We have not stopped the recruitment of young fanatics into terrorism."

Even those with less partisan interest in the debate seized the moment to advance an agenda. Republican Thomas H. Kean and Democrat Lee Hamilton — chairman and vice chairman of the bipartisan commission that investigated the attacks and the government's response — said bureaucracy had blocked implementation of many of the panel's recommendations to improve security and intelligence-gathering.

Former President Clinton, blamed in an ABC docudrama for failing to pay sufficient attention to looming Al Qaeda threats, addressed a Jewish charitable organization at a Washington hotel. Without mentioning Bush or the Republican Party, Clinton urged renewed efforts to stabilize Afghanistan, where the Taliban has recently gained strength.

"We need more troops," he said, noting there were almost seven times as many U.S. soldiers in Iraq as in Afghanistan. "We can't practice hit-and-run democracy."

Clinton also sounded a familiar Democratic theme that the nation is not as safe as it could be, faulting the administration for failing to improve inspections of ship and plane cargo, as well as of chemical and nuclear plants.

"They say it's a matter of costs, but it can't be," Clinton said. Hailing a new method for inspecting cargo electronically, he said the technology would cost $840 million a year, "and we've already spent over $300 billion on the war in Iraq."

Polls show that 95% of Americans surveyed remember exactly where they were when they learned of the attacks. For most of them, Monday was a day of remembering what few have forgotten, this time laced with a political message.

In Prime-Time Address, Bush Says Safety Of U.S. Hinges On Iraq (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — President Bush used the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks on Monday to tell Americans that they were engaged in "a struggle for civilization" that would be determined in part by the course of the war in Iraq.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," Mr. Bush said.

In a prime-time speech from the Oval Office, delivered after a day of solemn ceremonies, Mr. Bush sought to place the war in Iraq in the context of an epic battle between tyranny and freedom, saying the campaign against global terrorism was "the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century and the calling of our generation."

"If we do not defeat these enemies now," Mr. Bush said, "we will leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons."

The address capped a week of speeches in which Mr. Bush tried to lay out his best case for the war in Iraq by defining it as a crucial front in the war on terror, while portraying the broader struggle as a natural successor to World War II and the Cold War in defining the place of the United States in the world.

Even by the standards of his latest round of speeches, Mr. Bush's language was particularly forceful, even ominous, with warnings of a radical Islamic network that was "determined to bring death and suffering to our homes."

Mr. Bush spent roughly one-fifth of his 17-minute address making the case that the nation's safety hinged on success in Iraq, even as he implicitly acknowledged there was no link between Saddam Hussein and the Sept. 11 strikes.

"I'm often asked why we're in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," Mr. Bush said, going on to say that Mr. Hussein was a threat nonetheless, that he needed to be confronted and that the world was safer with him in captivity.

And Mr. Bush reprised some of his tougher talk against Osama bin Laden, delivering a message to him and other terrorists, "America will find you, and we will bring you to justice."

Mr. Bush gave his address at the end of a tour through the three major attack sites — Lower Manhattan; Shanksville, Pa.; and the Pentagon — in which he attended ceremonies and spoke with the bereaved but made no public comments.

He gave the speech from behind his desk at a fast clip, but with a furrowed brow and circles below his eyes. He delivered it five years to the minute of when he addressed the nation from the same seat on the evening of Sept. 11, 2001, and proclaimed that those who harbored terrorists would be dealt with as if they were terrorists themselves.

Drawing parallels between the challenges of his presidency and those of Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman, Mr. Bush said, "Our nation has endured trials, and we face a difficult road ahead." And he called for unity, saying, "We must put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

All of the networks carried the address live; ABC ran it during a break in its miniseries about the attacks that portrayed the Clinton and Bush administrations as having failed at times to move aggressively enough against Al Qaeda before the attacks.

Mr. Bush's address brought to a close a day when leaders of both parties put aside, at least for the moment, the acrimony that has characterized the national security debate since the brief period of national unity after the attacks. But as soon as the speech was over, the partisanship flared again. Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said the president "should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning" to justify his Iraq policy. And Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, leader of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, called the address disappointing, saying, "You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it."

Hours earlier, Congressional leaders joined on the Capitol steps to sing "God Bless America," an effort to recreate their spontaneous moment of post-attack comity. And the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid — whose press office is ordinarily a clearinghouse for hard-charging attacks on the president and Republican leadership — released a statement that read in part, "The light that shone on Sept. 11 cannot die, it cannot be dimmed, it cannot fail."

But it was the president's day that dominated a news media environment that was swimming in the imagery of Sept. 11, with the cable news networks offering blanket coverage of the day's ceremonies, mixed with remembrances from survivors, first responders, officials and politicians.

Before speaking from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush had spent the day in public silence as he and Laura Bush visited the three sites scarred by the attacks, a solemn trek that began at ground zero Sunday night.

The Bushes began their day at the Fort Pitt firehouse on the Lower East Side of Manhattan, where they observed back-to-back moments of silence — one at the precise moment each of the twin towers was struck. They then moved to Shanksville, Pa., where Mr. and Mrs. Bush laid a wreath in a spitting rain in the field where United Airlines Flight 93 crashed, and wound up at the Pentagon, where the weight of the day showed on their faces.

It was an emotional and somber, if carefully scripted, day for the Bushes, designed by the White House to maximize the president's exposure but minimize his words before the evening speech.

At the Pentagon, Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld presided over a memorial service that was occasionally interrupted by the eerie roar of commercial jets from nearby Ronald Reagan National Airport.

Addressing a crowd of 500 that included relatives of victims, Mr. Cheney said the United States would keep pressing the fight. "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power," Mr. Cheney said, quoting the president and reprising a theme that has been taken by critics as a veiled effort to portray Democrats as appeasing the enemy.

Also speaking at the service, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, said the number of American military personnel killed in Afghanistan and Iraq, at roughly 3,000, was approaching the number of people killed in the attacks.

Teresa Taylor of New Hampshire, who attended in honor of her brother-in-law, Leonard E. Taylor, said she was moved by Mr. Rumsfeld's recounting of the day of the attacks, given in halting voice. "It brought back a lot of memories," she said.

But Shannon Mason of Springfield, Va., called the ceremony "too political" for coupling the attacks with the war in Iraq. Ms. Mason, whose mother, Ada Mason, a Pentagon budget analyst, was killed in the attack, added, "I think the war has nothing to do with Sept. 11."

Even as he called for unity Mr. Bush alluded to Democratic calls for a timetable to withdraw from Iraq, saying, "Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone."

Bush: Vigilance Is Key In War On Terrorism (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush ended a somber day marking the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks with a call for unity and a plea for Americans to gird themselves for "the calling of our generation" — a long fight against terrorism.

"The war against this enemy is more than a military conflict," he said, a reference to wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "It is the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century."

With control of Congress at stake in the Nov. 7 elections, both parties have been trying to use the Iraq war to their advantage. Numerous polls have shown declining support for the war and the president's handling of it.

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters earlier in the day that the speech would not be political. One political analyst suggested that is an impossible task less than two months before Election Day.

"There is controversy about whether Iraq is a front in the war on terrorism, or whether it has increased terrorism," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center of the University of Pennsylvania. "The moment is political because of the elections and Iraq."

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who heads his party's Senate campaign committee, called the speech "disappointing." He said, "You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it."

Bush defended his decision to invade Iraq in 2003 even though he said the country's now-deposed leader "was not responsible" for 9/11. "The regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat," the president said, adding that it "posed a risk that the world could not afford to take."

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," he said.

During his 17-minute, nationally televised address, Bush repeatedly couched the battle ahead as one that goes beyond Iraqi battlefields and compared it to the Cold War.

Bush said the key to victory is the same: forge democracy in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. "One of the strongest weapons in our arsenal," Bush said, "is the power of freedom.

"This struggle has been called a clash of civilizations," Bush said of actions that have included wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "In truth, it is a struggle for civilization."

Bush noted the security and law enforcement improvements since the 9/11 attacks, including more cooperation between law enforcement and intelligence agencies and tightened airport security. He said the country is safer but needs to remain vigilant.

"Our enemies have not succeeded in launching another attack on our soil, but they have not been idle," he said.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone."

Bush Says Iraq Victory Is Vital (WP)

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

President Bush mixed solemn remembrance of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks yesterday with a renewed call to complete the mission in Iraq, paying tribute to the fallen even while warning Americans that failure in the Middle East would leave the United States more vulnerable than ever to Islamic extremists.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq," Bush said last night in a prime-time address from the Oval Office, "the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

That ominous language capped an emotional day that took Bush to each of the three locations where terrorists crashed hijacked planes five years ago and killed nearly 3,000 people. It also marked the culmination of a new White House campaign to tie what polls show is a unpopular war in Iraq to a broader campaign against Islamic radicals who, as Bush put it last night, are "determined to bring death and suffering into our homes."

In weaving the two issues together last night, Bush melded one of the most unifying events in recent national experience -- the common horror and sadness of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon -- with one of the most polarizing, the war in Iraq. "I am often asked why we are in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," Bush said.

"The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat," the president said, tapping his desk for emphasis. "The world is safer because Saddam Hussein is no longer in power."

Bush's 16-minute address closed a day of mournful ceremonies for him and the nation. After a memorial service near Ground Zero in New York City, Bush flew to Shanksville, Pa., where he and first lady Laura Bush met family members of the victims and placed a wreath on the makeshift memorial near the spot where the hijacked United Flight 93 aircraft slammed into a field.

They traveled next to the Pentagon, where they placed a large, white floral wreath on the new stone facade on the section of building that was destroyed by the attack. The Bushes silently faced the wall while a military band played "America the Beautiful."

The president's painstakingly choreographed day was intended by the White House to recapture -- at least for a moment -- the sense of shared purpose that prevailed in the immediate aftermath of the terrorist attacks.

But Bush faced a tall order. Although he urged Americans last night to "put aside our differences," Democrats have been attacking the administration over Iraq and Bush's national security record, hoping these issues will help them reclaim one or both chambers of Congress in November. Polls suggest the public does not accept Bush's contention that the war in Iraq is a "central front" in the campaign against terrorists.

Last night, Democrats said Bush politicized the Sept. 11 anniversary. "The president should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning to commandeer the airwaves to give a speech that was designed not to unite the country and commemorate the fallen, but to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had 'nothing' to do with 9/11," said Sen Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Bush has sought to shift public opinion in the past two weeks with speeches aimed at explaining the nature and goals of radical Islamists and putting the war in Iraq in a broader -- and, he hopes, more popular -- context.

His speech last night featured many of the themes highlighted in those speeches: the idea that the United States is facing a network of extremists driven by a "perverted vision of Islam," the notion that the Middle East enjoyed a long period of false stability in the years leading up to the Sept. 11 attacks, and the proposition that the government has made serious strides in protecting the United States from terrorist attack.

"Today we are safer," Bush told the nation, "but we are not yet safe."

Bush also paid tribute to the firefighters and others who lost their lives to the attacks. Even while the nation saw the "face of evil," he said, "we also witnessed something distinctly American: ordinary citizens rising to the occasion and responding with extraordinary acts of courage."

Bush continued: "We saw courage in office workers who were trapped on the high floors of burning skyscrapers -- and called home so that their last words to their families would be of comfort and love. We saw courage in passengers aboard Flight 93, who recited the 23rd Psalm -- and then charged the cockpit. And we saw courage in the Pentagon staff who made it out of the flames and smoke -- and ran back in to answer cries for help."

Sitting at his desk in the Oval Office, Bush said the nation "is being tested in a way that we have not been since the start of the Cold War." He described the battle against radical Islamists "a struggle for civilization."

Before his speech, the president made no remarks at public appearances yesterday. He met privately with police and firefighters to reassure them that he remains committed to fighting terrorism, and with people who lost loved ones in the attacks.

After attending a memorial service and placing twin wreaths at the World Trade Center site Sunday evening, the president started yesterday having breakfast with first responders at a firehouse not far from Ground Zero. Afterward, he and his wife stood silently next to a battered firetruck door rescued from the wreckage of the World Trade Center site, as police officers and firefighters listened to Scripture and song to honor the dead.

The group paused at 8:46 a.m. and at 9:03 a.m. for moments of silence marking the times that two hijacked planes plowed into the twin towers.

In Shanksville, Bush heard from the Rev. Paul M. Britton, a Long Island minister whose sister, Marion Britton, was aboard United Flight 93. "There is no more sacred ground on this your Earth than this very place," Britton said. "We come here with heavy hearts, yet with joyful spirits. We come here to honor them, to respect them."

Fletcher reported from New York.

'A Struggle For Civilization' (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK -- President Bush yesterday led the nation in silent remembrances for the almost 3,000 victims of the September 11 attacks, hugging family members and standing solemnly for each moment of silence at the three sites where terrorists crashed four hijacked planes that sunny Tuesday morning five years ago.

After the stops in New York, Pennsylvania and Virginia, the president addressed the nation last night, reminding Americans that ever since the worst terrorist attacks on U.S. soil, the United States has been at war in "a struggle for civilization."

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I. But the war is not over, and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious," Mr. Bush said. "We are in a war that will set the course for this new century and determine the destiny of millions across the world."

With midterm congressional elections less than two months away and Democrats charging that Mr. Bush is politicizing the fifth anniversary of September 11, the president urged unity and condemned partisan politics.

"Our nation has endured trials, and we face a difficult road ahead. Winning this war will require the determined efforts of a unified country," he said. "So we must put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

At New York's ground zero, a solemn hush fell over the chasm where the Twin Towers once stood. Thousands of people bowed their heads at 8:46 a.m. to mark the time a plane hijacked by al Qaeda militants slammed into the first tower of the World Trade Center.

Seven stories down in the gaping hole where the 110-story skyscrapers once towered over Lower Manhattan, family members who had come to lay roses in a makeshift reflecting pool fell silent again at 9:03 a.m., when the second tower was struck. Twice more, to mark the moments when each tower collapsed, those in the 16-acre pit fell silent.

"Five years from the date of the attack that changed our world, we've come back to remember the valor of those we lost, those who innocently went to work that day and the brave souls who went in after them," said Rudolph W. Giuliani, New York's mayor during the attacks.

In Virginia, at an early morning Pentagon ceremony to honor the 184 persons killed there, Vice President Dick Cheney also urged Americans to stay united and persevere in the global battle against terror and the war in Iraq.

"In the conduct of this war, the world has seen the best that is in our country," Mr. Cheney said. "We will never forget the day the war began, or the way the war began. Our thoughts remain with the victims of 9/11."

In Shanksville, Pa., on a windswept hillside in a cold drizzle, the president laid a wreath on the spot where United Flight 93 crashed after passengers battled hijackers, whose intentions were likely to strike the U.S. Capitol or White House. He and first lady Laura Bush bowed their heads during a prayer and the singing of "Amazing Grace." Nearby, bells tolled in memory of the 40 victims, and afterward, the president shook hands with each family member.

"One moment, ordinary citizens, and the next, heroes forever," retired Gen. Tommy Franks said. "We mourn their loss, to be sure, but we also celebrate their victory here in the first battle on terrorism."

The president said the passengers aboard Flight 93 "gave America our first victory in the war on terror."

But ground zero, virtually unchanged since the first anniversary, remained the focal point of the commemorations. Thousands of family members and friends of victims descended a long ramp to the bottom of the rubble-strewn pit, where they floated roses into the pool and wrote messages on surrounding wooden planks.

Above the hole, the husbands, wives and other loved ones of those who perished read the names of all who perished there in an emotional three-hour reading.

"If I could build a staircase to heaven, I would, just so I could quickly run up there to have you back in my arms," said Carmen Suarez, wife of police officer Ramon Suarez, who was killed after he rushed into one of the towers.

The president began his day with a breakfast with New York firefighters and police officers, a day after he and the first lady laid a wreath in both ground zero reflecting pools in the footprints of the North and South towers.

"It's hard not to think about the people who lost their lives on September the 11th, 2001. You know, you see the relatives of those who still grieve. -- I just wish there were some way we could make them whole," he said Sunday.

In his speech last night, the president framed the war on terror within the September 11 anniversary and said Americans have renewed their faith because of the devastating attacks.

"The attacks were meant to bring us to our knees, and they did -- but not in the way the terrorists intended. Americans united in prayer, came to the aid of neighbors in need, and resolved that our enemies would not have the last word. The spirit of our people is the source of America's strength," he said.

The day was emotional for the nation's top leaders, with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld recalling the attacks, and the price paid by the military.

"The highest tribute we can pay to them is to commit ourselves to doing everything possible to fight the extremists wherever they are, to making every effort to stay united as a country and to give our truly outstanding men and women in uniform all they need to succeed," he said.

The ceremonies looked toward the future. Organizers hope to raise $30 million in private funding to build a permanent memorial on a 1,700-acre site in Shanksville; the total cost is estimated to be $58 million. Congress has passed the Flight 93 Memorial.

At ground zero, construction has begun on a September 11 memorial and the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower, which is expected to be finished in five years.

Supporters are still seeking funds for a $22 million memorial park at the Pentagon. Its completion date has been moved back to 2008.

Bush Speaks To A Changed Nation, Where Unity And Clarity Have Evaporated (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — Five years ago, with the World Trade Center and the Pentagon still burning, President Bush faced the difficult task of preparing a shocked nation for war against a single enemy, one that had attacked American soil.

On Monday evening he faced a different, more daunting challenge: to make the case to a skeptical nation that stabilizing and democratizing Iraq was now the most important element of winning that same battle.

For in the end, a speech that began as a commemoration of one of the most searing and painful moments in American history became something else. For much of his 17-minute address from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush in effect acknowledged that his political standing and the success of his avowed mission to make the world safe from Islamic terrorism now rests on victory in Iraq, a mission his critics say was a deadly detour from the task he set out five years ago.

Mr. Bush's aides acknowledged beforehand that it would not be easy. The country Mr. Bush faced on Monday was very different from the shocked, angry but unified nation he addressed from the same chair 1,826 days before. Iraq and its aftermath had changed everything, dividing Americans who five years ago had largely unified around Mr. Bush's strategy, cutting his approval ratings in half and leaving in its wake questions about whether the president had made an ugly confrontation with Islamic extremists worse.

On a day when the White House said it wanted to focus on the victims of 9/11 and their still-grieving survivors, Mr. Bush nonetheless put Iraq front and center. "I am often asked why we are in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," he said, midway through his speech. "The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat," he said, and "posed a risk that the world could not afford to take."

Mr. Bush's aim was to put the arguments about Iraq into a broader context, to try again to change the minds of most Americans who tell pollsters that Iraq was, in retrospect, a dangerous diversion. Along the way, he has expanded the cast of terror groups and nations that America must defeat to regain its sense of security — not only a diminished Al Qaeda and a resurgent Taliban, but also Iranian mullahs and their Syrian neighbors, regional threats like Hezbollah and Hamas, and the Sunni extremists and the Shia militias that are battling for control of Iraq.

"We are now in the early hours of this struggle between tyranny and freedom," Mr. Bush said, describing a conflict with no end in sight.

He had to make the argument, he has told visitors to the White House, because five years after the 9/11 attacks he worries that the country no longer views itself as at war. But his new approach has its own risks.

DOJ_NMG_0061750

"If you conflate all of our problems into one massive, single enemy, you do not define the enemy properly," said Lee H. Hamilton, the former co-chairman of the 9/11 commission. "The risk is that you think you can take them all out with a single strategy. And you alienate the sympathizers, the people who we might be able to talk to."

"And if you don't define your enemy correctly," Mr. Hamilton concluded, "you risk getting your strategy wrong."

That debate over strategy underlies the deeply political element of Mr. Bush's speech, even though the White House insisted that this anniversary was no moment for politics.

The country is eight weeks away from a critical midterm election, at a time that the war in Iraq and the administration's policies on detention, domestic wiretapping and interrogation have made foreign policy a more partisan issue than at any other time in decades. Mr. Bush seemed to acknowledge that when he asked Americans to "put aside our differences and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

He compared the situation now to those faced by Franklin D. Roosevelt in World War II and Harry S. Truman at the dawn of the cold war. But it also had echoes of another era, of a time in 1970 when Richard M. Nixon was urging the country to unify behind a Vietnam War that was expanding into Cambodia.

Mr. Nixon famously warned that night that if "the United States of America acts like a pitiful, helpless giant, the forces of totalitarianism and anarchy will threaten free nations and free institutions throughout the world."

In the current conflict, Mr. Bush made it clear on Monday evening that while the war might have become more complicated, he believes that the choices remain as stark as they were five years ago.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq," he said, nodding to past misjudgments, "the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

To Mr. Bush's admirers, this was the Texan president at his Reaganesque best: defining America's enemies broadly, vowing their defeat and promising to make the spread of freedom his legacy. To his critics, it was Mr. Bush at his most dangerous, approaching the world with little interest in how America is perceived and lumping together its many opponents, even if their agendas and interests are quite different.

"It can be a little spooky," said David M. Kennedy, the Stanford historian whom Mr. Bush has consulted during his periodic Oval Office meetings with outsiders. "It's a war without end, in which our enemies grow like cancerous cells, regrowing as soon as we kill them off."

President Tries To Win Over A War-Weary Nation (WP)

By Dan Balz And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

President Bush's Oval Office speech last night was the culmination of two weeks of efforts to rally the nation behind his policies and presidency by summoning the memory of Sept. 11, 2001. Five years after that indelible day, however, this president's capacity to move the public is severely diminished.

There were echoes of the language and logic Bush invoked five years ago when he united a stricken nation looking to him for both comfort and leadership. But he was speaking to a different nation last night.

Setbacks in Iraq have soured a majority of Americans on that mission. Falsely optimistic predictions of progress have undermined the administration's credibility. A majority of Americans question fundamental elements of the president's argument, including his contention that Iraq is the central front in the campaign against terrorism.

Cumulatively, it leaves decidedly uncertain whether this week's flood of rhetoric and remembrance can alter Bush's perilous circumstances -- at a critical moment for the future of the Iraq mission and the president's own domestic standing 56 days before the midterm elections.

"The power of his rhetoric is in marked decline, and that's no reflection on the quality of what he says, which is still very high," said Max Boot, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and a neoconservative scholar who has been sympathetic to Bush's anti-terrorism policies. "There's a desire in the country for more deeds, not more words. . . . We are losing a war right now, and there is no way to get around that."

Three previous times in the past 18 months, as public opinion has slipped, White House officials have announced that Bush would embark on a renewed effort to explain and defend his Iraq and anti-terrorism policies. None produced a lasting positive effect on how Americans view either the president or his policies.

The events of Sept. 11, 2001, provided Bush with many of the rhetorical high notes of his administration, from his bullhorn exhortation atop the rubble of Ground Zero three days after the attacks to the stern eloquence of his speech to Congress six days later in which he put the nation on the road to war.

With his five speeches in the past two weeks, including last night's, Bush has sought to use the fifth anniversary of those attacks to put the war in Iraq in a broader and more politically viable context while offering his interpretation of where the country stands in its long-term confrontation with terrorism.

White House officials are hopeful that the round of speeches will have some impact on moving public opinion. They said that Bush has presented an enormous amount of information and background about Iraq and terrorism, much of which they believe will come as news to many Americans with only a general impression of events.

"I am not so sure that the views [about the Iraq war and terrorism] are chiseled in stone," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "There's been a lot of debate -- one side that may not have been fully represented in ours. . . . It seems that on a lot of things, people may not have fully understood the approach the president took and his thinking."

Both Snow and White House counselor Dan Bartlett singled out the effort to quote the terrorists' own words as a tactic they hope will break through to ordinary Americans who may not be aware of the terrorists' aims. "We may be having a debate in this country about whether Iraq is part of the war on terrorism, but our enemies believe it is," Bartlett said. "We were trying to transcend the political debate in Washington by letting the words of the enemies speak for themselves."

Polls show how the political ground has shifted over time. The Pew Research Center began charting early in Bush's presidency public confidence in his leadership. Bush enjoyed a solid majority until the summer of 2005, when the public was roughly divided. In February 2001, 60 percent of Americans said they saw Bush as trustworthy, compared with just 28 percent who did not. By last month, a majority, 52 percent, said they did not believe he was trustworthy.

"People see him as less trustworthy because things are not going very well," said Pew center director Andrew Kohut.

In his speeches, Bush has advanced several arguments, starting with the proposition that the United States is engaged in a long-term ideological struggle between forces of freedom and Islamic radicals who want to destroy freedom. Although U.S. adversaries come from different backgrounds -- ranging from radical Sunnis in al-Qaeda to Shiite militants such as Hezbollah -- Bush has characterized the opposition as forming a single movement, "a worldwide network of radicals that use terror to kill those that stand in the way of their totalitarian ideology."

"That's is an oversimplification of the task of dealing with the tactic [terrorism] that is used by many different groups, with many different ideologies," countered Paul R. Pillar, a former top CIA analyst and the author of a respected book on terrorism. "It leads to a misunderstanding of the need of what is in fact a different counterterrorist policy for each groups and state we are dealing with. . . . Hamas is an entirely different entity than al-Qaeda. . . . Their objectives are very much different."

Bush this week reiterated his four-year-old argument that Iraq is a central front in the broader struggle against Islamic terrorism. Premature withdrawal, he asserted, could make Iraq what Afghanistan was before the Sept. 11 attacks, an incubator for al-Qaeda. To support the point, he has noted not only the flow of foreign fighters to Iraq but, as on some earlier occasions, the words of al-Qaeda leaders themselves. In his speech last week to the Military Officers Association of America, Bush quoted Osama bin Laden as describing the war in Iraq as "a war of destiny between infidelity and Islam."

Daniel Benjamin, a U.S. counterterrorism official in the Clinton administration who has written extensively about the subject, said efforts to defeat the radical Islamist ideology have been undermined by the Iraq invasion.

"There is no acknowledgment that because we have inadvertently confirmed their claims -- that we seek to occupy Muslim lands, as we have in Iraq -- the ideology is spreading and undermining our efforts," Benjamin said.

Bush's speeches have been sprinkled with what critics regard as factually questionable assertions -- adding to what even some allies have described as a credibility problem for the White House.

In discussing proposed new rules for trying terrorism suspects at the Guantanamo Bay prison, Bush last week said flatly that "the United States does not torture." That may have been the White House interpretation, but the CIA has approved tactics -- "water-boarding," for example, in which interrogators simulate drowning -- that many military and international lawyers consider outside legal boundaries.

Ross K. Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, said Bush retains the unique capacity to lead the nation through the commemoration of the 2001 attacks. "The speeches he's given have been meticulously crafted to avoid any obvious political message," he said. "But seen in an overall way, they reinforce in the mind of people his uniqueness as president and the fact that we're still in a dangerous situation, and in times of danger people inevitably rally behind the president."

The White House is hoping this analysis is right. "Public opinion is not going to change overnight, and we understood that going into these speeches," Bartlett said. "But that doesn't lessen his responsibility as the leader of this country in a time of war to carefully explain the conduct and developments of this war."

Osama's Spin Lessons (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061752

Somewhere, Osama bin Laden must be smiling. Or at least he will be whenever his couriers deliver the next batch of press clippings.

Once again he has beaten America at an American game: public relations. He may be sitting powerlessly in a cave, but his image is as scary as ever. He doesn't even have to cut a new video. He released an old one last week, the equivalent of a fading musician putting out a greatest-hits album, only this one's getting played every hour.

Last night, President Bush paid him homage by quoting his warning that America will face "defeat and disgrace forever" it if loses in Iraq. Bush himself called the war on terror a "struggle for civilization," and said it was essential to "maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations."

It was just the kind of apocalyptic language favored by bin Laden, except that, for all his delusions, he might realize that American civilization is not really in jeopardy. Americans can try to copy him, but they don't understand his rhetorical technique.

They continually misinterpret his equine theory of international relations: "When people see a strong horse and a weak horse, by nature, they will like the strong horse." This is supposedly a reason America was attacked on Sept. 11 — it was perceived as weak for failing to respond to Al Qaeda's earlier attacks — and why it can't leave Iraq.

If we falter in Iraq, Vice President Dick Cheney explained to Tim Russert on Sunday, the war on terror will falter because people will say: "My gosh, the United States hasn't got the stomach for the fight. Bin Laden's right, Al Qaeda's right, the United States has lost its will and will not complete the mission."

But bin Laden knows something else the Bush administration hasn't figured out: You don't actually have to be the strong horse. You just have to look stronger. You can be weak, you can be pummeled in a fight, but as long as your opponent looks more scared than you, you can save face by simply declaring victory.

As an act of war, the attack on Sept. 11 was a blunder by Al Qaeda, and not merely because of the counterattack that destroyed Al Qaeda's training camps and ousted the Taliban. It also alienated former jihadist allies in the Arab world, and caused a rift within Al Qaeda.

One of its senior members, Abu al-Walid al-Masri, broke with bin Laden and accused him of having an "extreme infatuation" with international publicity. The attack, as Fawaz Gerges notes in Foreign Policy magazine, demonstrated that "bin Laden was prepared to sacrifice Afghanistan and Mullah Omar at the altar of his public relations campaign."

But at least bin Laden knew his P.R. Al Qaeda wasn't a serious military threat to America, but it could play one on television. As Al Qaeda's losses mounted and America recovered from the attack, bin Laden and his cohorts didn't let the facts get in the way of their campaign to promote fear (and themselves). They hid in caves and proclaimed themselves champions.

America, meanwhile, accentuated the negative. Instead of declaring victory against terrorists after routing the Taliban and sending bin Laden into hiding, it invaded Iraq, reinvigorating Al Qaeda with a new tool for recruiting. Instead of putting the terrorist risk in perspective, Bush (with the full cooperation of Democrats and the press) set an impossible standard for making America safe.

"We're on the offense against the terrorists on every battlefront," Bush said last week, "and we'll accept nothing less than complete victory."

When you define victory that way, when you treat one attack from a disorganized band of fanatics as a menace to civilization, you've doomed yourself to defeat and caused more damage than they could. You can't completely stop terrorism, but you can scare people into giving up liberties, wasting huge sums of money and sacrificing more lives than would be lost in a terrorist attack.

Take it from bin Laden, who bragged in 2004 that it was "easy to provoke and bait this administration."

"All that we have to do," he said, "is to send two mujahedeen to the farthest point east to raise a piece of cloth on which is written Al Qaeda, in order to make the generals race there to cause America to suffer human, economic and political losses." And then Al Qaeda, no matter what losses it has suffered, will come off once again looking like the strong horse.

Bin Laden's Victory (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK -- I hear Osama bin Laden laughing. I heard him all day on Sunday and Monday as the mass murder of Sept. 11, 2001, was memorialized at the Pentagon and in that field in Pennsylvania and especially here, where the most people died and where countless cameras recorded it all for posterity and an abiding, everlasting anger. He laughs, the madman does, whenever George Bush says, as he has over and over, that America is "winning this war on terror." Bin Laden knows better. He has already won.

It is not merely that bin Laden has not been captured or killed and that videotapes keep coming out of his hideout like taunts. It is, rather, that his initial strategy has borne fruit. It was always his intention to draw the Americans into Afghanistan, where, as had been done to the Soviets, they could be mauled by the fierce mujaheddin. He tried and failed when he blew up the USS Cole off Aden at 11:15 a.m. on Oct. 12, 2000, killing 17 sailors and crippling the ship. But he succeeded beyond his wildest expectations when the United States responded to the Sept. 11 attacks by invading Afghanistan and, in a beat, then going to war in Iraq. It remains mired in both countries to this day.

From bin Laden's standpoint, this has been a glorious victory, made possible, it has to be said, by the totally unforeseen incompetence of the Bush administration. It was so intent on going to war in Iraq that it would not finish the job in Afghanistan. So, to bin Laden's absolute amazement -- I am guessing here -- the United States took on his enemy, the secular and ungodly Saddam Hussein, whom bin Laden himself would gladly have murdered. It has to be a wonderful thing when your enemy vanquishes your enemy.

On "Meet the Press" on Sunday, Dick Cheney said that if he had it to do all over again, he would still go to war in Iraq -- "we'd do exactly the same thing," he said. Why? Is the man incapable of learning from experience? We now know from umpteen reports that there was no link between bin Laden and Hussein. We now know, the Weekly Standard notwithstanding, that Mohamed Atta did not meet in Prague with someone from Iraqi intelligence. We now know that Hussein had no weapons of mass destruction and that the Iraq war -- which has cost America more than 2,500 lives, 20,000 casualties, the respect of the world and billions of dollars -- is for naught. Talleyrand said of the Bourbons that they forgot nothing and learned nothing. It will be said of Cheney that he forgot everything and learned nothing.

How did bin Laden get so lucky? How did he get so fortunate in his choice of enemies? The Bush administration not only validated his wildest dreams -- dreams that even some of his aides thought were unrealistic -- but went even further. By using torture, by the abuses at Abu Ghraib prison, by employing "extraordinary renditions" of suspects to countries where they could be tortured, by insisting on going it almost alone in Iraq, by telling the international community to shove it, by declaring a war for an idÃ©e fixe -- this fierce obsession with Hussein goes back a long way -- the United States has made itself reviled in much of the world.

And here at home, here in the United States of America, it will be a long time before lots of people trust their government again. Little wonder that 16 percent of respondents said in a recent poll that it was "very likely" that the government played some role in the Sept. 11 attacks to justify a war in the Middle East. This is a shocking figure, a measure not just of irrational thinking but of the cost of the Bush administration's mauling of the truth in its mad march to war. Bush has damaged his country more than bin Laden ever could on his own.

I was here on Sept. 11, 2001 -- downtown when the twin towers collapsed. My instantaneous reaction -- the thought that came to my mind as I heard the sound of the buildings coming down -- was for revenge. I would, to this day, kill Osama bin Laden with my own hands. But as much as I hate the man, I have to recognize that from his vantage point, from his mountain fastness somewhere on the Pakistan-Afghanistan frontier, he has won. What he had set out to do, he has done. That is more than we can say.

In Unpredictable District, Some Say Bush Is Politicizing Terrorism (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

ARVADA, Colo., Sept. 11 — Leaving services Sunday morning at Faith Bible Chapel, an evangelical megachurch, Jim McBride, a pilot who served in Vietnam, said he was not happy with President Bush's handling of Iraq. And he displayed little inclination to rethink his position despite the White House's new push to focus this year's Congressional elections on which party will keep the nation safer.

"I do have a bit of mistrust," said Mr. McBride, who said that he twice voted for Mr. Bush but that he is now disappointed — a sentiment he said is shared by many in his Bible study group. "The whole thing about W.M.D. and that Iraq is somehow tied to 9/11, I just don't believe it."

Mr. Bush has plenty of supporters in this Denver suburb and the surrounding cities, an evenly divided swing district that is a bellwether in the battle for control of the House. But interviews over the last three days here found Republicans, Democrats and independents all expressing degrees of skepticism about Mr. Bush's motives in delivering a set of high-profile speeches on terrorism and the war in Iraq two months before Election Day.

While it is too early to know whether the White House will succeed in winning over enough voters to make a difference in what is shaping up as a tight race, the interviews suggested that Mr. Bush's newest efforts to cast his party as better suited than Democrats to defend the country had yet to overcome concern and anger among many voters about Iraq and a more generalized sense of discontent with the administration.

"I have been a Republican all my life, but we have just gotten to the point where we may need a change," said Shannon Abote, an Arvada resident who was stopping at Starbucks for a coffee on Monday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0061754

Many residents said they were aware only in general terms of Mr. Bush's recent speeches and his decision to bring high-level terrorism suspects to trial before military tribunals. They acknowledged that the terrorist threat often seemed distant, far removed from their busy lives in the shelter of the Rocky Mountains. Fewer than 20 people turned out Monday morning outside the Elks Club in Arvada to mark the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"Living in the central part of the country has probably kept terrorism from the forefront of our minds," said Peter Strecker as he and his wife, Robin, strolled through downtown Golden on Saturday with their 13-month-old daughter, Paige, after a sudden downpour.

Still, even strong Bush supporters said they doubted the presidential drumbeat on terrorism would alter the political landscape here. "I think people already have their minds made up," said Michael Mason, an engineer and Golden native. "The whole thing could end tomorrow, and they would still hate his guts. The damage has been done."

The random interviews with dozens of residents across the Seventh Congressional District were not scientific. But they do suggest that Mr. Bush's public standing could be problematic for the Republican candidate in the race for the open House seat, Rick O'Donnell, and that the Republican push on terrorism will not necessarily pack the same political punch it did in 2002 and 2004.

"I think it is the only card they have got," said Floyd Ciruli, a longtime Denver pollster, referring to the national Republican focus on terrorism. "Will it make a difference in Colorado? Absolutely not."

If so, that would be bad news for Congressional Republican leaders. They are counting on Mr. Bush's concerted efforts to both raise his own public approval and to simultaneously help give Republican House and Senate candidates an edge on the security issues that have dominated the last two national elections. But polls indicate that the climate is different this year, with fewer Americans confident that the fight against terrorism is going well, and Democrats, including Mr. O'Donnell's opponent, Ed Perlmutter, are vigorously trying to counter Mr. Bush.

"My job is to make sure that people remember that all this was brought out in '04 and '02," said Mr. Perlmutter. Republicans are resurrecting the "same old plays from the same old playbook," he said. "The war on terror is clearly an important subject, but they have made a mess of it."

Mr. O'Donnell said terrorism and the war in Iraq continued to be secondary issues in a race he described as being driven more by immigration and economic issues. "Having the president talk about the threat to the country reminds people that we live in a dangerous world, but it is not the No. 1 issue on their minds," he said.

Mr. O'Donnell, who was the beneficiary of a fund-raising visit by the president this year, has good reason to put a little distance now between himself and the president: Senator John Kerry carried the district in the 2004 presidential race.

But Mr. Bush retains his strong backers.

At the Sept. 11 ceremony on Monday in Arvada, Nancy Goodman, whose 21-year-old son is finishing a tour as a marine in Iraq, expressed full confidence in Mr. Bush's antiterrorism strategy.

"I agree with what he is doing," said Ms. Goodman, a Republican, who said the public could not always know the reasoning behind the administration's actions. "We have to trust our leadership, and we have to trust our military, and we have to trust that they want to protect us."

Blaine Engdahl, an off-duty police officer who was waving the flag Saturday as he watched Arvada's annual harvest festival parade from the back of a pickup, said: "I think he has made his mistakes, but he is trying. If we don't fight them there, we are going to be fighting them over here."

Dale Burkhart, another Bush supporter, urged the president to step up the effort to get his message across. "Everybody has forgotten why we got hit," Mr. Burkhart said. "Americans need to be continually reminded because of the way we live. We are blessed, and we take it for granted."

But independents and Democrats repeatedly characterized Mr. Bush's recent spree of speeches and actions on terrorism as a cynical effort to thrust the issue into the Congressional campaign season.

"I think it is a calculated attempt on the part of the president and Karl Rove to push terrorism before the election," said Patrick Bassett, a Democrat and software developer from Golden who was visiting a mall in Aurora. "All these issues could have been brought up at an earlier time."

Robin Dodich, a retired teacher and self-described independent who was part of a small group of antiwar protesters along the Aurora parade route, called Mr. Bush's recent actions disgusting.

"Republicans believe their party is in trouble and they want to help their campaigns," Ms. Dodich said. "It is almost like Bush is frantic."

Nation Pays Tribute To Heroes (USAT)

By Rick Hampson And Charisse Jones

DOJ_NMG_0061755

USA Today, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK — Americans solemnly remembered and mourned Monday the lives lost five years ago in the worst terror attacks on the nation, a tragedy that President Bush said brought "extraordinary acts of courage" and heroism from ordinary citizens.

Ceremonies marked the Sept. 11 anniversary at Ground Zero, the former site of the World Trade Center towers, and at the Pentagon and in a Pennsylvania field where Americans died in attacks that propelled the nation to war.

More somber memorials were held in schools, churches and other places across a nation still seared by the fresh memory of that day.

Bush began the remembrances at a New York firehouse, laying a wreath and mingling with firefighters and police officers who were among the first to rush to the burning towers. He visited 9/11 crash sites in Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon before returning to the White House to deliver a prime-time television address.

Bush paid tribute to the heroism of "ordinary citizens rising to the occasion," and described the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq that have ensued as "a struggle for civilization."

"We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations," he said. "We are fighting for the possibility that good and decent people across the Middle East can raise up societies based on freedom, and tolerance, and personal dignity."

He said the nation faces "a difficult road ahead."

"If we do not defeat these enemies now, we will leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons," he said.

At Ground Zero, a procession of loved ones read the names of the 2,749 people who died in the collapse of the twin towers. Some held photos. Many sobbed.

"There's no way to mend a broken heart," said ToniAnn Carroll, wife of Peter Carroll, a New York firefighter who died at the World Trade Center.

The Trade Center site fell quiet at 8:46 a.m. and 9:03 a.m., the moments in 2001 when hijackers crashed jetliners into the twin towers.

At the Pentagon, where 184 people died when a jetliner flew into the building, Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld led the observance.

In the Pennsylvania field where 40 people aboard United Flight 93 died hundreds gathered at a temporary memorial — a chain-link fence covered with U.S. flags, firefighter helmets and children's drawings. "We should be thinking about remembering on Sept. 12th and 13th and 14th, when America really came together," said Jerry Bingham, whose son, Mark, died on Flight 93. "Somewhere along the line, we lost that."

Survivors At Three Gatherings Talk Of Heroism, Loss And Love (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, September 12, 2006

From Ground Zero to the Pentagon and a remote field in western Pennsylvania, Monday's fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks prompted Americans to measure the day's meaning through the words and tears of the victims' survivors.

Memorials, dedications and religious services marked the day when Muslim extremists turned jetliners into weapons and ushered in what has come to seem like the age of terrorism.

"It surely cannot be easy to come to this site and speak out loud the name of the person you had thought would always be next to you," New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg told thousands at Ground Zero, where 2,749 died when the World Trade Center towers collapsed. "We stand by your side, yet who can know what is in your hearts?"

He soon got an answer. After reciting their loved ones' names, many relatives — like others in other places — said what was in their hearts:

·"I miss you, and I need you." — Eulogia Hernandez, wife of Nuberto.

·"The greatest gift I can give you is the gift of remembrance. Love you, babe." — Joanne Grzelak, wife of Joseph.

·"The cost of freedom is vigilance." — Nicholas Chiarchiaro, husband of Dorothy Chiarchiaro and uncle of Delores Marie Costa.

There were promises: "Don't worry, your granddaughter will know all about her Poppa," Stephanie Esposito told her husband, William.

Requests: "Keep your shadow on us … so that I do not lose my path," Sneh Jain asked her husband, Yudh Vir Sing Jain.

The expressions of grief, longing and hope came amid public sentiment that the war on terror is far from over. A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found last month that four of five Americans think suicide bombers probably will strike a crowded U.S. location in the next five years.

There were reminders of those fears Monday. New York's Pennsylvania Station was evacuated because of a suspicious duffel bag that turned out to hold nothing but trash. A jet bound for San Francisco was diverted to Dallas after a backpack and handheld e-mail device were found on board. Both were harmless.

Everywhere, Americans remembered. At Boston's Logan Airport, where two teams of 9/11 terrorists boarded jets they later crashed into the World Trade Center, security screeners wore wristbands reading “We will never forget” and stopped checking passengers for a moment to mark the anniversary. In Akron, Ohio, firefighters sounded sirens for 30 seconds to symbolize the moments the twin towers fell. In San Diego's Balboa Park, 500 people held a remembrance walk.

At the three hallowed sites where almost 3,000 people died, a nation mourned, reflected and moved forward:

America Marks A Grim Anniversary (WP)

By Michael Powell, Josh White And Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

In three wounded communities yesterday, the nation commemorated the worst terrorist attack in American history, as bells sounded, thousands murmured prayers and the families of victims once again read the names of their lost loved ones.

On the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 hijackings, there was an aching familiarity to the rituals. In New York, family members recited 2,749 names, punctuated by violins and the wail of bagpipes, to the drawn and tearful faces of the families of the victims.

President Bush joined the commemoration in New York, journeying to Ground Zero on Sunday night to lay a wreath and then sharing Monday breakfast with 75 firefighters at a firehouse, nicknamed Fort Pitt, on the Lower East Side. He later flew to Pennsylvania to lay a wreath in the Shanksville farm field where United Airlines Flight 93 hurtled to Earth, and then he traveled on to the Pentagon.

Families and firefighters and cops in New York filed slowly down ramps into the three-story-deep pit that is Ground Zero, gray slurry walls rising around them. Bells sounded at 8:46 a.m. and 9:03 a.m. -- the moments when the hijacked planes slammed into the twin towers. On the podium, Carmen Suarez glanced skyward as she finished reading 10 names of those who died.

Her husband, police officer Ramon Suarez, died in those towers.

"If I could build a staircase to heaven I would," Suarez said, "just so I could quickly run up there to have you back in my arms."

Rain fell in Shanksville and cool and clouds cloaked Washington, but in New York it was one of those eerie carbon-copy days: a slight chill of autumn, a cloudless sky, wind tugging at flags, just like five years ago. Except that yesterday, every flag in the city was at half-staff.

Bush and Vice President Cheney paid homage to the dead. And as during the past few weeks, they did not hesitate to try to draw a connection between the Sept. 11 attacks and the war in Iraq.

New York Battalion Chief Jim Savastano, who knew 100 of the 343 firefighters who died at Ground Zero, sat next to Bush at the breakfast of scrambled eggs and French toast; he recalls talk of war. "He talked about how he's going to continue the war on terrorism," Savastano said. "He's not going to give up the fight."

Cheney observed the day at the Pentagon, where five years ago American Airlines Flight 77 rocketed into the facade, burrowing its way through the building's outer rings and killing 184 people. Five hundred family and friends of the lost sat in a cold drizzle, listening as speakers mixed soft talk of empathy with blunt calls to support the nation on its two war fronts: Iraq and Afghanistan.

Heads turned as one commercial jet after another streamed over the Pentagon's Mall Terrace, the roar of engines drowning out the voices below and sending a chill of remembrance through the audience.

"There are no words that can soothe your pain and no way that we can truly understand all the sacrifices that you have made," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the audience.

Cheney's style was more aggressive, as he tossed rhetorical haymakers at critics of the Iraq invasion. "We have no intention," he said, "of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics."

In New York, there was little talk of the war. Recent polls show that 75 percent of the city's residents see no links between the 2001 attacks and the three-year-old war in Iraq. Antiwar sentiment is deeply felt in New York, even by Republicans, polls show.

Jack Lynch went to Ground Zero yesterday with his wife to stand once again in the footprint of those 110-story towers. He recalled searching in that wreckage for the body of his son, Michael, who was a firefighter with Engine 40, Ladder 35, on the Upper West Side of Manhattan.

DOJ_NMG_0061757

"On March 21, 2002, we recovered Michael's body," Lynch said. "His body was entangled with a body of a female. . . . The medical examiner said he was either carrying her or protecting her.

"It was saving grace because we know that Michael . . . died doing something noble."

Lynch wishes he were younger so that he could fight terrorism. But not in Iraq. "Iraq really is the wrong target," he said. "Terrorism is the target and the attitude of those that want to hold us hostage in fear."

Five years out, the emotion is less raw than it was in those first years. One could walk the streets of Manhattan or the District yesterday and sense little amiss. But that impression would be wide off the mark.

In Astoria, Queens, a working-class immigrant community, Joseph Kiss walked beneath the elevated tracks on Broadway. He is a just-retired elevator operator, a white-haired, blue-eyed Croatian immigrant with a gold crucifix. Ask if he still thinks of that day and he nods.

He said his daughter was nearly buried under the wreckage and was rescued several hours after the collapse.

"Every day I think about how I almost lost her, trapped down there in the cement and dust," he said. "I remember calling her and calling, hope she get home.

"I am lucky, though. So many families --" He paused and snapped his fingers. "They look up and they lost the love of their lives."New York

Lt. Tom Carlstrom, 53, walked one last time in his dress blues along the eastern lip of the gaping hole where this city's two largest towers once stood. He is a New York City firefighter of 25 years' service, or rather he was -- he retired yesterday at 2 p.m.

Five years ago, Carlstrom, a quiet and polite man who stops here to help an old woman navigate a high curb and there to help an old Marine veteran tape a memorial on the fence, was in the North Tower. He was setting up a triage unit in the cavernous lobby when he felt a shaking and heard a roar, like an avalanche. One hundred ten stories were coming down upon him.

"The South Tower had already gone, so we knew this could happen," he said quietly as he stood on Church Street, watching the Emerald Society's bagpipers wet their lips. "I knew I had six, maybe seven seconds."

He ran north on West Street and dived down a side street. Metal beams, clouds of volcanic-like dust and boulders hurtled by. Somehow -- he's not sure how or why -- Carlstrom survived, and as he huddled there he thought of his friends who at that moment were dying.

"I come down every year, to think about my people I couldn't get out of there." He shrugged, helpless. "These memories are never going away, I realize that now."

Each anniversary has its own feel. The first was defiant and heartbreaking, the Fire Department's bagpipers leading a ragtag march of 3,000 firefighters, cops and ordinary citizens into the dawn and across the Brooklyn Bridge to Ground Zero.

This anniversary feels different, the wounds half-cauterized, the neighborhood around Ground Zero rebuilt, shiny, polished. And yet the roses are stuffed in the gates and the photos taped up, and everywhere around Ground Zero there are families with photos of their loved ones on their lapels and purses, slowly walking down the ramp into that deep pit.

There was not a sense this time of a city come to a stop. Many on Church Street hurried to work. But others were there to protest, to talk of conspiracies, to put up art -- and many just to quietly listen as family members read off the names of the dead.

"I worked in the hole a couple of times, and it kind of touched me," Tom Miller, 41, said from behind mirrored sunglasses. He wore biker boots, a T-shirt with a big American flag and a handlebar mustache. He repairs construction cranes, and he drove south on his Harley to the memorial.

"It's just emotional, the destruction, to see people wasted here -- that's just the best way to put it."

Elsewhere the day was given to private remembrance. At Sixth Avenue and Houston Street a powerfully built man in a business suit and sunglasses knelt on the sidewalk, head bowed in front of Engine House 24, which lost eight men on that day.

He got up and walked away and was momentarily startled to be asked his thoughts. "I live across the street, and I guess I feel like I owe these guys my prayers," he said. "I love this city, but I don't feel it's very healed. So many people just got wiped out on a perfect day just like this."The Pentagon

Zenovia Cuyler was starting her morning at a Pentagon health clinic on Sept. 11, 2001, when she heard that an airplane had ripped through the building's limestone exterior. When she learned where the plane had crashed, she immediately feared the worst.

"I watched the building burn for a while, and then I knew my mother was gone," Cuyler said yesterday, her eyes softening. "In a way, she's still here."

Surrounded by family members, Cuyler returned to the spot yesterday where her mother, Ada M. Davis, 57, was working as an accountant for the Army five years ago when Flight 77 rammed through the Pentagon's E-ring at 9:37 a.m. For Cuyler, of Upper Marlboro, the wars and the U.S. troops dying overseas are a continual reminder of that personal horror.

"I haven't healed because I live it every day," she said. "There is no closure."

Beneath ominously dark clouds and a sporadic spitting rain outside the Pentagon yesterday, Cuyler and more than 500 family members and friends of the 184 victims joined in solemn remembrance. They waved small American flags and saluted the same enormous Stars and Stripes that draped the Pentagon in the days after the attack.

Songs such as "Battle Hymn of the Republic" streamed through the morning mist, while America's top military leaders spoke of the great sacrifices members of the military made on Sept. 11, as well as the sacrifices they are now making. Cheney, Pace and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said the attacks marked the surprise beginning of a now-global struggle.

The moment appeared to affect Rumsfeld, who struggled briefly through his opening words before speaking about the need to aggressively go after the terrorists who celebrated while America mourned the victims five years ago.

"The highest tribute we can pay to them is to commit ourselves to doing everything possible to fight the extremists wherever they are, to making every effort to stay united as a country, and to give our truly outstanding men and women in uniform all that they need to succeed," Rumsfeld said, a sling holding his left arm in place after surgery last week.

In a brief afternoon visit, Bush and the first lady placed a wreath at the spot where the plane hit the Pentagon, standing for a moment of silence before a five-piece band played a soft version of "America the Beautiful." Several senior senators and White House officials joined about 225 family members representing 56 victims. Bush then spent about 15 minutes shaking hands and sharing hugs, at one point wiping tears from his eyes.

Joyce Johnson's eyes began to water as she talked about her husband, Army Lt. Col. Dennis M. Johnson, who five years ago died just a few feet from where she was standing.

Walking away from the afternoon ceremony, five years of memories flooding back to her, Johnson praised Bush for his dedication to the victims: "Just for him to take the time to go to all three places means more than anything."Shanksville

Just a few miles down the road from a field shrouded with memories and mementos, Oleg Kis stood in his hotel trying to decide whether to wear the suit jacket and tie or the black T-shirt folded on his bed.

"This may be too provocative," said the soft-spoken Kis, 49, holding the T-shirt out in front of him, the words "Face the Facts" emblazoned on the front. In one corner of the room, boxes brimmed with thousands of fliers. In another reclined a placard splashed with the words "Stop 9-11 Cover-Up."

"I believe the truth should be spread," Kis said of his one-man protest at the crash site.

People came for many reasons, some alone and some by the busload, to a field even locals considered the middle of nowhere until a plane punctured the earth five years ago. Danielle Anderson, 18, and Angela McMillen, 21, drove hundreds of miles through the night from Dubois, Pa., to in hopes of creating a memory for themselves.

"My grandmother talked to me about WWII, and my parents talked to me about Vietnam," McMillen said. "This is what we're going to tell our children."

They came on a whim, leaving at 2 a.m. and arriving before the sun rose. About 1,000 people would follow, gathering under a slate-gray sky at 9 a.m. for the memorial service. There were prayers and victims' names read and politicians searching for words of comfort.

Afterward, Bush visited the crash site with families, taking a moment to talk to each. A chapel also held a service, with people spread among fold-out chairs. Alice Hoagland, mother of victim Mark Bingham, attended both ceremonies.

"This is really comforting to be here today, to look into the eyes of the other Flight 93 families and to grieve together and to find comfort together," Hoagland said.

If there was a lesson her son and others on Flight 93 learned that day, it was that there is power in numbers, she said.

Shanksville, a small town of about 250 people, often appears overwhelmed by the attention. This is a place where deer, raccoons and bears still wander up to back porches and where scrapple, a mix of cornmeal and pig fat, is a dietary staple. The plane crash ripped a hole in that solitude.

"I stomped these grounds when I was a kid," said Fred Bruening, 76, adding that he shot his first 10-point buck where the plane came down. "Just think of a boy who might have seen two cars all day long going down that road to Shanksville. I never would have never thought there'd be all these people standing here."

He and his wife had driven from Youngtown, N.Y., for the ceremony yesterday, as they have every year since the crash.

"This is our special place," said Diane Bruening, 62.

Up the hill, near the makeshift memorial that has grown each year, Kis stood in a gray suit and blue tie, handing out fliers and calling to passersby.

"Find out what really happened," he shouted.

"You're a moron," one man yelled back.

"What you're trying to accomplish has nothing to do with what is going on here," shouted Jim Kunkel, 38, of Pittsburgh. "Go away."

"I don't want them to have died uselessly," Kis yelled back.

Memories, Grief Endure Across Region (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

In the past five years, Ron Miluszewski has been unable to shake the smell of the first victims who were brought to his hospital from the shattered Pentagon: They reeked of jet fuel.

In the past five years, Mazie Lawson's anguish at the loss of her daughter, Cecelia Richard, on Sept. 11, has lingered, undiminished.

In the past five years, Colin Wolfe grew from childhood in Manassas to the Marine Corps in Iraq, determined to battle the perpetrators of Sept. 11. Yesterday -- at the age of 19 -- he was borne to his grave in Arlington National Cemetery.

So much can happen in five years, while much stays unchanged.

Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, residents and visitors across the Washington region paused yesterday, away from the grand commemorations, to remember the milestone and take stock of all that has and has not changed in the half-decade since 2001.

At the Lincoln Memorial, prayers for nonviolence echoed across the Reflecting Pool and mingled with the roar of airliners soaring through the overcast that shrouded the city and its psyche.

At a downtown Washington cathedral, a churchgoer attended Mass carrying a framed photograph of a Roman Catholic priest who died in the World Trade Center.

And at a Montgomery County interfaith building project, a 74-year-old Rockville man lamented that he had not done more to improve ethnic relations in the past five years.

"I'm looking for ways to knock down barriers," John Harris of Rockville said yesterday as he stood in the drizzling rain wearing a tool belt and jacket. "Get to know people as individuals, not categorize them by groups."

Harris and 14 other volunteers had assembled in Burtonsville to build townhouses as part of what Habitat for Humanity of Montgomery County had dubbed "Interfaith Build," aimed at bringing together Christian, Jewish and Muslim volunteers. Habitat planned a group lunch and breaks for prayers. But the Muslim contingent never showed. (A representative of the Muslim group later said that he didn't have directions and that by the time he and volunteers reached each other on the phone yesterday, the build had been called off because of rain.)

At the site, the early end to the project gave Harris time to reflect. A Missouri native, onetime CIA worker and lifelong liberal-leaning Baptist, he is nothing if not honest with himself.

Five years ago, immediately after Sept. 11, he hoped the nation's unity would have him getting to know more Muslims. That hasn't happened. He blames himself, in part, saying he instinctively falls back to being with those he knows best, Christians. But he also thinks the war in Iraq has hurt unity.

"We have broadened who the enemy is," he said.

At the Lincoln Memorial, Arun Gandhi, grandson of Mohandas Gandhi, India's famed philosopher statesman, led speakers and bystanders in calling for peaceful approaches to counterterrorism.

"I see a lot more fear in the minds of people," said Gandhi, who lives in Rochester, N.Y., and, with his wife, Sunanda, founded the M.K. Gandhi Institute for Nonviolence. "It's reached a point where somebody shouts, 'boo,' and everybody runs."

As he spoke, Gary Smith, 60, who served in Vietnam with a Marine Corps artillery unit, was walking by with his wife, Margaret, 60, and their granddaughter, Shelby, 13, who was wearing a pink sweatshirt that said "FBI."

Smith, of Adrian, Mo., said he has changed in the past five years. But he is not afraid. "I'm an American, and I'm going to do what I want to do," he said. "I'm free, and I'm going to stay that way. They're not going to scare me. They may make me nervous. But they're not going to scare me."

Across the Potomac River, the body of Colin Wolfe was being carried through Arlington National Cemetery. Wolfe was a 14-year-old, preoccupied with girls and baseball and successfully sidestepping homework assignments, when the terrorists stuck.

It was in that moment, when the twin towers fell and the Pentagon was on fire, that the Manassas youth decided his future would take a very specific path: service in the Marine Corps.

Wolfe deployed to Iraq in July. He was killed last month, cut down when his Humvee struck a roadside bomb.

Yesterday, the Marine lance corporal was buried on a day his parents said they selected for its raw symbolism.

DOJ_NMG_0061760

"September 11 was an integral part of his decision process to become a Marine, and it seems absolutely appropriate," said Wolfe's father, Mark Wolfe.

In Bladensburg yesterday morning, a bell chimed 25 times in honor of the 25 Prince George's County residents who lost their lives that day five years ago.

Mazie Lawson, 77, shed tears as the bell tolled for her daughter, Cecelia Richard, 41.

The ceremony was held to dedicate the Prince George's County Sept. 11 Memorial at the Bladensburg Waterfront Park at Peace Cross. Twenty-five white crepe myrtle trees, one for each victim, lined a brick walkway and a granite memorial with an inscription that reads: "We will always remember them."

Lawson, of Capitol Heights, tried to hold back tears as she talked about her daughter. "It's a terrible feeling," she said. "It's a hole that can't be filled."

"I just hate the word 'closure,' " Lawson said. "There's never closure. To me, the word closure means to close and forget, and I never want to forget my daughter's spirit."

In Vienna, about 50 people gathered on the lawn of the Freeman House for the town's annual Sept. 11 commemoration, organized by American Legion Post 180. Some took shelter from the drizzle beneath a maple tree; others sat in folding chairs.

Ron Miluszewski, director of admissions at Virginia Hospital Center, was the featured speaker. The hospital treated 44 victims of the Pentagon attack, and his memories of that day at the hospital's triage center are a mix of horror and heroism: The sound of the ambulance sirens bringing the day's first victims. The two injured servicemen who, after receiving treatment, tore off their hospital tags and returned to the crash site at the Pentagon to look for others. The smell of jet fuel on the burn patients.

"It's a memory that has stayed in my head," he said later. "All I could smell was jet fuel, like being in an airport. I'll never forget that. I've tried to. But every time I go to an airport, the smell of jet fuel reminds me. It was so strong."

A group of Arab Americans gathered at the Capital Hilton hotel downtown to mark the anniversary. One of those in attendance, Samiah Bahhur, 45, was upset.

"Don't use the word 'angry,' okay?" she said.

An energy regulation specialist, Bahhur said she feels "punished" when she finds airport security slips in her luggage or when she thinks about the Patriot Act -- which she feels unfairly puts Arab Americans such as herself under a microscope and makes other Americans feel suspicious.

"We are just like every other American," she said, her right hand gesturing firmly. Bahhur, of Fairfax, was among 150 people in business suits, military uniforms and modest hijabs who came to listen to religious figures -- Muslim, Christian and Jewish -- reflect on the past five years. Speakers talked about the anti-Muslim, anti-Arab vitriol that came after Sept. 11, as well as the interfaith bonding.

Bahhur said she wanted to be optimistic. She volunteers with the Red Cross and the Arab American Institute and tries "not to let the things that affect the community affect me." She said she remembers feeling optimistic in the months after the attacks after seeing people work for more tolerance, more education. But then came the wiretapping and other terrorist incidents, each one a reason for some to let loose a little hate.

Last night, thousands of football fans waved small American flags, chanted "USA! USA!" and observed a moment of silence before the start of the Redskins-Vikings game at FedEx Field.

But in a utility tunnel beneath the stadium, Prince George's firefighter Ernie Alsop stood by, sitting in a firetruck, in case of calamity.

Alsop, 46, is in his 25th year as a firefighter, but this is his first season working security at Redskins games.

He worries about car fires and sick fans and, now, mysterious backpacks stashed in the woods.

"You can't let that stuff go these days," he said. "You've got to check everything out. I'm a rookie when it comes to this, but I know that day has changed the world."

During Mass in the cathedral in Washington, John Mohan sat with a black-framed, smiling photograph of his friend, Franciscan priest Mychal Judge. The 68-year-old Roman Catholic chaplain for New York's fire department was killed at the World Trade Center as he ministered to the dead and dying.

"There's a sadness of course . . . but I do think there is a determination too, to remember those who died and maybe take what was good from their lives," said Mohan, 41.

DOJ_NMG_0061761

The District resident was among about 200 worshipers at the Mass celebrated by Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl at the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle in Northwest Washington.

In his homily, Wuerl sought to dispel the paralysis that people can feel in the face of horrible events. "Our capacity to change the world is not as limited as we think," he said.

After the Mass, Mohan stood in line to speak with Wuerl. He asked the archbishop to bless the photograph.

Later, standing on the steps of the red brick cathedral, Mohan called Sept. 11 "one of the landmarks that you look at and say, 'Where were you on the day?' And everybody knows where they were before and after, and how their lives changed."

The experience, he added, had marked his generation, "maybe in some ways that people in this generation living now are not even aware of yet and won't be for many years to come."

Marine Felt Calling After 9/11 Attacks (WP)

By Leef Smith

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Colin Wolfe was in sixth grade, fixated on girls, sports and the challenges of being a preteen, when a group of Marines visited his Manassas elementary school.

He returned to his Manassas home that afternoon with their presentation swimming in his head. Perhaps, he told his parents, he might enlist one day.

It was just childhood talk, his parents reasoned. Their son was a skilled ballet dancer, performing since childhood with a local dance company, and he had smarts. Perhaps he would go to college.

Then came Sept. 11, 2001.

Wolfe was 14 when the twin towers fell, and like so many, he watched in horror as the Pentagon burned on cable news channels.

He was just a boy, but the call to action that he felt struck deep.

In the years that followed, he collected articles depicting the attacks and search for Osama bin Laden. He talked with friends and family about the war on terror and visited the Pentagon and Ground Zero in New York.

And when he graduated from Osbourn High School in Manassas last year, he did the one thing he felt in his heart that was right: He enlisted in the Marines, ready to fight.

"Like a lot of kids, he had a sense of wanting to serve his country, but 9/11 crystallized that in him," said Mark Wolfe, his father.

Pfc. Colin J. Wolfe, 19, was deployed to Iraq in July. He was killed Aug. 30 in Anbar province, when the Humvee in which he was riding struck a roadside bomb.

Yesterday, family and friends gathered at Arlington National Cemetery to honor the slain Marine. His parents picked Sept. 11 for the burial, believing it to be a fitting tribute to a young man who gave his life for his country in Iraq.

"He knew what he was fighting for and what he was all about," Mark Wolfe said. "He believed he was serving the country, protecting the country. He had made his choice."

Colin was assigned to the 3rd Battalion, 2nd Marine Regiment, 2nd Marine Division, 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force at Camp Lejeune, N.C., and was posthumously promoted to lance corporal.

Hundreds of mourners -- among them Virginia Sens. George Allen (R) and John W. Warner (R) as well as Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) -- gathered at the graveside under a threatening, gray sky.

They listened as a bugler played taps, the instrument's echoes fading softly across the field of grass and gravestones. They watched spellbound as six marines folded the American flag draped over Wolfe's coffin with precision.

The motorcade to the cemetery -- one of the largest for a casualty of the Iraq war, according to cemetery officials -- was led by a small police escort.

Family members said Wolfe wasn't planning a career in the military. He just felt he had a job to do -- and not as an officer, either. Wolfe's father said he wanted to be on the front lines, doing the real work, he said.

Mark Wolfe said his son's battalion has lost six Marines in the past few weeks, a heavy toll that drives home the danger of their jobs.

"People in the general public don't realize how hard they fight and how many risks they take," Mark Wolfe said. "It's war."

But Colin Wolfe knew it was war. He looked on the conflict in Iraq with the same gravity as he viewed World War II, his father said.

Shortly after Colin graduated from high school, his family traveled to France, where they drove from Paris to Omaha Beach, the famous Normandy landing site during the allied invasion of World War II. They were there, Mark Wolfe said, to pay their respects.

DOJ_NMG_0061762

For Colin, who had just enlisted, it was "hallowed ground." He pointed out to family members headstones marked with the Star of David -- a symbol of Jewish heritage, like his own.

Mark Wolfe said he last spoke with his son on Aug. 19. The phone conversation lasted 15 or 20 minutes, and Colin talked about the tedium of combat and how much the Iraqi children loved the Marines. His father said he stressed that the Iraqi soldiers were doing a good job, that they were to be trusted.

The job might be progressing slowly, he told his father, but they were going to get it done.

"We're winning," Colin said. "It's just going to take some time."

U.S. Observes 5-year Anniversary Of 9-11 (AP)

By Amy Westfeldt And Erin Mcclam

The Associated Press, September 12, 2006

Clutching photos to their hearts and blowing kisses to the sky, tearful loved ones of Sept. 11 victims recited a 3 1/2-hour litany of the lost Monday, the names echoing across an expanse still largely barren five years after terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center.

At the Pentagon and on a wind-swept Pennsylvania field, and in simpler, quiet moments in airport security lines, at churches or by themselves, Americans paused to reflect on the worst terrorist act on U.S. soil.

The centerpiece of the commemorations was the mostly barren 16-acre expanse at ground zero, where four moments of silence were observed to mark the precise times jetliners crashed into the twin towers and the skyscrapers crumbled to the ground.

The achingly familiar task of reading the names of the 2,749 trade center victims fell this year to their husbands, wives and partners, who personalized the roll call with heartbreaking tributes to the loves of their lives.

"If I could build a staircase to heaven, I would, just so I could quickly run up there to have you back in my arms," said Carmen Suarez, wife of city police officer Ramon Suarez, killed five years ago at the World Trade Center.

And this from Linda Litto, who lost husband Vincent Litto: "As I said 31 years ago tomorrow, I will love you and honor you all the days of our life. Happy anniversary, my love."

On a crisp, sunny day not unlike the morning of the attacks, family members descended into the pit 70 feet below ground where the towers stood, tearfully laying wreaths and roses in the skyscrapers' footprints.

The mournful sound of bagpipes, so familiar from the seemingly endless funerals that followed Sept. 11, echoed across ground zero after a choir performed the national anthem.

The ritual has changed little since the first anniversary of the attacks, and in many ways the site has remained the same as well.

Squabbles over design and security have caused long delays in the project to rebuild at ground zero. Only this year did construction start on a Sept. 11 memorial and the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower, which is not expected to be finished for five more years. At dusk, officials planned to turn on a memorial light display in lower Manhattan, sending beams of blue light skyward in a glowing silhouette of the twin towers.

President Bush laid a wreath at the Shanksville, Pa., field where United Flight 93 crashed, and privately greeted relatives of the 40 people killed there. Standing without umbrellas in a cold rain, he and first lady Laura Bush bowed their heads for a prayer and the singing of "Amazing Grace."

"One moment, ordinary citizens, and the next, heroes forever," retired Gen. Tommy Franks said, alluding to the Flight 93 passengers who apparently fought the hijackers and forced them to crash the plane into the ground. "We mourn their loss, to be sure, but we also celebrate their victory here in the first battle on terrorism."

Bush planned a prime-time Oval Office address later Monday. In prepared remarks, he characterized the war against terrorism as a "struggle for civilization" that requires a determined effort by a unified country.

"We are fighting to maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations," Bush said.

The president ate breakfast with New York firefighters, and a day earlier walked ground zero and laid wreaths in reflecting pools that symbolized the north and south towers.

After visiting Shanksville on Monday, the president and first lady placed a wreath near a plaque on the outside of the Pentagon, where American Airlines Flight 77 claimed 184 lives and tore a gash in the building. Bush appeared teary-eyed as he greeted victims' family members around him, and he could be seen mouthing "God bless you" as he embraced them.

At an observance near the Pentagon, Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld strode side by side to a speaker's platform.

Rumsfeld appeared to struggle with his emotions as he recalled the day of the attacks, and Cheney vowed resolve: "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power."

DOJ_NMG_0061763

The day was marked with reminders of the sometimes tense new reality that settled on the nation, and particularly its transportation systems, after the attacks five years ago.

New York's bustling Pennsylvania Station was briefly evacuated because of a suspicious duffel bag that turned out to be holding only trash. And a jet bound for San Francisco was diverted to Dallas after a backpack and handheld e-mail device were found on board. Both items were pronounced harmless.

And lest anyone forget the terrorists responsible for the day, al-Qaida's second in command warned of forthcoming strikes in the Persian Gulf and against Israel in a new video Monday.

It was one of three al-Qaida videos released around the 9-11 anniversary. One showed images of the fuel-laden jets striking the trade center, and in another Osama bin Laden smiled and chatted with the plotters of the attacks.

In Washington, the co-chairmen of the Sept. 11 commission assailed the Bush administration and Congress for a what they called a lack of urgency in protecting the country. Only about half of the 41 recommendations issued by the commission two years ago have become law.

Former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton and former New Jersey Gov. Tom Kean cited a failure to distribute adequate homeland security money to cities most at risk for an attack, and said U.S. policy toward Arab nations has been largely ineffective.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino insisted that the administration had adopted many of the commission's suggestions. She said Bush "wakes every day determined to ensure that we are doing all we can — with all the lawful tools possible — to detect and prevent terrorists attacks."

At Boston's Logan Airport, security screeners wearing wristbands that read "We will never forget" stopped checking passengers for a moment to mark the anniversary, and travelers waiting in line — another legacy of the attacks — paused to join the tribute.

At Dallas Fort-Worth International, speakers at a ceremony paused intermittently as jets roared overhead, and an employee choir sang "God Bless America.

Ceremonies around the country inevitably included salutes to police and firefighters.

Outside an elementary school in Mascoutah, Ill., not far from Scott Air Force Base, Lt. Col. Jim Williams attended a Sept. 11 ceremony but said the first responders were the true heroes of the day.

"I'm in the military and defend the country, but only in certain times," he said. "They do this every day."

In Akron, Ohio, firefighters rolled their trucks out of their garages and sounded their sirens for 30 seconds at the moment the south tower of the trade center collapsed, and again a half-hour later for the north tower.

Dave Johnson, a 69-year-old retiree, was completing his daily walk along Las Olas Boulevard in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and said he worried the nation had grown less vigilant over the five-year span.

"It changed everybody's life, even if they don't admit it," he said.

The families of the nearly 3,000 people killed five years ago made their way through the anniversary as best they could, the rituals now familiar but never easier.

Among them was the family of Candace Lee Williams, 20, who was on American Flight 11, the first plane to hit the trade center. Her mother, Sherri Williams, remains haunted by the way her daughter died, but comes to ground zero every year "to keep her legend alive."

Sherri Williams and her son begin the way by visiting Candace's grave in Danbury, Conn., covering it with yellow roses, her favorite. Then they get on a train and travel to lower Manhattan.

And so the mother found herself at ground zero on Monday morning, holding a large, framed photo of her blonde, blue-eyed daughter.

"It's so hard to believe the five years have passed," Sherri Williams said. "She would have been 25. She wanted to do so much with her life."

Anniversary Brings Back Memories Of Attacks (MCT)

By Robert S. Boyd And Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Across the land, Monday brought back memories of that awful morning five years ago: the crisp blue sky above Manhattan, the silver planes streaking into tall buildings, the flames, smoke, dust, horrified faces, people running, firefighters and police officers struggling, the fear, grief and death.

That day marked the end of America's innocence; the grim realization that our nation no longer is protected by its broad ocean ramparts, that enemies can strike our homeland at any time. Americans everywhere recalled on Monday where they were when the planes struck and the towers fell. Bells tolled, bagpipes wailed, flags flew at half-staff.

After an emotional tour of crash sites at New York, Shanksville, Pa., and the Pentagon, which will be forever linked by Sept. 11, 2001, President Bush called for national unity in the struggle against terrorism.

"Our nation has endured trials - and we face a difficult road ahead," he said in a prime-time TV address from the Oval Office, according to prepared remarks issued before the speech. "Winning this war will require the determined efforts of a unified country. So we must put aside differences, and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

Earlier, at a memorial service in New York, relatives of the 2,749 people lost there stood in the void that was created when the buildings collapsed and paid tribute to the victims. They clutched pictures of their loved ones, sobbing quietly as their names were read in a four-hour ceremony.

Blocks away, on a spectacular late-summer morning remarkably like the one that ended in tragedy five years before, the president and first lady Laura Bush joined a group of firefighters for moments of silence at 8:46 a.m. and 9:03 a.m., the times when the first aircraft, then a second one, slammed into the twin towers of the World Trade Center.

A few hours later, the Bushes stood in a rainy field in Shanksville, where a third hijacked plane crashed as passengers fought back against the terrorists. Again, the weather mimicked conditions five years ago. Relatives of the victims from United Airlines Flight 93 wept as the president sought to console them.

"Their actions have ennobled our lives. Their death has enriched our lives. Their courage has demonstrated that which we are all capable of," the Rev. Paul Britton, a Lutheran minister, told the crowd. His sister Marion died on the flight.

At the Pentagon, Bush's final stop, the president wiped away tears after placing a wreath in honor of the 184 passengers, crew members and people in the building who died when American Airlines Flight 77 smashed into its west side.

Lt. Col. John Jessup, whose office was destroyed in the attack, skipped the ceremonies, choosing to mark the day with quiet reflection. Jessup said he lost 23 co-workers and friends five years ago. He helped colleagues escape his office until the billowing black smoke stopped him.

He still has survivor's guilt, but said he knows that God "isn't done with me yet." He said he was back at work the day after the attacks.

"Because I'm a soldier," he said.

America's memories of that fateful day were mixed Monday with reminders that life changed then.

Jittery officials diverted a United Airlines plane bound for San Francisco to Dallas when an unclaimed BlackBerry was found aboard. New York's Penn Station was evacuated briefly because of a suspicious package.

Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, warned in a new video that Persian Gulf countries and Israel would be al-Qaida's next targets.

In Afghanistan, a planned moment of silence by American troops was disrupted by a rocket attack from resurgent Taliban fighters that sent the soldiers scrambling for cover.

"This struggle has been called a clash of civilizations," Bush said, according to his prepared remarks. "In truth, it is a struggle for civilization."

Five years on, the aftereffects of Sept. 11 remain inescapable. Public buildings resemble fortresses. Air marshals ride planes. Police patrol subways. Billions of dollars are being spent on security, yet nearly half of Americans fear another terrorist attack, pollsters report. People say they're more cautious, suspicious of others, wary of public transportation.

Yet life went on Monday. Astronauts worked to finish the International Space Station orbiting 270 miles above Earth. Meteorologists monitored Hurricane Florence in the Atlantic. "Monday Night Football" competed with the president for TV viewers' attention.

Even Congress put politics aside, briefly, holding a memorial ceremony on the Capitol grounds at dusk. The Marine Corps Band played and top Republicans and Democrats spoke. But no one expected the bipartisan spirit to last. On Tuesday lawmakers will return to battle over how to balance the rule of law with the war on terrorism, defining the rights of detainees facing trial in special military courts.

In his prepared remarks, Bush said the attacks brought out the best in Americans by exposing them to the worst.

"On 9-11, our nation saw the face of evil," he said. "Yet on that awful day, we also witnessed something distinctly American: ordinary citizens rising to the occasion, and responding with extraordinary acts of courage."

He warned Americans to brace for a long struggle.

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I," he said. "But the war is not over - and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

Hours before, the co-chairmen of the independent 9-11 commission had voiced anguish at America's halting efforts to improve homeland security. They spoke at the National Press Club, where they rued Washington's failure to embrace many of the 41 recommendations that their panel had offered toward making America safer.

DOJ_NMG_0061765

In Baghdad, the mood was somber as a digital clock counted down to 4:46 p.m., the local time of the first Sept. 11 attack. Military personnel and civilians hung their heads for a moment of silence.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the war in Iraq was the center of an effort to promote democracy and security in the Middle East.

Nation Marks Lives Lost And Hopeful Signs Of Healing (NYT)

By Robert D. Mcfadden

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Once more the leaden bells tolled in mourning, loved ones recited the names of the dead at ground zero, and a wounded but resilient America paused yesterday to remember the calamitous day when terrorist explosions rumbled like summer thunder and people fell from the sky.

On the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, as most Americans went about their Monday routines, thousands gathered at ground zero, at the Pentagon and in a field in Pennsylvania where the hijacked jetliners crashed. They included families and friends of the 2,973 people who died, President Bush and other public officials, and countless strangers united by haunting but receding memories.

At the pit in Lower Manhattan where the World Trade Center stood, they commemorated the day with familiar rituals: moments of silence to mark the times when the planes struck and the towers collapsed, wreath-layings, prayers, the music and poetry of loss and remembrance. All were freighted with emotions that still cut deeply but were showing signs of healing.

"How much do I love you?" Susan Sliwak, a mother of three, intoned at a microphone on a platform above the grieving crowd, quoting from an Irving Berlin lyric in tribute to her husband, Robert Sliwak, a Cantor Fitzgerald employee and one of the 2,749 killed at the trade center. "How deep is the ocean? How high is the sky?"

As a bass viol, a flute and other instruments softly rendered the Pachelbel Canon, Albinoni's Adagio and other solemn strains, about 200 spouses, partners and other loved ones took turns reading the names of the dead. Many spoke directly to their lost partners, often in firm, proud voices. Others told tearfully of the births of grandchildren or of having reaffirmed their marriage vows. Many simply expressed their love and that of their children, a promise never to forget.

Under shafts of golden sunlight, many family members knelt in the pit to pray. They hugged one another, cried softly or sobbed and set wreaths and roses adrift in reflecting pools that stand in the stead of the fallen towers. The waters were soon thick with flowers.

But if there was a theme to this year's proceedings, it was honoring the dead while moving on with life. "For all Americans, this date will be forever entwined with sadness," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said in closing remarks during the noon hour. "But the memory of those we lost can burn with a softening brightness."

Moments later, musicians of the New York Police and Fire Departments played taps, the slow, hauntingly beautiful solemnity that closes the military day. Yesterday actually closed with another tradition: the "Tribute in Light," two powerful beams that shot skyward, creating silhouettes of the fallen towers.

It was a sumptuously cool day in the 60's, a grand portal to autumn, and Lower Manhattan was a dramatic backdrop. One had to imagine the architecture to come on the gouged ground: angular skyscrapers to go with memorial pools. Still, the surroundings were vivid: the magical skyline rising in geometric patterns, the seas of fluttering American flags, the Hudson flickering mercurially in the sunlight, and in the distance seagulls dipping and soaring like strokes on a musical composition.

President Bush did not attend the ceremonies at ground zero, where he and his wife, Laura, laid a wreath on Sunday. Instead, he joined 100 police officers and firefighters for breakfast at a firehouse on the Lower East Side to honor first responders who rushed to the towers to save lives but lost their own. As bells tolled, Mr. Bush bowed his head in silence to mark the times when the planes hit the towers.

Later, he went to Pennsylvania and shared handshakes and hugs in a cold rain with families of 40 who died in the crash of United Airlines Flight 93 and who, the authorities believe, spared the White House or the Capitol from destruction by rising up against the hijackers. In Northern Virginia, Mr. and Mrs. Bush laid a wreath against the Pentagon wall that was hit by American Airlines Flight 77, killing 184 people.

For the first anniversary since 2002, the president visited all three places where lives were lost on 9/11, and he did so without making a speech until his evening address to the nation from the Oval Office.

The commemoration at ground zero was only one of many solemn remembrances across the country. In houses of worship, firehouses and police stations, in parks and public buildings in scores of cities, there were vigils, forums, interfaith services, concerts, exhibits and events that ranged from flying kites to floating lanterns. Millions watched the ceremonies on television and talked about where they were and what they were doing when the planes struck, and about how their lives had changed.

There were commemorations elsewhere in New York, at St. Patrick's Cathedral, St. Paul's Chapel near ground zero and in the rotunda of State Supreme Court in Manhattan. Concerts, masses, exhibits, memorial unveilings and other events were held in many suburbs: in Hempstead and Mineola and Nyack, N.Y.; in Hartford; and in Trenton, Bayonne, Middletown, Newark, Holmdel and other places in New Jersey, a state that was home to 700 of those who died at the trade center.

But behind the ceremonial day, the rhythms of life in America went on. There were jobs to do, classes to attend, soccer games, weddings, births, deaths and appointments. The armies of commerce, homemakers and civil servants went about their business, not quite as usual, perhaps, but with an awareness that 9/11, a date burned into the national psyche, had edged away from catastrophe toward the realm of tragic history. It was an occasion for solemnity but no longer a wrenching heartbreak.

Aside from discussions of the day's meaning, it was an ordinary day at most schools. At airports, bus and train stations and other transportation hubs, it was another day of security and travel, although Pennsylvania Station in Manhattan was evacuated briefly in the morning for a suspicious package that turned out to be nothing threatening.

Memories were still raw at firehouses, like one at Amsterdam Avenue and 66th Street, where Engine 40 and Ladder 35 lost 11 men five years ago. "We live with that every day," Capt. John Miles said. "This day is just for the remembrance of those that were lost." But at 8:42 a.m., minutes before the first moment of silence, a fire alarm rang in and firefighters rushed to their trucks.

At the New York Stock Exchange, work stopped to observe silences, an eerie effect on the normally raucous trading floor. On a New York Waterway ferry crossing to Jersey City, Capt. Kirk Slater, who had taken people to work who never came back on Sept. 11, halted his engines for a moment and drifted on a silent river. A subway train halted at the same moment near 96th Street on the Upper West Side. In Central Park, people strolled, played ball and spread out on lawns as if spending the day in an impressionist painting.

Life and death went on. At the Owens Funeral Home in Harlem, a service was held for Clyde Griffin Jr., an 80-year-old veteran of World War II, who died last week.

At St. Luke's-Roosevelt Hospital Center, Emma Paulino-Chindra was born to Ines Paulino-Chindra, 26, and her husband, Wendell, 31. "It's a miracle baby," the new father said. "We'll celebrate life today, not death."

Tony Arroyo Sr. of Lancaster, Pa., who took his son, Tony Jr., to the Winter Garden of the World Financial Center, marveled at a $50 million renovation and, out the window, at North Cove Marina on the Hudson River, where boats caked with debris from the towers had fled. Now, more than 40 watercraft bobbed jauntily in a spanking breeze, including a gleaming huge catamaran called Best Revenge.

The anniversary dawned on a nation vastly changed in five years, with wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, renewed fears of nuclear conflagration and security measures that have altered the ways Americans travel, do business and think about the world. Despite $250 billion in new security measures for airports, borders and seaports, most Americans believe another major attack is inevitable but have accepted searches, delays and inconvenience as the price of life in an age of terror.

At ground zero, families and friends of the dead began assembling just after 7 a.m., and by 8:30 the clusters had merged into thousands. Some wore T-shirts bearing images of loved ones. Others carried photos, bouquets of roses or carnations and the burdens of five years with the void in their lives. They descended into the pit on a ramp lined with flags and cement blocks alternately painted red and white.

Bagpipes wailed "The Minstrel Boy," and violins and flutes added to a mournful air. Later, Wynton Marsalis gave a trumpet solo. Mayor Bloomberg was master of ceremonies, and there were readings and remarks by Governors George E. Pataki of New York and Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey, as well as former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. In the crowd were many public officials, including Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles E. Schumer and Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

But most in the crowd were people like Marie Paprocki, 50, whose brother, Denis Lavelle, was on the 94th floor of the North Tower when the plane hit and was among those never found in the rubble. "It's important for me to come here because we couldn't bury him," she said. "I can feel close to him here. I can feel peaceful."

The recitation of the names of the dead has become a centerpiece of the ceremonies, performed in past years by public officials, children, parents and grandparents. Last year sisters and brothers read the names. This year it was the turn of husbands, wives and companions.

The vast majority were widows, the wives of firefighters and police officers, financial workers and other trade center employees. It was hard for many, wives choking with emotion just to speak a husband's name. Voices quavered as they invoked the names of their fatherless children and offered endearments, messages that said, in effect, we love you, miss you and will never forget you.

The recitation of names took more than three hours and, before a silent and rapt audience, became a kind of narrative, one with a strange literary power. It conveyed images beyond the deaths of heroes and patriots, quietly and relentlessly capturing the loss of real husbands and wives, real fathers and mothers, real children and siblings, and finally touching the heart of the matter: the shattered loves, the crushed hopes and the poignancy of ordinary lives.

During the recitation, there were eloquent silences as well: at 8:46 a.m., the indelible moment when American Airlines Flight 11 slashed into the north tower and changed everything; at 9:03, when United Airlines Flight 175 hit the south tower; at 9:59, when the south tower collapsed, and at 10:28, when the north tower fell.

As the names of the dead echoed outward like oratorios, thousands milled about on the surrounding streets, some pensive, some looking upset, others acting as if they were at a 9/11 street fair. On Liberty Street, someone had draped a medallion around the neck of a live tropical bird sitting on a fence, steps away from a recently opened center for ground zero artifacts.

On Church Street, dozens of protesters in black T-shirts paraded with signs and literature espousing conspiracy theories about the trade center's destruction. Someone preached about God. Someone else banged a drum. Parked on Cedar Street was a bus covered inside and out with names and photographs of the dead.

By dusk, ragged ranks of clouds had gathered over the region, and the sky became a vast expanse of mother-of-pearl iridescence.

At 7:12 p.m., sunset in New York, a switch was thrown and two powerful shafts of illumination — the "Tribute in Light" — shot up from Lower Manhattan, restoring, for one more anniversary night, the outlines of the twin towers.

In Pa., Mourners Remember Flight 93 (AP-Y)

By Dan Nephin

AP, September 12, 2006

One man drove seven hours on his motorcycle to attend the ceremony. A 15-year-old girl also showed up, hoping to understand the deaths of 40 airline passengers and crew. Another visitor was a flight attendant.

They were among hundreds of people who gathered Monday in a wind-swept field to remember Flight 93, the hijacked jetliner in which passengers tried to storm the cockpit on Sept. 11, 2001, to wrest control from terrorists shortly before the plane crashed in southwestern Pennsylvania.

The passengers were ordinary citizens one moment "and the next, heroes forever," Gen. Tommy Franks said. "We mourn their loss, to be sure, but we also celebrate their victory here in the first battle on terrorism."

The flight had been headed from Newark, N.J., to San Francisco when hijackers took over, apparently planning to crash the jet into the White House or the Capitol.

"I believe I may owe my life to those ordinary people," said Republican Rep. Bill Shuster, whose district includes the crash site, about 80 miles southeast of Pittsburgh.

Conversations from the flight's final minutes indicate the passengers knew about the attacks and took action after one of them said, "Let's roll."

"They didn't back down," said Jim Martin, 51, a highway worker from Buffalo, N.Y., who rode his Harley-Davidson to the ceremony. "I don't want those people to be forgotten. They're really heroes."

About 1,000 people attended the memorial service, including nearly 300 relatives of victims.

President Bush laid a wreath at the crash site and privately greeted family members in a cold drizzle as they marked the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks.

The president and first lady stopped for a moment of silence and bowed their heads during a prayer and the singing of "Amazing Grace." Bells tolled in memory of the victims.

A 10-foot-tall chain-link fence stands near the site as a temporary memorial, festooned with American flags, firefighters' helmets and drawings by children.

Carol Fritz, 15, arrived from Uniontown with her uncle in search of understanding.

"My kids, my grandkids are going to ask me what happened," she said, crying. "I wanted to tell them, tell them I was here."

United flight attendant Kathy Klingaman had attended three previous anniversary events at the site. She did not know the crew aboard Flight 93 but recognized that the hijacking could have happened on any plane.

"I didn't want to forget. Too many people want to forget," she said. "I come because I choose to remember."

Since the crash, a group of volunteers point visitors to the crash site and describe what happened. Some months they guide more than 25,000 visitors.

Organizers hope to raise $30 million in private funding to build a permanent memorial on a 1,700-acre site in Shanksville; the total cost is estimated to be $58 million. Congress has passed the Flight 93 Memorial Act, which established a new national park to honor the victims of the hijacked plane.

DOJ_NMG_0061768

At the ceremony, Gov. Ed Rendell announced that the state would sign a commitment letter to give $10 million to the memorial effort, and that it had acquired 300 acres around the crash site that will be managed as a public wildlife area.

"This action will forever preserve the entrance to the memorial in an undeveloped and natural setting," Rendell said.

In 2001, first responders quickly realized there would be no survivors. All they could find at first were small pieces of aircraft and bits of a United Airlines in-flight magazine.

Searchers recovered only about 8 percent of the potential human remains but were able to identify everyone from the fragments they did find, said Somerset County Coroner Wallace Miller.

"Most of the material was vaporized," he said.

Looking Back On A Tragedy With Energy And Respect (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

It was smart of CNN to send Anderson Cooper to Afghanistan, not ground zero, for the fifth anniversary of 9/11.

Afghanistan is where this all started. Ground zero is where innocence ended. That was obvious throughout the slow, mournful roll call of victims' names at the World Trade Center memorial service — a public tribute to private family tragedies, more than 2,700 of them, one after another.

It was just as clear on MSNBC, which chose to rebroadcast the "Today" show of Sept. 11, 2001. Until the second plane hit the south tower that morning, Katie Couric and Matt Lauer assumed, like almost everyone else, that the first plane crash was an accident. What stands out now is how calm they seemed as reality sank in and things kept getting worse, and how little anyone really understood at the time.

It is painful, but not difficult, to memorialize Sept. 11 on television. There are so many images from that morning, so many ways to recreate its horror and mourn those who died.

President Bush used that sadness and rekindled anger as a frame to challenge criticism of the Iraq war in his televised address. "We face an enemy determined to bring death and suffering into our homes," he said from the Oval Office. "America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I. But the war is not over — and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

The day of ceremony, remembrance and wreath-laying was bracketed by fresh scenes of violence in Iraq and Afghanistan and renewed jitters at home. Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, issued his own tribute, a video warning that new attacks were imminent.

In Afghanistan, a suicide bomber blew himself up at the funeral of the assassinated governor of Paktia. A United Airlines flight from Atlanta to San Francisco was diverted after an unclaimed BlackBerry was found on board. In New York, Pennsylvania Station was evacuated for a while.

For New Yorkers especially, yesterday unfolded with that same sense of sorrow and unease that darkened the entire fall of 2001.

CNN provided the morning's most ambitious fifth anniversary special by weaving together a time line of pivotal moments on Sept 11, 2001. Besides covering the president and Laura Bush as they paid their respects in New York, in Pennsylvania and at the Pentagon, CNN brought out witnesses in those places who recounted their memories.

A CNN reporter, Jonathan Freed, was at the Norad command center in Colorado to review what took place there five years ago. From there, he was the first to report that United Flight 351 was being rerouted for fear of a terrorist bomb — a precaution that fortunately proved unnecessary. Mr. Freed's live bulletins may have needlessly alarmed viewers, but they did evoke the pinpricks of tension that are a legacy of Sept. 11.

Sometimes CNN switched to the ceremony at ground zero, at others it went overseas to a forward base in Afghanistan where Mr. Cooper had gone to observe American soldiers gather for their own commemoration in the field. As he spoke onscreen about being on the "frontline" of the war on terror, the men suddenly broke into a run behind him, rushing to escape incoming fire. (To his credit, Mr. Cooper, who was on live, kept talking and didn't duck or run.)

Throughout all those zigzags, CNN held its own tribute — the news crawl at the bottom of the screen showed a candle and the word "remembering" as the names of the victims spilled across the screen, all day.

At 9:05 a.m. yesterday, CNN showed the clip of that exact moment five years ago in a classroom in Sarasota, Fla., when President Bush first learned that the county was under attack, and sat frozen in his seat. CNN accompanied it with an interview with the teacher who sat next to Mr. Bush at the blackboard, and she recalled that she knew something was wrong by the look in his eyes.

Hours before the president attended the ceremony for Flight 93 in Shanksville, Pa., CNN interviewed an assistant volunteer fire chief, Rick King, at the same time that, five years earlier, he was on his porch talking by cellphone to his sister when he saw a fireball in the distance and rushed to the scene of smoke and tangled metal. "I just looked around, and no people," he recalled. "I was thinking, Where are the people?"

All the news programs covered the anniversary with energy, respect and exhaustive detail. CNN found a way to relive the day hour by hour without losing track of the world around it.

Family Of Fallen 9/11 Rescuer Fights DOJ (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 12, 2006

New York Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) and Charles Schumer (D), and Rep. Pete King (R-N.Y.) gathered with President Bush at St. Paul's Chapel in New York Sunday to commemorate the five-year anniversary of the 9-11 attacks, but behind the scenes they are struggling with his administration over the controversial death of one rescuer.

On the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, Glenn Winuk — whose first love in life was being a firefighter but who became a lawyer at Holland & Knight to earn a better living — did what would be natural to any first responder near the scene of a disaster: he rushed to it. Winuk raced from his nearby office to Ground Zero to rescue survivors and died when the South Tower collapsed.

Near St. Paul's Chapel this weekend, Bush spoke in front of a 56-foot-long bronze bas-relief sculpture outside the Ladder Company 10 and Engine Company 10 firehouse donated by Holland & Knight as a tribute to Winuk and the 343 firefighters who died in the attacks.

But the Justice Department last week made public a ruling that Winuk was not eligible to be recognized as a firefighter having died in the line of duty despite his years of volunteer service. Justice made the decision because at the time of his death Winuk had downgraded his affiliation with the Jericho, Long Island, fire department to "associate member."

The decision has surprised many New York officials because it overruled the findings of a hearing officer appointed by Justice to adjudicate the case and because it disregarded the intervention of several prominent New York leaders, including Gov. George Pataki (R) and two of New York's most powerful members of Congress, Clinton and King, who is chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"I write to ask that the Department of Justice act without further delay and find that Glenn J. Winuk is eligible for the Public Safety Officer's Benefit," Clinton wrote in an Aug. 16 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. "Recognition of Glenn's heroism is long overdue, and it is my hope that the DOJ will see fit to award Glenn the same status as the other brave men and women who also sacrificed their lives for others on that tragic day."

Jay Winuk, Glenn's older brother, met with Clinton last month to explain his brother's case. Since Clinton wrote her letter, Winuk said, Sen. Charles Schumer's (D-N.Y.) staff has also offered to help battle the Justice Department.

The New York state legislature and Pataki have also intervened by passing and signing into law a bill that declared Winuk an active member of the Jericho volunteer fire department at the time of his death and eligible for all benefits of active employees.

The Justice Department's decision has denied Winuk's parents $250,000 in federal benefits.

Jay Winuk said his family's fight is about much more than money.

"Our family is doing this because Glenn deserves to be honored in the same way by the United States of America as all other rescuers who sacrificed their lives on Sept. 11 to protect their country and save other lives, " said Winuk. "It really is about honor. Firefighters and policemen shouldn't have to worry about if something should happen to them that their families have to struggle to have that great sacrifice recognized."

King has also gotten involved by writing two letters to Justice.

"It makes absolutely no sense to me," said King, who is working with Jay Winuk on the case. "In many ways Glenn Winuk personifies everyone on Sept. 11. He was both a civilian and a firefighter. He was evacuated as a civilian and he raced back in as a firefighter."

King said that he's been in discussions with former New York mayor and possible 2008 presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani (R) about how to win recognition for Winuk.

Thomas Von Essen, who is Giuliani's business partner at Giuliani-Von Essen LLC and who was New York City's fire commissioner at the time of the attacks, weighed in with the hearing officer appointed by Justice, Daniel Skoler.

"He had both the training and the guts to step forward in the face of great danger when it was needed most," Von Essen wrote of Winuk in a letter to Skoler. "That's what firemen do. I can assure you that true firemen don't care about their membership status when life is at stake, and every indication is that Glenn Winuk was a true fireman."

King said he didn't know what the next step would be, but vowed to continue pressing the issue.

Winuk said that only Justice has opposed recognizing his brother.

DOJ_NMG_0061770

"Every other entity in a position to recognize Glenn's sacrifice officially has done so," he said. "Only the federal government in the form of the Department of Justice has failed to do so and refuses to do so."

He has continued to honor his brother by helping direct the Glenn J. Winuk Humanitarian Fund, which makes grants to educational and community service groups. He also serves as vice president for My Good Deed, a group devoted to establishing Sept. 11 as a national day of service.

He said he expects to appeal the Justice Department's decision in court.

The Justice Department did not comment by press time.

'Zero' Sums Up Our Paranoid Moment (USAT)

By Deirdre Donahue

USA Today, September 12, 2006

In today's media-fixated world, the intersection of various entertainment forms — miniseries, movies, novels, comic books — and 9/11 was inevitable. And on occasion, incendiary. Witness the firestorm over ABC's The Path to 9/11.

It would be a shame if Jess Walter's novel The Zero were lost amid all these other 9/11 projects. The author of the unforgettable non-fiction book Ruby Ridge and the admired novel Citizen Vince, Walter uses 9/11 and the past five years as a launch pad to explore how bureaucrats and profit-hungry corporations have distorted a tragedy.

In Zero, Walter has created a satire/tragedy that Franz Kafka and Kurt Vonnegut Jr. might appreciate.

This praise comes from a critic who thinks 9/11 is too recent, too controversial, too important and too painful a topic to be used for historical fiction or docu-dramatizations with their imagined dialogue and dramatic distortions.

Zero is different, in part because Walter succeeds in creating what he calls "a 9/12 novel." It's a dark allegory about the attack, the aftermath, and what has happened to America as seen through the prism of one man's nightmarish experience.

The novel focuses on Brian Remy. A cop who ran toward burning towers in an unnamed city which is clearly New York on a day that is clearly 9/11, Remy finds himself working for a political heavy hitter in the aftermath of 9/11.

Shell-shocked, suicidal and prone to memory gaps, Everyman Remy becomes involved with a covert government agency. His assignment: Find out what happened to a woman who may have fled the towers on 9/11, warned by her Muslim terrorist lover.

This task dispatches Remy into a disturbing world of terrorist cells, victims' families, torture and spy agencies. Walter subtly presents this as a metaphor for what's happening in the USA.

Zero is not perfect. Walter often employs a very heavy trowel to apply symbolism to the novel, and Remy's fractured love and family life distract from the story.

But for a corrosive black comedy about how politicians have manipulated genuine grief and fear, count on Zero.

The Liberals' War (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

"When I was 19, I moved to New York City. . . . If you had asked me to describe myself then, I would have told you I was a musician, an artist and, on a somewhat political level, a woman, a lesbian and a Jew. Being an American wouldn't have made my list. On Sept. 11, all that changed. I realized that I had been taking the freedoms I have here for granted. Now I have an American flag on my backpack, I cheer at the fighter jets as they pass overhead and I am calling myself a patriot."

-- Rachel Newman, "My Turn" in Newsweek, Oct. 21, 2001

Here's a puzzle: Why is it so frequently the case that the people who have the most at stake in the battle against Islamic extremism and the most to lose when Islamism gains -- namely, liberals -- are typically the most reluctant to fight it?

It is often said, particularly in the "progressive" precincts of the democratic left, that by aiming at the Pentagon, the World Trade Center and perhaps the Capitol, Mohammed Atta and his cohorts were registering a broader Muslim objection to what those buildings supposedly represented: capitalism and globalization, U.S. military power, support for Israel, oppression of the Palestinians and so on.

But maybe Ms. Newman intuited that Atta's real targets weren't the symbols of American mightiness, but of what that mightiness protected: people like her, bohemian, sexually unorthodox, a minority within a minority. Maybe she understood that those F-16s overhead -- likely manned by pilots who went to church on Sunday and voted the straight GOP ticket -- were being flown above all for her defense, at the outer cultural perimeter of everything that America's political order permits.

This may be reading too much into Ms. Newman's essay. Yet after 9/11 at least a few old-time voices on the left -- Christopher Hitchens, Bruce Bawer, Paul Berman and Ron Rosenbaum, among others -- understood that what Islamism most threatened wasn't just America generally, but precisely the values that modern liberalism had done so much to promote and protect for the past 40 years: civil rights, gay rights, feminism, privacy rights, reproductive choice, sexual freedom, the right to worship as one chooses, the right not to worship at all. And so they bid an unsentimental good-bye to their one-time comrades and institutions: the peace movement, the pages of the Nation and the New York Review of Books, "the deluded and pathetic sophistry of postmodernists of the left, who believe their unreadable, jargon-clotted theory somehow helps liberate the wretched of the earth," as Mr. Rosenbaum wrote in the New York Observer in 2002.

Five years on, however, Messrs. Hitchens, Bawer et al. seem less like trendsetters and more like oddball dissenters from a left-liberal orthodoxy that finds less and less to like about the very idea of a war on Islamic extremism, never mind the war in Iraq. In the September issue of the Atlantic Monthly, James Fallows, formerly Jimmy Carter's speechwriter, argues that the smart thing for the U.S. to do is declare victory and give the conflict a rest: "A state of war with no clear end point," he writes, "makes it more likely for a country to overreact in ways that hurt itself." Further to the left, a panoply of "peace" groups is all but in league with Islamists. Consider, for instance, QUIT! -- Queers Undermining Israeli Terrorism -- a group that, in its hatred for Israel, curiously fails to notice that Tel Aviv is the only city in the Middle East that annually hosts a gay-pride parade.

An instinct for pacifism surely goes some way toward explaining the left's curious unwillingness to sign up for a war to defend its core values. A suspicion of black-and-white moral distinctions of the kind President Bush is fond of making about terrorism -- a suspicion that easily slides into moral relativism -- is another.

But there are deeper factors at work. One is appeasement: "Many Europeans feel that a confrontation with Islamism will give the Islamists more opportunities to recruit -- that confronting evil is counterproductive," says Ayaan Hirsi Ali, the Somali-born, former Dutch parliamentarian whose outspoken opposition to Islamism (and to Islam itself) forced her repeatedly into hiding and now into exile in the United States. "They think that by appeasing them -- allowing them their own ghettoes, their own Muslim schools -- they will win their friendship."

A second factor, she says, is the superficial confluence between the bugaboos of the Chomskyite left and modern-day Islamism. "Many social democrats have this stereotype that the corporate world, the U.S. and Israel are the real evil. And [since] Islamists are also against Israel and America, [social democrats] sense an alliance with them."

But the really "lethal mistake," she says, "is the confusion of Islam, which is a body of ideas, with ethnicity." Liberals especially are reluctant to criticize the content of Islam because they fear that it is tantamount to criticizing Muslims as a group, and is therefore almost a species of racism. Yet Muslims, she says, "are responsible for their ideas. If it is written in the Koran that you must kill apostates, kill the unbelievers, kill gays, then it is legitimate and urgent to say, 'if that is what your God tells you, you have to modify it.'"

A similar rethink may be in order among liberals and progressives. For whatever else distinguishes Islamism from liberalism, both are remarkably self-absorbed affairs, obsessed with maintaining the purity of their own values no matter what the cost. In the former case, the result too often is terror. In the latter, the ultimate risk is suicide, as the endless indulgence of "the other" obstructs the deeper need to preserve itself. Liberal beliefs -- and the Rachel Newmans of the world -- deserve to be protected and fought for. A liberalism that abandons its own defense to others does not, something liberals everywhere might usefully dwell on during this season of sad remembrance.

A War Of Words (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

There was a time, not so long ago, when no one ever spoke of an American "homeland." During World War II there was a home front, and of course there has always been a heartland between the two heartless coasts, but no one thought of our big-shouldered cities, traffic-choked suburbs, purple mountains' majesties and amber waves of grain as anything called a homeland.

The United States was always a place for people who had left their homelands behind, a polyglot, rainbow-colored nation whose defining characteristics were vitality, mobility, dynamism and the restless urge to push toward the next frontier. But now we inhabit an official homeland, with an official Department of Homeland Security to protect it.

"Homeland" is one of the burdens left to us by the trauma of Sept. 11, 2001. Words are all we have to give shape to reality, and because we had no words for what happened five years ago -- by definition, language falls short of the unimaginable -- a new lexicon had to be developed. I am convinced that much of this new language, by accident or design, has the effect of clouding our view of our enemies and ourselves. We need to begin choosing our words more carefully, and we need to discard the ones that do not serve us well.

The word homeland is a vivid but relatively inconsequential example -- less a distortion than an infelicitous choice that makes us sound as if we had quaint harvest rituals and a colorful national costume. It strikes an odd note, with its vague connotations of ethnic solidarity and ancient nationalism, and it gives off more than a whiff of us-vs.-them. This nation does have enemies from whom we need vigilant protection, but something more like "domestic security" would have done just fine, with less baggage.

At the other end of the scale, by far the most fateful post-Sept. 11 coinage is "war on terrorism." The phrase that has come to define our era is entirely suspect, except perhaps the "on."

President Bush wasted little time in declaring that the Sept. 11 attacks were acts of war that could be met only with a military response -- a war on terrorism. The invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq certainly fit the rubric of "war," but the most effective ongoing action against al-Qaeda and other jihadist groups has been a worldwide exercise in law enforcement -- surveillance, arrests, detentions, interrogations, prosecutions.

Witness the recent arrests of would-be airline bombers in London, or the fact that so many of the high-value terror suspects held until recently in secret CIA prisons were captured in Pakistan, an ostensible ally. We should call this police work what it is, although that might make it harder to ignore such principles as habeas corpus and due process.

As for the rest of the phrase, terrorism is a tactic, not an enemy. All terrorists are alike in only one regard -- they practice terrorism. Stubbornly refusing to acknowledge important distinctions among them strikes me as insanely self-defeating.

George W. Bush certainly is no great orator, but the White House does understand how language can be used to shape reality. So when the National Security Agency's unprecedented program of electronic eavesdropping was revealed, it was quickly dubbed a "terrorist surveillance program" -- as if somehow, magically, the NSA's computers could deduce who was unquestionably a terrorist without ever happening to overhear a single conversation involving someone who is innocent.

Then there's the matter of what is and is not a "civil war." By laying down this yardstick to judge the war in Iraq, the White House has focused its critics' attention on an irrelevancy. What difference does it make whether unrelenting bloody chaos meets the dictionary definition of a civil war? No difference at all to the next Iraqi civilian killed, or the next American soldier.

People whom it's inconvenient to call criminal suspects or prisoners of war are instead "detainees," as if they've been forced to stay an hour after school. Torture, as spelled out in international agreements, is merely an "alternative" method of questioning. And the steady climb in the death toll in Iraq is "real progress."

On Sunday, Dick Cheney said the reason there have been no attacks in five years is that the administration has done a good job on "homeland security, in terms of the terrorist surveillance program we've put in place, in terms of the financial tracking we put in place, and because of our detainee policy."

There was a time, not so long ago, when people would have scratched their heads and wondered what on earth the vice president was talking about.

Law Firms See An Array Of Fates After Sept. 11 (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 12, 2006

Successes and strains noted five years later

In the five years since the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, attorney H. Taufiq Choudhury said that he has grown numb to the reminders he sees every day on his way to work in lower Manhattan.

"I've gotten used to it," he said. "The feeling is not as sharp."

An immigration lawyer, Choudhury initially relocated his solo practice from the 22nd floor of 1 World Trade Center to midtown Manhattan after the attacks. But today, his firm, which also endured the 1993 trade center bombing, is back in the downtown area.

There is a certain comfort for Choudhury in returning to lower Manhattan, he said, but his practice still suffers as a result of the events on Sept. 11, 2001.

"It has changed for the worst," he said.

Choudhury is just one of an estimated 14,000 New York lawyers -- more than 10 percent of all lawyers in the state -- whose practices were upended when the planes brought down the Twin Towers. The businesses of virtually every lawyer working below 14th Street in Manhattan were affected by the attacks. In the towers themselves, attorneys and support staffers at about 30 law firms lost their offices and, in some cases, their lives.

STARTING OVER

Five years later, some law firms have come back to the downtown area, but many others have opted to start over in areas less scarred.

In Choudhury's case, returning to lower Manhattan made logistical sense, he said, because he commutes from Jersey City, N.J., located directly across the Hudson River from the Ground Zero area.

At first, small-business loans helped jump-start his practice. Later, he was able to pay those off when insurance proceeds came through. He also received assistance from nonprofit groups that helped displaced businesses after the attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0061773

While moving back has made his commute easy, re-establishing his business has been difficult, he said. His immigration practice these days has very few new clients, he explained, mainly because of the increase in immigration "bureaucracy" following Sept. 11, 2001.

Obtaining documentation and credentials for business clients and individuals has become, in some cases, impossible, he said, because of rigorous scrutiny from more federal agencies involved in the process.

For a lawyer who does not bill hourly, the red tape has strangled his business, he said.

"The total effect has been devastating for firms like mine," he said.

Also returning to downtown Manhattan was Thacher Proffitt & Wood, which had about 300 people in its offices on three floors of 2 World Trade Center. It now is located at 2 World Financial Center.

Like Choudhury's practice, New York-based Thacher Proffitt initially relocated its New York office to midtown Manhattan. It, too, weathered the 1993 bombing. But most of the similarities between the firms ends there.

"We've done extremely well since we've been back," said Thacher Proffitt partner Omer S.J. Williams. He served as managing partner at the time of the attacks.

Many businesses returning to the area were able to do so at relatively low market rates and through federal and local incentive programs. Incentives for the Liberty Zone -- the area surrounding the World Trade Center site -- included per-employee payments, tax credits and accelerated depreciation programs. Many incentives remain in effect to help rebuild the area that lost as much as 10 percent of its commercial space when the towers collapsed.

But Thacher Proffitt's decision to move its New York offices back to lower Manhattan two years ago was largely based on a "commitment to the downtown area," Williams said.

"It was an emotional thing to get back downtown," he said.

Apparently, it was a good move. Gross revenues for the 274-attorney firm in 2005 were $157 million, up almost 25 percent from the year before, according to The American Lawyer, an affiliate of The National Law Journal. The firm also has offices in Washington; White Plains, N.Y.; Summit, N.J.; and Mexico City.

Some of the more prominent law firms with offices in or near the World Trade Center in September 2001 included Carter, Ledyard & Milburn; Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton; Drinker Biddle & Reath; Harris Beach; Hill Betts & Nash; Holland & Knight; Kenyon & Kenyon; Ohrenstein & Brown; Richards Kibbe & Orbe; and the firms then known as Pillsbury Winthrop; and Sidley Austin Brown & Wood.

Firms that have not returned to lower Manhattan include Harris Beach; Ohrenstein & Brown; Pillsbury Winthrop; and Sidley Austin.

Five years after the event, the pace of redevelopment has frustrated many New Yorkers. Although some transportation arteries and areas surrounding the site have been restored, there are no new structures at Ground Zero.

The results of a poll conducted by Pace University and released in July showed that nearly half of the lower Manhattan residents surveyed thought the rebuilding effort was "on the wrong track." The poll included responses from 511 residents. Critics pointed to state and local officials and developers as the culprits.

NINE MONTHS, SEVEN MOVES

For some attorneys and support personnel at Ohrenstein & Brown, returning to the area was too painful, said partner Michael Brown.

"There were too many people who would just not go back," he said. His firm was located on the 85th floor of 1 World Trade Center when American Airlines Flight 11 crashed into the building.

About 35 people worked in the New York office. After the terrorist attacks, the firm moved locations seven times in nine months before settling at One Penn Plaza, where it now has about 15 attorneys, said Brown. He added that the firm has a long-term lease at its current location. It also has an office in Garden City, N.Y.

The morning of Sept. 11, 2001, Brown was returning from an eye doctor's appointment and was not in the building. Then managing partner Geoffrey Heineman led 15 lawyers and support staff in a desperate descent 85 floors to the street. The firm lost two employees, believed at the time to have been in the elevator when the attacks occurred.

Five years after the event, Brown seems to possess a degree of optimism. Business at the firm now is "fine," he said, adding, however, that the series of moves during the last five years was traumatic.

"It is both a sad and yet in some ways hopeful memory in that you get to understand how resilient people really are," he said.

FBI Has Two Squads In Minnesota Focused On International Terrorism (MINNST)

By Pam Louwagie, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 12, 2006

The unit and its role came to light as the agent in charge reflected on U.S. security since Sept. 11, 2001.

As he reflected on five years of fighting terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks, Minneapolis FBI special agent in charge Michael Tabman said Monday that a second local squad was created last year to focus on international terrorism groups.

The squad, part of the Joint Terrorism Task Force that includes 22 local, state and federal law enforcement agencies, does not signify imminent danger of an attack to the community, Tabman said. It was created, he said, because there is "sufficient activity, people, things that we need to look at, people who may be acting in support of terrorism."

The Minneapolis FBI office had one Joint Terrorism Task Force squad focused on international terrorism before the 2001 attacks -- a group partially credited with the arrest of convicted Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui on immigration charges before the attacks.

Tabman, who took charge here last year, said he wanted a second squad to increase intelligence-gathering and reach out to communities, building trust and cooperation so people feel free to come forward with information.

The squad is one of several local changes that reflect new priorities in the FBI.

"We have gone from an investigative agency to a preventive agency," Tabman said.

A New York City native, Tabman sat down with reporters Monday to share his thoughts on the fight against terrorism over the past five years.

The Patriot Act

Tabman credits the USA Patriot Act with giving the FBI and other agencies better tools to do their work. He said the act helped tear down "the wall" that kept intelligence officials and law enforcement from sharing information before the attacks.

There's still a lot of oversight when decisions are made on intelligence gathering -- something the public still wants, he said. "If we become abusive of that power, then the terrorists have won. They've changed our way of life," he said.

Describing protocol, Tabman said there's "very little chance of us running around as a rogue agency just asking for things we don't need."

By the numbers

Besides adding the second international terrorism squad, which officials would not release details on, Tabman said they've increased the number of intelligence analysts in the Minneapolis office from four to nine and started programs such as a joint venture between business and law enforcement leaders to open lines of communication and share resources and information.

Nationally, there were 35 Joint Terrorism Task Forces before the attacks, local FBI officials said, and now there are 101; the number of special agents have increased from 11,186 to 12,626.

The FBI used to have 23 offices overseas. Now it has 60.

Winning by fighting

Tabman said we're winning by fighting terrorism.

He expects terrorism will be an issue into the next decade or two, but says the improvements mean the country is stronger and safer than it was.

"We're not going to wipe out terrorism, just like we can't wipe out drugs or stop crime completely," Tabman said. "Every day that we don't have a terrorist act, every day that citizens go home and feel confident we'll have a safe day the next day, we've won. We've won significantly."

Local FBI Chief: U-S Response To Terror Has Been Successful (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 12, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - The lead F-B-I agent in Minneapolis says it's no accident that there's been no further terrorist attacks in the five years since 9-11.

Special Agent in Charge Michael Tabman says that reflects the bureau's decision after the attacks to make preventing terrorism its top priority.

At a media briefing today marking the fifth anniversary of the terror attacks, Tabman rattled off statistics he says shows the bureau's emphasis. That includes almost 15-hundred new agents bureau-wide, 65 new anti-terror task forces nationwide between the F-B-I and local law enforcement agencies, and a shift from investigating crimes to preventing them.

Tabman says Americans have to be prepared for the war on terrorism to continue for decades. But he says that every day there's not another attack is a victory.

World Remembers 9-11 But Many Not Crying (AP-Y)

By Elaine Ganley

AP, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061775

The nations of the world joined Monday in solemn remembrance of Sept. 11 — but for many, resentment of the United States flowed as readily as tears.

Critics say Americans have squandered the goodwill that prompted France's Le Monde newspaper to proclaim "We are all Americans" that somber day after the attacks, and that the Iraq war and other U.S. policies have made the world less safe in the five years since.

Heads bowed in moments of silence for the 3,000 killed in the attacks on New York and Washington — while the No. 2 al-Qaida leader issued new warnings in a videotape. And dissident voices said the world has traded in civil liberties and other democratic rights in its war on terror.

In Europe, where Islamic terror has struck twice since 9/11, in the Madrid train bombings and the London transit attacks, the silent tributes were tinged with doubts and recriminations.

Even German Chancellor Angela Merkel — an advocate of repairing ties with Washington that were frayed under her predecessor Gerhard Schroeder — had veiled criticism of the United States, saying: "The ends cannot justify the means."

"In the fight against international terror ... respect for human rights, tolerance and respect for other cultures must be the maxim of our actions, along with decisiveness and international cooperation," she said.

The international landscape has changed irreversibly since terrorists hijacked four airliners in 2001, crashing two into the World Trade Center, one into the Pentagon and another into a Pennsylvania field.

Adding to the global jitters, a senior al-Qaida leader issued a new warning.

"You gave us every legitimacy and every opportunity to continue fighting you," said Ayman al-Zawahri, addressing the United States. "You should worry about your presence in the (Persian) Gulf and the second place you should worry about is Israel."

Another video posted on the Internet by al-Qaida showed previously unseen footage of a smiling Osama bin Laden and other commanders in a mountain camp apparently planning the Sept. 11 attacks.

Allies in the U.S.-led war on terrorism renewed their resolve Monday to fight fanaticism, while skeptics countered that they can no longer follow a superpower they say has relinquished its right to lead.

"Right after Sept. 11 the world was united with Americans. Their moral leadership was unquestioned," Pawel Zalewski, head of the Polish parliament's foreign relations committee, wrote in the Gazeta Wyborcza. "However, this strong moral authority was abused as a result of the Iraq war."

Exactly five years after its message of solidarity, Le Monde titled its lead editorial "The Mistakes of Bush."

In Caracas, Venezuela, about 200 marchers protested what they called "imperialist terrorism" carried out by the United States since the 9/11 attacks. Demonstrators — many of them supporters of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and some of Arab descent — carried Lebanese, Syrian and Palestinian flags. Many criticized the U.S. invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani wrote President Bush on behalf of the Iraqi people, expressing condolences to the families of Sept. 11 victims.

"On this sad and memorable day, I would like to reiterate the gratitude of the people of Iraq for the people of America and for your leadership," Talabani wrote. "The people of Iraq will never forget those who helped them in getting rid of the most brutal and terrorist regime of Saddam Hussein."

New Zealand's Prime Minister Helen Clark joined many when she said: "No, we're not more secure since 9/11."

Clark said more should be done to reach out to moderate states and leaders in the Islamic world to encourage understanding between different peoples, and to help end the sense of alienation and exclusion among some young Muslims that fuels extremism.

In Europe, bells tolled in Rome's city hall square. Bouquets of white roses and yellow carnations were piled in a memorial garden where the names of 67 Britons killed in the New York attacks are inscribed. Relatives tearfully remembered their dead.

"It doesn't get any easier, but our minds are much calmer, and we can think through all the events without being flooded by tears and sadness," said Adrian Bennett, whose 29-year-old son, Oliver, was killed.

At a 38-nation Asia-Europe summit in Helsinki, Finland, leaders stood in silence in a circle. The stock exchanges in Nordic and Baltic countries observed two minutes of silence to honor the victims.

French President Jacques Chirac, in Helsinki, reiterated in a written message to Bush his nation's "friendship" in the fight against terrorism.

A week after the Sept. 11 attacks, Chirac flew over the World Trade Center site — the first foreign leader to pay personal condolences. That solidarity quickly dissipated into rancor in the buildup to the Iraq war, when Chirac led opposition to Bush's plans.

Israel's Haaretz daily expressed disappointment and cynicism in an op-ed piece that said: "This is Sept. 11 five years later: a political tool in the hands of the Bush administration."

DOJ_NMG_0061776

In Southeast Asia, U.S. and Philippine troops fighting Islamic extremists in the jungles prayed for peace and safety. Other remembrances took place in Japan, Australia, Finland, South Korea, Thailand and Indonesia.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who won the country's first post-Taliban election, expressed the appreciation of the Afghan people to the U.S. for the "sacrifices of your sons and daughters" in rebuilding his country. But in the Afghan capital, many residents said they had not seen much improvement since the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban for harboring bin Laden.

Despite about 20,000 U.S. forces fighting al-Qaida and Taliban fighters in Afghanistan, and about the same number of NATO troops, and billions in aid, the Taliban resistance has shaken the country, while corruption has stymied development.

In Brussels, NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer led a solemn military ceremony outside the alliance's headquarters to remember the victims of 9/11. A lone bugler played taps while a ceremonial guard, drawn from each of the 26 NATO member nations, lowered national flags to half-staff.

"Terrorism remains a threat to all of us ... this is why we are in Afghanistan, the cradle of 9/11," de Hoop Scheffer said, calling on NATO nations to "strengthen our alliance politically and militarily to meet this new scourge."

The Apocalypse Will Be Blogged (NYT)

By Bernard Haykel And Saud Al-sarhan

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

NEARLY every organ of the American news media marked the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11 yesterday. But the Web sites affiliated with many of militant jihadism's top thinkers, including Abu Muhammad al-Maqdisi and Sulayman al-Alwan, remained silent. That shouldn't surprise us: the Salafi strain of Islam, to which most jihadis subscribe, prohibits commemorating anniversaries.

Celebrations other than the holidays of Id al-Fitr and Id al-Adha are considered reprehensible adaptations of non-Muslim ways. What's more, the jihadis normally use the lunar calendar, by which the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11, 2001, fell on July 19.

Perhaps more remarkable was the fact that this year, a number of Web sites affiliated with Al Qaeda did commemorate the day — no doubt because they knew Americans would. Osama bin Laden and his associates have generally referred to the Sept. 11 attacks as "the attacks on Manhattan," "the invasion of Manhattan" or the "attacks of Jumada," the lunar month in which they occurred. But this year, a number of jihadi sites have referred instead to Sept. 11.

Some messages yesterday were clearly meant for Western consumption, reminding the United States that Al Qaeda is still active and bent on future attacks, and even posting images overlaid with threats in English.

What follow are excerpts, translated from the Arabic, from texts posted on jihadi Web sites about the anniversary.

With God's help and yours, let us make the fifth anniversary of the events of Sept. 11 the beginning of a boycott of all Zionist-American products that are sold in Arab and Muslim countries. Many continue to buy these products despite all they see and hear about the killing, torture and destruction that Muslims are faced with due to the Crusader and Zionist-American war. Let us boycott these products because we do not need them, nor are they to be considered absolute necessities. Here is a list of the companies and products that should be boycotted: Coca-Cola, Proctor & Gamble, Nike, Mars, McDonald's ... "Pepsi" stands for "Pay Every Penny to Save Israel." ...

I'm against America even if it turns this life into a paradise

I'm against America even if a mufti issues a fatwa in its favor from within the glorious Kaaba

I'm with Osama no matter where he might be, so long as he carries a banner on the battle front

I'm with Osama whether he gains a quick victory or attains the rank of the martyrs.

A submission to a Qaeda Web site called for readers to sign their names to the following statement:

In the name of God the merciful and the compassionate, Monday morning is the fifth anniversary of the glorious attacks on New York and Washington accomplished by the 19 heroes of the Muslim community — may God have mercy on them and raise them to the highest rank for their sacrifice. They pressed America's nose into the ground and allowed the whole world to witness the destruction of its economic and military citadels. In so doing, they crushed the myth with which America had terrorized the world, namely that it was the greatest power on earth and no one was strong enough to confront, let alone make an enemy, of it....

DOJ_NMG_0061777

That day changed the world, even by the admission of our enemies, and created ... a world divided into two camps, as our sheik and leader Osama bin Laden — may God protect him — has stated: "A camp of belief and another camp of hypocrisy and disbelief." Choose for yourself, o Muslim, which camp to belong to: that of belief, Islam and jihad under the banner of the holy warriors or that of hypocrisy and unbelief under the banner of America, the crusading West and those hypocrites who have banded with them. Our congratulations to all and we beseech God to show us in America another black day like that blessed Tuesday.

A poster calling himself Abu Lujayn Ibrahim contributed the following to a Saudi site that often posts jihadi material but is not controlled by Al Qaeda.

The text was interspersed with gruesome photographs of dead and mutilated children in the Middle East.

Before my eyes is a veil that does not permit me to see those killed in the twin towers, nor to remember them on this day. Indeed, I don't see those killed in the twin towers nor remember them on this day! Do you know why?

Because their fallen are not purer or better than our fallen. And because the blood of my Muslim brothers and that of my family in Palestine ... and in Iraq and in Afghanistan and in every location in which Muslim blood is shed has blocked my vision ...filled my retinas with black lines so that I can see only our martyrs and injured being slain by America's weapons and its support .... Yes, Sept. 11 is the anniversary of the fall of American arrogance into history's garbage dump, and of the rebellion against injustice.

Hamid ibn Abdallah al-Ali is a Kuwaiti ideologue of jihadism — the only Qaeda intellectual to have posted a text specifically for the Sept. 11 anniversary. The sheik cites an article by Leonard Peikoff, heir and executor to Ayn Rand, that appeared as an advertisement in The New York Times shortly after the 9/11 attacks.

In his article "End States that Sponsor Terrorism," Leonard Peikoff, one of the leading ideologues of American extremism, concluded that America's policy of appeasement toward the Muslim world led to Sept. 11. For 50 years, he writes, American administrations have relinquished their true ownership rights over Muslim oil resources, which they discovered and developed the technology to extract. The solution, according to Mr. Peikoff, is for the United States to eliminate the states that sponsor terrorism with the most lethal weapons at its disposal.

This is exactly the kind of rotten thinking that animates those living in the extreme west of the globe, from where they spread their rot to the rest of the world — these politicians of underdevelopment, criminality and mass extermination of humanity. This is the arrogance of fascism, of which Bush has accused Muslims recently: in this case it is the fascism of the cross standing on the tribunes of oil. In short, it means that they own our oil that is in our land; they own our blood, which they can shed at will; they own our present and future, and they have the right to change our history and our education!...

Hunger, disease, thirst and regional wars instigated by poverty all stem from the greed of the West, its thirst for plunder and desire to control the world's wealth. These in turn lead to a rate of destruction every year that equals the destruction World War II effected over six years.

The mercenaries who dominate the World Trade Organization ... the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund ...the bloodsuckers of the world's poor, the immiserators of nations and the thieves, murderers, shedders of blood: these are the ones who control the international political system. They are the ones who spread their armies throughout the world, terrorizing and stealing the wealth of nations while enslaving them. They are the ones who are exterminating the people of Afghanistan, Iraq, Palestine, Lebanon and other places. They are the ones who ally themselves to the despotic rulers in order to suck the blood of the people, using companies that are owned by the leaders of their countries and headed by murderers and criminals.

What a beautiful morning it is today, an amazing morning when we witnessed this great power flailing in every direction as if it were a slaughtered headless animal....

Some believe that if Bush were to leave then the situation would improve and become stable. But the eternal truth is that there is no difference between Bush and the one who preceded him, or the one who will succeed him, and for a very simple reason: cloning is an inherent property of the American presidential personality. Every new president is a perfect copy of the previous one...

Three children, 10 or 11 years old, who watched the recently released film "United 93" at the theater zealously and gleefully cheered when the plane hit the tower, as if they were watching a goal being scored in a soccer match against an opposing team. What is it that makes these children so happy about this crash that they stand up and strongly applaud? Ask yourselves, oh Americans, what is it that made those 19 young men engage in such a legendary and miraculous act...?

Naturally, you will not bother to investigate, because you are not concerned with the reasons, and even if you find the answer you are incapable of understanding it. Therefore, nothing will change, and your troops will continue to invade our lands in order to teach us lessons about the virtues of American freedom and the well-known methods for spreading them, like flushing the Quran down the toilet, or one of your soldiers' stepping with his filthy foot on the face of a prisoner, having placed a metal chain like a dog leash around his neck, as we saw in Abu Ghraib.

You will witness anew men as brilliant as Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Ramzi bin al-Shibh, and as determined as Muhammad Atta, whom you saw on the monitoring screens full of self-assurance in his blue shirt.... Who knows, perhaps we will see another glorious day soon!

Rice Thanks Canadians For Post-9/11 Help (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday the generosity of Canadians who took in thousands of stranded American air passengers five years ago represents the best of human nature in the face of evil.

The top U.S. diplomat commemorated the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terror attacks with a short visit to the closest U.S. ally. She read a letter of thanks from President Bush to employees at Halifax's small airport who helped coordinate a huge impromptu aid effort.

More than 30,000 travelers on 247 U.S.-bound planes were diverted to Canada on Sept. 11, and most were stranded there during the nearly three days that U.S. airspace was closed for fear that more planes could be used to attack buildings. Halifax itself received 44 planes bearing more than 7,000 passengers.

"There is indeed evil in the world, and we saw its awful face on that horrible day," Rice said inside an echoing airport hangar. "But it is also a day to recognize that very often when the worst in human nature and human behavior exhibits itself, so does the best."

Rice's fifth anniversary visit came as President Bush toured the three sites where hijacked jetliners crashed in 2001.

In Halifax, residents opened their homes to complete strangers, sometimes for days at a time. Other travelers camped out at the airport, in school gyms, stadiums and cafeterias. Residents dropped off donated toothbrushes, towels and clothes.

The story of Canadian generosity is not well known in the United States, where news converge and public attention were focused on the aftermath of horror and death in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

During her overnight visit, Rice was also visiting the Nova Scotia parliamentary district of Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay. The detour from Rice's usual itinerary of foreign capitals is a nod to Canada's new Conservative government after strained relations with Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin. His government refused to take part in the U.S.-led attack on Iraq and rebuffed the Bush administration's plan for a cooperative North American missile defense scheme.

House In 9-11 Standoff (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, September 12, 2006

House Republicans and Democrats are locked in a standoff over the language of a resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Democratic leaders want the GOP to remove any reference to legislation passed in response to the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon, which include the USA Patriot Act of 2001, the Homeland Security Act of 2002 and the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004.

Republicans argue that many of these accomplishments were listed in two of the previous four such annual resolutions.

Democrats requested that Republican leaders remove a long passage that refers to the bills signed by President Bush, according to a draft from Sept. 6 obtained by The Hill.

GOP leaders refused, citing the two previous resolutions and a need for Congress to refer to its accomplishments following the attacks.

Homeland Security Chairman Pete King (R-N.Y.) was hopeful the leaders could broker a deal and get the resolution to the floor. His office is looking for chairmen and ranking members from the other committees to build support for the bill as it stands.

"I'm actually very disappointed in the Democratic leadership," said King, who spent yesterday at events commemorating the attacks.

"To me, it makes sense for the Congress to mention the legislation we passed," he said, "I just think they are drawing attention to themselves. I think it's making them look bad."

DOJ_NMG_0061779

The controversial passage begins: "Whereas Congress passed, the president signed, numerous laws to assist victims, combat forces of terrorism, protect the Homeland and support members of the Armed Forces who defend American interests at home and abroad."

Democrats support that language, a leadership aide said, but oppose the mention of specific bills.

The rest of the section goes on to mention passage of the USA Patriot Act and its renewal this year, the 2002 Enhanced Border

Security and Visa Entry Reform Act, the 2002 Maritime Transportation and Security Act, the bill to create a director of national intelligence, the bill creating a national standard for IDs accepted by federal safety officials, and the 21st Century Emergency Communications Act of 2006 that enhanced the communications abilities of federal, state and local first responders.

The spat illustrates the partisan tension besetting both parties heading into the November midterm elections, which has been a factor preventing substantive legislation this year.

Negotiations on the resolution's language have been mainly between House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) staff and aides to King and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), King and a GOP leadership aide said.

This is the third such standoff between the Speaker's office and Pelosi's staff since mid-June. The two earlier fights were over language used in a resolution to support war efforts in Iraq and a resolution to articulate House support for Israel in its fight with Hezbollah terrorists.

The tension on this resolution built late last week when Pelosi released a letter to the San Francisco Chronicle that she sent to Hastert on Thursday, the second of two such notes. In it, the minority leader argued that the draft resolution "unfortunately injects controversial political issues into a subject that must remain free of partisan and political rhetoric."

"It is inappropriate, in this solemn and commemorative resolution, to reference legislation which generated bipartisan opposition and controversy," Pelosi continued.

Republicans have since unearthed the previous four resolutions to prove that legislative accomplishments were mentioned in resolutions honoring the first and third anniversaries of Sept. 11.

A passage from the first anniversary resolution mentions the creation of the Department of Homeland Security and contains an oblique reference to the USA Patriot Act, which congressional leaders marshaled through Congress in a mere 60 days following the attacks.

On Sept. 9, 2004, less than two months before the presidential election, Congress approved a resolution to honor the third anniversary of the attacks. It included a long list of individual federal programs that were either created or enhanced in the aftermath of those attacks. But the bill does not mention the specific legislation creating any of those programs.

The resolutions in 2003 and 2005 made no mention of legislation or programs. Each of the five resolutions focuses primarily on honoring those who died.

Republicans have mounted a communications campaign this fall to highlight their strength on national security, which includes references to the terrorist attacks.

It may be that neither side can benefit from the new controversy, but both pointed fingers yesterday.

"Democrats seem to care more about the November elections and risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on Sept. 11 than work with us in a bipartisan way," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "They don't even want the 9/11 intelligence reform bill to be recognized by Congress.

"We consider Sept. 11 so sacrosanct and nonpolitical that we're offering this resolution on Sept. 13 because the New York primary is on the 12th and we don't want politics to come into play."

Democrats echoed those claims in criticizing their Republican counterparts.

"The memory of 9/11 is sacred," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said. "It was a day to put divisions aside and unite in support of innocent victims and America's fight against terrorism. That is the spirit of what Republicans should offer. Instead, Republicans hope to score political points."

Parties Bicker Over 9/11 Bill (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

While House Republican and Democratic leaders joined together Monday night on the steps of the Capitol to pray and sing "God Bless America" to commemorate the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, a less-bipartisan affair occurred behind the scenes as the offices of Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) battled over the text of a resolution to mark the tragedy.

DOJ_NMG_0061780

Deliberations over the annual anniversary resolution stalemated Monday, according to several House aides, with the GOP leadership now expected to bring the legislation to the floor Wednesday despite Democrats' unhappiness with the text of the measure.

"Negotiations have stopped," said a GOP leadership aide, who confirmed Hastert's office had walked away from the negotiating table. "We're going forward with it."

It is not the first time Hastert and Pelosi have sparred over the details of nonbinding resolutions — the two leaders have squabbled repeatedly on symbolic measures related to terrorism and the Iraq War — but it is indicative of the tone of the year's political season when the chamber's leading officials cannot agree on the wording of a Sept. 11 resolution, despite the fact that previous versions have overwhelmingly passed the House every year since 2001.

Bickering over the merits of one section in the otherwise bipartisan resolution has stoked tensions between the two top leadership offices, and each camp has sought to paint the other as acting with partisan motives.

"Congress should honor the innocent victims and resolve to continue to fight terrorism in the same unified sprit we came together with on Sept. 11, 2001," said Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's spokeswoman. "Unfortunately Republicans are more concerned about scoring political points."

Ron Bonjean, communications director for Hastert, offered similar criticism for the other party: "Democrats seem to care more about the November elections and risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on Sept. 11 than work with us in a bipartisan way."

According to both GOP and Democratic aides familiar with the dispute, Pelosi's office sought to strike a section of the resolution that acknowledges a series of laws enacted since 2001 to "assist victims, combat the forces of terrorism, protect the homeland and support the members of the Armed Forces who defend American interests at home and abroad."

Those laws include the USA PATRIOT Act, the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, and a number of border security, intelligence reform and port security laws.

In a letter sent to Hastert Thursday and released publicly by her office, Pelosi initially requested a resolution in line with the one approved 402-6 last year, on that makes no mention of specific legislation.

The California lawmaker also sought alterations in a telephone conversation with Hastert last week.

"This is not a time to praise Congress," she wrote in last week's letter. "It is time to offer our sympathies to the families of those who suffered losses on September 11th."

Many Democrats, including Pelosi, have questioned the merits of the legislation listed in the resolution and whether such laws have made America safer.

GOP aides familiar with the resolution said Hastert's office believed Pelosi's insistence to remove the references to legislation from the text went too far and they strongly disputed suggestions that the inclusion of the text was an attempt to put Democrats on the record as supportive of the legislation itself.

Republicans also believe that Democrats want to omit any discussion of Congressional achievements from the Sept. 11 bill because the minority party has been utilizing an election-year strategy accusing the GOP of not doing enough to protect the country from future attacks.

But Democratic aides countered those arguments, questioning why specific legislation would be cited in the bill, unlike previous years.

"Democrats want to vote on the resolution that we voted on last year. It was acceptable to Republicans then. Why is it suddenly unacceptable?" Crider said. "The people who are making this political are Republicans. We had hoped that this would be bipartisan and unifying."

Despite the partisan divide over the resolution's contents, House lawmakers are expected to pass the measure by a wide margin, as Democrats would be hard-pressed to oppose language praising civilians and first responders, as well as military personnel deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Democrats will show their support for the innocent victims of 9/11 and our continued fight in the war against terror," said one Democratic aide.

This week's dispute is only the latest of several instances where the top two House leaders were unable to agree on the text of a non-binding resolution.

In June, Democrats complained that the GOP was overly partisan in its crafting of a resolution that was used as the vehicle for a day-long debate on the Iraq War.

Iraq also was the subject of a spat in 2004, when negotiations between Hastert's and Pelosi's offices broke down over a resolution on abuses in military prisons. And in 2003, the two sides bickered over the wording of a resolution supporting American troops in Iraq.

In the Senate, this year's Sept. 11 resolution has sparked little contention, and lawmakers passed their measure under unanimous consent Monday night.

A Solemn, Sad Moment To Reflect, But Politics Also Surfaces (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — With their hands clasped to their hearts, Democratic and Republican members of Congress stood shoulder to shoulder on the steps of the Capitol on Monday evening and sang "The Star-Spangled Banner," in a ceremony echoing a spontaneous moment on the evening of the 2001 attacks.

"It is my sincere hope that we will reignite our united purpose," Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, said on the Senate floor before the ceremony. For 20 civil minutes, the Republican and Democratic leaders of the House and Senate took turns paying tribute to the victims of Sept. 11, before ending with "God Bless America."

But eight weeks before Election Day in the most contested midterm election in 12 years, even the tragedy of Sept. 11 could go only so far in uniting the two parties.

Back inside the Capitol, Republicans and Democrats were squabbling over the wording of a Sept. 11 resolution in what aides to both parties acknowledged was, to no small extent, a bid to gain political advantage. And throughout the day, even as Democratic and Republican aides talked about efforts to avoid being seen as tarnishing the memory of the attacks with blatant political appeals, candidates and Congressional leaders were issuing statements reflecting political implications that Republicans and Democrats saw in the day's events.

"We can't afford to grow complacent," said Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, as he signaled that Republicans intended to try to keep the issue alive with votes on national security initiatives.

And Democrats were no less aggressive in trying to frame the issue. "After 9/11, I think we lost an historic opportunity as a nation to bring a great deal of the world with us on the war against international terrorism," said James Webb, a Democrat challenging Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, in a closely watched race. "And we squandered that in the situation in Iraq."

The battle over the anniversary resolution reflected just how politically charged the day has become.

Congress has passed a resolution every year. In non-election years, the resolution has simply noted the valor of rescue workers and extended sympathies to families.

But in election years — 2002, 2004 and now 2006 — the Republican-controlled House has included language heralding accomplishments in the war on terror. This time, the Republican version of the resolution applauded the reauthorization of the legislation known as the USA Patriot Act, as well as the tough immigration bill passed in the House.

"They are asking us to endorse several things that many members voted against," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader. "9/11 should be a sacred day where we all come together and we remember the victims and we resolve to fight the terrorists. It shouldn't be a day to score political points."

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the House speaker, said the resolution was similar to those passed in earlier years. "The day of Sept. 11 is sacrosanct," Mr. Bonjean said. "Politics are not involved, nor should they be. We think the other side has overthought the issue."

The House will vote on the resolution on Wednesday. Republicans had hoped to hold the vote on Tuesday but put it off after assessing some real-life political concerns: there are a series of party primaries that day, so some members will not be around.

Lawmakers Unite Once Again Over 9/11 (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

Five years after lawmakers and Hill staffers fled the Capitol in fear of a terrorist attack like those at the Pentagon and World Trade Center, politicians gave a message of unity and determination yesterday.

"Today, we are called to put aside the differences that divide us and to remember the resolve of a September morning," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. "We are called to resummon the courage of a nation that came together on its darkest day around a common principle and a vision of hope. The principle being that we are Americans, and Americans shall always be free."

In a rare bipartisan event, Mr. Frist and Republican leaders joined Democratic leaders Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi and about 100 other lawmakers on the steps of the Capitol. The lawmakers recalled the evening of September 11 when many members of Congress gathered on the steps and sang "God Bless America."

DOJ_NMG_0061782

Republicans and Democrats came together for that moment in a spontaneous show of patriotism, members said yesterday as they enter what are sure to be the bitter last two months of the election season.

Many echoed Mr. Frist's comments that September 11 was "a day that forever changed our world."

Mr. Reid of Nevada said the American spirit now lives in everyone's heart -- with heroes of the terrorist attacks keeping a bright light shining on the nation.

"September 11th will always be our burden," he said. "Our minds, our souls, our hearts cannot forget."

The leaders praised the sacrifice of passengers on United Flight 93, who are thought to have tried to regain control of their hijacked plane, which likely was headed to the Capitol or the White House but instead crashed into a Pennsylvania field.

"We must protect and save the American people, because right now we are not fully safe and we are not fully healed," said Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat. "So it is important for us to continue to come together for that healing."

The party machines, which normally send dozens of e-mails a day blasting their political foes, yesterday agreed to a rhetoric cease-fire, avoiding negative campaigning and press statements on anything other than honoring the heroes of September 11.

In 2001, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois told lawmakers that both parties would stand "shoulder to shoulder to fight this evil that has perpetrated on this nation," according to press accounts.

Since then, Republicans and Democrats have feuded over September 11 -- its consequences, who is to blame and whether it should be used as justification for the war in Iraq.

This week, the House will consider a resolution commemorating the anniversary of the attacks, but Democrats have accused Republicans of larding the legislation with partisanship such as praise for the USA Patriot Act.

Some offered a reminder of the consequences of the terrorist attacks.

"Five years later, we are still a nation in mourning, and we are also a nation at war," Mr. Hastert said yesterday. "It is important, especially today, and especially here in this place, that we remember the difference.

"We do not fight to heal our wounds or to avenge our dead," he said. "We do not seek retribution but rather freedom and justice and peace."

The lawmakers closed the event with most joining hands and singing, again, the words that united them five years ago: "God bless America, my home sweet home."

Whereas Congress Cannot Set Aside Politics . . . (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

It is a testament to how far Congress has come from the post-attack unity of five years ago that House Republicans and Democrats are fighting over a resolution commemorating the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The resolution is the legislative centerpiece of the week in the House, and each side is accusing the other of using the resolution for political gain.

The dispute is not over the resolution's conclusions, which include the continued recognition of Sept. 11 as a day of remembrance, mourning and honoring first responders.

The wrangling, instead, is over one of 15 "whereas" clauses, in which Democrats see a possible trap: "Whereas Congress passed, and the President signed, numerous laws to assist victims, combat the forces of terrorism, protect the Homeland and support members of the Armed forces who defend American interests at home and abroad, including: the USA Patriot Act of 2001 and its 2006 reauthorization; the Homeland Security Act of 2002; the Enhanced Border Security and Visa Entry Reform Act of 2002; the Maritime Transportation Security Act of 2002; the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004; the Border Protection, Antiterrorism, and Illegal Immigration Control Act of 2005; the Safe Port Act of 2006; and the 21st Century Emergency Communications Act of 2006."

Democrats can vote for the resolution and in so doing, praise controversial legislation that many of them opposed. Or they can vote against the resolution and be portrayed as forsaking the victims and heroes of 9/11.

"This should be a resolution about unity, undertaken in the same spirit we came together to show on September 11, 2001," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Republicans say that Democrats are hoping to strike any reference to Congress's response to the attacks, in order to preserve the claim that the "do-nothing Congress" has done nothing to make the country safer. Democrats would rather "risk offending the memories of those who were murdered on Sept. 11 than work with us in a bipartisan way," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

GOP leaders yesterday sent the resolution to the House International Relations Committee for final approval. Democrats conceded privately the resolution will pass overwhelmingly, with or without Pelosi's signature on top.GOP Allies on Immigration Split on Tribunals

The core of GOP senators who successfully insisted that Congress take a moderate route on immigration legislation is spearheading the push for a bipartisan bill on military tribunals. This time, however, the group lacks the support of three key figures: President Bush, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

Playing central roles in both issues are Republican Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), John W. Warner (Va.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.).

In the months-long debate over immigration, they helped steer the Senate toward a bipartisan bill that, unlike the House version, would have allowed many illegal immigrants to pursue a path toward legal status. Most GOP senators opposed the bill, but it passed with the backing of 38 Democrats and 23 Republicans, including Frist and McConnell. Bush also supported it.

Now, however, Frist, McConnell and Bush oppose the McCain-led team on the question of how to regulate trials of enemy combatants being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Bush wants a hard-line stand on prosecutions, including the possible use of classified information that is never shown to defendants. Frist and McConnell, who visited Guantanamo on Sunday, support the president, leaving McCain and his allies with a steeper climb than they faced in the immigration fight.Lobbying Legislation Goes Quietly

The House will say goodbye to the once-trumpeted lobby-reform bill as early as this week. Lawmakers are reluctant to express their intentions exactly that way, but senior staffers said that when the House votes to change its rules to make "earmarks" -- narrowly focused spending projects -- more transparent to the public, that will signal that they have given up hope of approving a broader lobbying measure.

In January, spurred by lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty pleas on fraud and conspiracy charges, Republican leaders called the lobby legislation a top priority. But the bill quickly ran into trouble as lawmakers resisted provisions that would limit their interaction with lobbyists. Voters expressed little concern when the legislation was diluted.

Now, bogged down by a disagreement over a House-passed provision that would restrict independent campaign organizations called 527s, Congress is poised to punt on the entire exercise. As a consolation, GOP leaders in both chambers said they want to require lawmakers to disclose the earmarks contained in any bill and to name the earmarks' sponsors.

The House is still developing its earmark-disclosure language, aides said. In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) plans to ask for similar legislation to be drafted this week.

With 9/11 Film, Kean Finds Tough Critic In Hamilton (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

There have been few political love stories as beautiful as that of Tom Kean and Lee Hamilton, the former chairman and vice chairman of the 9/11 commission.

"I have never worked with anybody I've come to respect more than Lee Hamilton," Republican Kean said at a Sept. 11 fifth-anniversary joint performance with Hamilton yesterday.

"He is one of the preeminent public servants of our day, bar none," came Democrat Hamilton's well-worn reply.

So it packed even more punch when Hamilton, at the National Press Club luncheon, lectured his friend about the falsified Sept. 11 docudrama Kean helped ABC produce.

"It is either a documentary or it is a drama, and to fudge it causes me a great deal of concern and suggests to me that news and entertainment are getting dangerously intertwined," the former congressman from Indiana said of his friend's film. "And I do not think that that is good for the country, because an event of this consequence is very hard to understand, and to distort it or not to present it factually in this kind of a presentation, I think, does not serve the country well."

Kean, the "co-executive producer" of this disservice, stood at Hamilton's side, his hands clasped in front of him, grinning awkwardly.

In the past five days, the former New Jersey governor has infuriated many a Democrat who saw him as a nonpartisan truth-teller. In his work on ABC's "The Path to 9/11," Kean has blessed what has been documented to be a collection of falsehoods -- a disproportionate number of which make the Clinton administration look bad.

Critics on the left say Kean's bout of partisanship was brought on by the campaign of his son Tom Jr. for a Senate seat from New Jersey (ABC News was confused enough between father and son to say in its political calendar that "candidate Tom Kean Jr." was appearing with Hamilton). Whatever the motive, Kean's foray into the land of make-believe has thrilled those who seek to discredit the 9/11 commission's report.

The press club was thick with such people yesterday before Kean's arrival. In the Edward R. Murrow Room, conspiracy-minded characters hung posters announcing: "Neither planes nor fires brought the buildings down. Controlled demolitions did."

DOJ_NMG_0061784

"They label us as kooks or wackos or conspiracy theorists," complained David von Kleist, making quotation marks with his fingers for the audience. But the "bottom line," he added, is that "this was an inside job . . . the terrorists didn't do it."

Lynn Pentz asked why plane wreckage was not seen at the Pentagon. "We're essentially to believe that the two six-ton titanium engines vaporized?" she asked.

The participants said the ABC show, which initially had claimed to be based on the 9/11 commission's report, proved their thesis that Kean lives in the realm of fiction. "It's a dramatized fraud of a fraud," said Jim Marrs, author of "The Terror Conspiracy."

Next door, in the John Peter Zenger Room, a group of 9/11 families were touting a new documentary, "9/11: Press for Truth," which promises that "the coverup" will be "exposed by the 9/11 families."

Kyle Hence, the documentary's producer, used Kean's role in the ABC film as his opening. "The consensus seems to be that this verges on propaganda; it distorts what happened," he said. "We'd like to put forward '9/11: Press for Truth' as a counternarrative, as a true documentary, not a dramatization, not a distortion of the truth."

An hour later in the press club's ballroom, Kean professed to being puzzled by the conspiracy crowd.

"It seems every time there's a traumatic event in American history, it spawns conspiracy theories," he said with a laugh. "I mean, people still think that John Wilkes Booth got away and hid somewhere in the South. As for the 9/11 conspiracy theories, he said, "I don't know what to do about them."

Kean saw no link between the conspiracists and his work in the docudrama trade. When the ABC question was put to him, Kean declared himself mystified by the criticism.

"I've been confounded by this whole controversy," he said innocently. He said that the film's creators are "serious people who wanted to do the best job possible," that it "was a responsible project" and that "I thought they did a good job."

His one attempt at distancing himself was halfhearted. "I was not the producer or director or the author or the writer or whatever else," said co-executive producer Kean.

Hamilton, a tireless Kean booster, answered with some rare public criticism of his partner. "They didn't ask me to participate in this," he said acidly, adding that complaints from Clinton officials were "accurate in their criticisms of ABC." As for the "docudrama" format, the no-nonsense Hoosier said: "I don't like the ring of that."

Spontaneous applause followed Hamilton's criticism.

If Kean was surprised by the scolding, he shouldn't have been. Even before the ABC question came, Hamilton volunteered some stern remarks about the importance of truth. "Facts are not Republican and they're not Democrat," he said. "They're not ideological. Facts are facts."

On this point, Kean was silent.

The Fictional Path To 9/11 (NYT)

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Perhaps the entertainment industry will come up with a few lasting lessons from the outcry over ABC's "dramatization" of the events leading up to the terrorist attacks on 9/11. One suggestion: when attempting to recreate real events on screen, you do not show real people doing things they never did.

The film, a fictionalized portrayal of the nation's failure to head off the attack on the World Trade Center, was shown Sunday and Monday. The second episode was wrapped around a live speech by President Bush, so it was especially unfortunate that the most questionable scenes all seemed to make the Clinton administration look worse, and Mr. Bush look better, than the record indicates.

Some of the most controversial scenes were cut at the last minute. But the first episode, for instance, showed C.I.A. agents and the charismatic leader of Afghanistan's Northern Alliance perched outside a bin Laden camp, ready to swoop in and capture him if only Washington approved. The authorization is not granted, and the Afghan leader rails, "Are there no men in Washington, or are they all cowards?" Yet neither C.I.A. operatives nor the Northern Alliance leader ever laid eyes on Osama bin Laden, terrorism experts say. The film may be referring to a proposed raid by other Afghan tribesmen that was vetoed by the C.I.A. because it had a low probability of success and was apt to harm civilians.

The "docudrama" format can be useful in allowing viewers to see recent history through the eyes of fictional characters inserted in the action. But it carries the inherent risk that scriptwriters will take the opportunity to improve on history. ABC should certainly have been aware this was a danger with such a politically charged topic. If that thought never occurred to the folks in charge, they might have heard warning bells when Rush Limbaugh went on the air promoting the film and bragging that the writer was a friend of his.

It was especially disturbing that Tom Kean, co-chairman of the 9/11 commission and a former Republican governor of New Jersey, was willing to lend his prestige to this ill-considered project. Mr. Kean served as a senior consultant to the miniseries and has repeatedly defended it in public, even as several Democratic members of the commission criticized its distortions. Mr. Kean has said he will give his payment to charity, but that does not undo the damage done to the aura of bipartisanship that has surrounded the commission's work. And it has not defused concerns that Mr. Kean did it in part to help his son, who is the Republican candidate for Senate in a close race in New Jersey.

Maybe Mr. Kean wasn't entirely kidding when he quipped that he had not apologized to President Bill Clinton for any inaccuracies because "he was out campaigning against my son yesterday, so I didn't reach out to him at all." Whatever his motives, he has tarnished his carefully nurtured image of a statesman above the political fray.

Serious Gaps Seen In Airline Security Since 9/11 Attacks (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

Congress has spent billions to protect against future airplane hijackings, but critics say many changes made are haphazard and misguided and that serious security gaps remain in place five years after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

"We are a token amount safer only because we are more aware -- but nowhere near safe enough to be confident," says David Mackett, director of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance. "The systems we've spent billions on have a record that is anything but confidence inspiring."

Mr. Mackett says airline security is a "patchwork" of "desperate attempts" to appear safe without offering long-term solutions.

Reinforcing cockpit doors is the accomplishment most cited by government officials to keep terrorists from gaining the controls of airplanes, but Mr. Mackett says several breeches have occurred putting pilots at risk.

"We're just trying to keep the pies from falling off the end of the conveyer belt," said Mr. Mackett, a commercial airline pilot.

In one incident, a drunken passenger kicked a door panel open during a flight to Argentina, and a passenger on another flight watched a crew member input the door code and later used that code to open the door, thinking it was the lavatory. In another incident, on a bet, a cleanup crew drove a beverage cart through a door, Mr. Mackett said.

In a speech Friday at Georgetown University, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said, "We have succeeded in laying over the last five years a solid foundation for the future of our aviation-security efforts for the five years and the 10 years to come."

He cited the hardening of cockpit doors, "thousands" of federal air marshals "on aircraft protecting travelers every day all over the world" and "armed flight deck officers authorized and trained to defend the cockpit."

"To be sure, there's more to do," he said. "The enemy constantly adapts his tactics and his methods. And we have to keep pace and get ahead of those."

While all airlines have installed new doors, United Airlines is the only company that has installed steel cable barriers to prevent someone from charging the flight deck.

"Pilots still leave the flight deck vulnerable when they go in and out to use the lavatory or when the flight attendants serve them food and beverages," says one former air marshal.

Only a small fraction of 25,000 to 30,000 daily flights are protected by air marshals -- who number less than 2,500 due to high attrition -- or about 6,000 armed pilots who complete the burdensome Federal Flight Deck Officers (FFDO) requirements set by the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

"Few pilots are armed because TSA insists on making the FFDO program so difficult," the marshal said.

"There has not been nowhere near the amount of [federal air marshals] hired to replace the ones that have left in the last four years," he said.

Pilots have to undergo more background and psychological investigations even though the airlines and Federal Aviation Administration have already completed such tests, and have to spend their own money for the training in Artesia, N.M.

"Right now, our last line of defense is for a military jet to shoot down an airplane," Mr. Mackett said. "It's tough to explain why a military pilot has the missile, but an airline pilot doesn't have a gun to protect his own aircraft."

"Seating capacity in Theatre No. 4 at Washington's E-Street Theatre: 232. Total attendance: seven. And we accounted for two of them," the center notes.

Worse yet, PETA President Ingrid Newkirk was on hand for the Washington premiere.

Hortensia to Hillary

Washingtonian S. Michele Nix writes to thank us for showcasing the "nonsensical banter" about Katie Couric's CBS anchoring "debut and outfits."

"I published a book in 2000 -- Women at the Podium: Memorable Speeches in History," she notes. "It was a long research project that resulted in a collection of speeches by women of power and influence -- from Hortensia 42 B.C. to Hillary in 1998.

"I did it because I noticed that, when it came to including speeches by women in speech anthologies, most [editors] would throw in a speech by Susan B. Anthony and call it a day. What struck me in my research for the book was how often reporters wrote of what these women wore, as much if not more than what they said, particularly in the 20th century (since it was only then that newspapers started acknowledging that women were speaking in public).

"Reporters (including women) talked of Margaret Chase Smith's outfits and ladylike style (as she skewered [Joseph] McCarthy on the Senate floor), Shirley Chisholm's white gloves and coordinated outfits, of Katharine Graham's dresses and pearls during Watergate, of Maggie Thatcher's suits and purses, of course Hillary Clinton's many hairdos and pantsuit color choices.

"We don't read stories that add mention of the president's bold, red [Tommy] Hilfiger tie or NBC's Brian Williams' broad navy suit and freshly shined oxblood shoes," she points out.

"Whether Katie Couric succeeds or fails, I doubt it will be on her fashion choices -- but on her merits as an anchor. Now, I'm off [and] I may walk out the door in my post-Labor Day white sandals."

Time to sweat

One of the most frightening predictions surrounding a future terrorist attack in the District comes from Dan Coleman, who until his recent retirement was the FBI's top expert on Osama bin Laden.

In an interview with Jeff Stein of Congressional Quarterly, Mr. Coleman foresees the next hijacked plane swooping down over the green grass of the National Mall, roaring over tourists' heads, and straight into the dome of the U.S. Capitol.

And by what means?

Airliners are virtually unguarded while refueled on airport tarmacs, Mr. Coleman cites among other security weaknesses not yet fully addressed. In addition, transportation workers still aren't sufficiently screened, and while grandmothers in wheelchairs can't slide by X-ray scanners, terrorists can.

Indeed, a trans-Atlantic pilot for American Airlines, who flew home from London two days after the most recent foiled terrorist attacks, tells Inside the Beltway that terrorists could easily smuggle the dreaded "liquids and gels" aboard airplanes by simply duct-taping the potentially explosive agents to their legs.

In the meantime, ordinary Americans continue to have their antiperspirant confiscated from carry-on luggage -- at a time when they need it most.

Lawmakers Back Ban On Liquids On Airliners (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers from both political parties say the month-old ban on carrying most liquids on airliners should remain until airport screeners and machines can detect explosives such as those that alleged terrorists planned to use to destroy U.S.-bound planes in August.

Congressional representatives such as Pete King, R-N.Y., chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, and Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., both have expressed support for the ban. King's spokesman, Chad Scarborough, said it "might be necessary to make the ban permanent until we can develop the technology to catch this stuff," referring to potentially explosive liquids that right now can't be detected easily at checkpoints.

"Right now, I don't know what alternatives we have," said Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., chairman of the House aviation subcommittee. "Until we can put other [security] measures in place, I think we're sort of stuck with it."

The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) said last month that it was studying whether it can safely allow passengers to carry small amounts of liquids on airliners.

TSA chief Kip Hawley said encouraging passengers to use carry-on bags could ease the strain on luggage-bomb detectors caused since the Aug. 10 liquid ban increased the amount of checked luggage.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recently said that leaving the ban in place might keep security lines moving faster than a potentially confusing policy allowing small quantities of liquids.

"It might be that we'll conclude that any changes will only make it more inefficient and create more confusion, and we're better off sticking with what we have," said Chertoff, whose department oversees the TSA.

The National Business Travel Association has told Homeland Security officials about the frustrations of business travelers who must check luggage even for short trips.

Even so, association spokesman Caleb Tiller said, "We're not saying, take these bans out, because the most important thing is to manage security."

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., chairman of the Senate terrorism subcommittee, said most travelers "are understanding about why it's necessary to endure the inconvenience."

Airline passengers may carry small amounts of liquid prescription medicines, baby formula and eye-care products. The rules took effect Aug. 10 after British authorities said they foiled a plot to smuggle bomb components, including liquids, onto U.S.-bound airliners.

For airports, the ban "has not been a problem," said Charles Chambers, head of security for the Airports Council International. Sales at airport shops are up in the past month because travelers are arriving at airports earlier and have more time to spend in concourses, Chambers said.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate homeland security committee, said she hopes the TSA "will be able to ease the restrictions without compromising security." The long-term solution, Collins said, is developing better technologies.

Funding, Amendments Pose Ports Bill Obstacles (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

For all the talk of Senate committees skipping arm-in-arm down the path to stronger port security, the floor of the venerable chamber this week instead will feature its share of territorial disputes.

Though the chairmen of the three committees of jurisdiction — Commerce, Science and Transportation; Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs; and Finance — lauded the alleged compromise bill in floor speeches last week, a number of key agreements between the three, most notably how to fund the $835 million bill, have yet to be worked out. And the bill is in danger of being larded with myriad expensive transportation-related amendments.

Despite the hurdles, aides to both parties say they should be able to come up with some finished product by Thursday, before, perhaps, turning to an Amtrak authorization bill.

Of course, the lead sponsors of the bill — Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairwoman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) — warned last week that the bill they have worked on for more than a year would have no teeth if it lacked a solid funding mechanism. However, the measure they introduced on the floor Thursday does not have specific financial backing.

DOJ_NMG_0061788

In fact, as of press time, they were still working with Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) to identify a funding source, but Murray's spokeswoman said the Congresswoman was prepared to offer an amendment today to pay for the bill using customs fees — a method to which Grassley previously has objected.

Meanwhile, several members of the Commerce panel appear to be trying to recreate a more comprehensive transportation security bill that the committee approved last year. Already, Collins and Senate Commerce Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) reportedly have agreed to entreaties by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to add the rail security portion of the Commerce bill.

But Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) also plans to offer an amendment to add the Commerce bill's titles on buses, trucks and hazardous materials, according to a Democratic aide. The pipeline-safety portion of the bill also may be proposed as an amendment, the aide added.

"This could quickly become a homeland security bill, rather than just port security," the aide said. "This debate could go in a lot of directions this week."

Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Chairman Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) may offer his bill to improve mass-transit security, Democratic and Republican sources said.

No word on how any of those amendments, which would only add to the price tag, would be paid for, either.

Even prenegotiated provisions in the port security measure could come under fire from Commerce members eager to restore their prerogatives.

For instance, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) may offer a proposal to tap the Coast Guard as the agency in charge of handling the aftermath of a terrorist attack at a port, a GOP aide said. The Collins-Murray bill gives the secretary of Homeland Security the authority to name the appropriate agency, but the original Commerce bill named the Coast Guard, the aide said.

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats are planning a host of other transportation security-related amendments.

Although Collins said the bill sets up a pilot program at a handful of ports to assess the feasibility of screening 100 percent of the cargo that enters the United States, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) — who is facing a tough GOP challenger in a state where port security is vital — is expected to offer an amendment to require 100 percent screening at all ports.

Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), who also is up for re-election this year, could propose an amendment addressing explosives detection, while Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) may seek to add provisions requiring first-responder radios to be interoperable. (You guessed it, Stabenow also is running for another term.)

Meanwhile, the House finds itself in the familiar position of waiting for the Senate to act on legislation it passed months ago. The House passed its port security measure on May 4. But for either party to campaign on the issue, the two chambers will have to resolve whatever differences they have by the end of this month — a challenging, though not impossible, task.

Port Security Bill Set To Clear Senate (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — When a state-owned Arab company attempted to take over the management of some U.S. port facilities this year, it caused a bipartisan uproar in Congress and set off a wave of initiatives aimed at tightening security on the waterfront.

Most of the proposals have foundered. But now, with both parties jostling for the upper hand on national security ahead of November's midterm elections, a port security bill is headed for approval.

The measure — expected to pass the Senate this week — would, among other things, impose deadlines on background checks for port workers, expand a program to screen for "dirty bombs" and authorize $400 million to help ports bolster anti-terrorism defenses. A good chunk of that money is likely to go to the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex.

Republicans have made port security legislation a priority since February, after Democrats seized on the Bush administration's approval of the takeover of some U.S. facilities by Dubai Ports World to highlight what they contended was the continued vulnerability of ports to attack. In response to the political furor, the Dubai company backed off from taking over the facilities.

The House and Senate also have approved legislation requiring greater scrutiny of foreign investments in the United States. But there may not be enough time left in the current congressional session for the two chambers to reconcile the substantial differences in those bills.

A stack of other proposals that grew directly out of the Dubai controversy also appears doomed for the year, including prohibitions on foreign companies controlling facilities determined to be crucial to national security.

Asked what happened, Chris Koch, president of the World Shipping Council, said: "Some people took some deep breaths and became rational."

The Dubai controversy put the spotlight on the vulnerability of ports, which some say was shortchanged by the focus on protecting airliners from hijackers after Sept. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0061789

Stephen E. Flynn, a retired Coast Guard commander and port security expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, called port security legislation a "good step forward," adding: "We still have a ways to go."

But Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) expressed skepticism that the Republican-controlled Congress would back up the legislation's pledges of tougher security measures with appropriations of money.

Noting that the port security bill that the Senate is considering this week would authorize programs that still would need to be funded, Byrd spokesman Tom Gavin said, "His concern is that this Congress has said, 'Oh, look at what great things we have done' — and then failed to put the money in place" to fund programs.

That measure is part of a package of security-related legislation that GOP leaders, concerned about losing control of the House in November, want to pass before the midterm elections. The port security bill is expected to be amended to include a $1.2-billion rail security measure, as well as language to expand the emergency warning system so that alerts of disasters or terrorist attacks could be sent out on cellphones and BlackBerries.

Democrats are expected to make a renewed push to require screening of every cargo container destined for U.S. ports. But they face long odds because of strong opposition from business groups.

One business group warned in a letter to senators that a "mandate of 100 percent scanning has the potential to do significant damage to the flow of goods and to the U.S. economy."

The bill would set up an experimental program at three not-yet-selected foreign ports to screen every cargo container headed to the United States. Currently, only a fraction are physically inspected, although customs officials check cargo lists and target suspicious containers for a closer look.

"What we have tried to do with this bill is very carefully balance the need for effective, improved security with the need to ensure that we are not crippling our international trading system," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee and a co-author of the port security bill.

Aaron Ellis of the American Assn. of Port Authorities, an industry lobbying and advocacy group, said the bill included a number of components that were "pretty darn good."

"This will be the first time that there has been legislation that actually puts a number of how much should be appropriated for the port security grant program," he said.

The bill would authorize $400 million in port security grants. By the end of this month, the federal Department of Homeland Security will have provided $876 million in port security grants since the Sept. 11 attacks — about 20% of the $4.35 billion in federal aid that ports have sought.

A similar bill has already passed the House. House-Senate negotiators are expected to agree on a final version to send to the president's desk before lawmakers recess this month or early next month.

Safe Ports (WP)

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

THE BRIEF SESSION of Congress that just convened is distinguished in part for what is absent from its agenda -- immigration and lobbying reform, for example. A notable exception, though, is a serious bill that has just emerged from the Senate Commerce, Finance and Homeland Security committees: the Port Security Improvement Act of 2006.

The bill contains several common-sense proposals. It requires the Department of Homeland Security to develop a strategy to rapidly resume trade after an incident at one of the nation's ports, in order to limit economic slowdown. It codifies a number of good programs in law, including the Container Security Initiative, which, if it operates properly, will target suspect cargo for inspection in foreign ports before it gets close to the United States. And it establishes deadlines for Homeland Security to complete critical infrastructure projects -- including installing radiation portal monitors in the nation's 22 biggest ports by the end of next year.

Two things distinguish this moderate legislation from the irresponsible rhetoric on port security that has marred debates on the subject for years. First, it does not call for 100 percent of containers arriving at U.S. ports to be individually inspected for all dangerous materials. The "inspect all containers" mantra is a red herring that exploits Americans' fears about what might slip through in order to score political points, ignoring the fact that there are much more cost- and time-effective ways of keeping dangerous cargo out of the country.

To her credit, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), one of the bill's key sponsors, recognizes that the time and money it would take to inspect all 11 million containers that come into the country every year would be prohibitive with the technology available today, and she has committed to vote against it if such a provision is added. Instead, the bill calls for a pilot program in which the feasibility of individually inspecting all containers leaving three overseas ports will be gauged, which should test promising next-generation technologies without significantly slowing the pace of trade to the United States.

Second, while providing five years of steady funding for port security projects, the bill does not dedicate money for port security in perpetuity. The initial costs of making essential improvements such as buying radiation detectors, putting up fencing around ports and coordinating inspection procedures with ports overseas will require a fair amount of steady start-up cash. But a half-decade of grants for improving port security ought to be enough. After that, port security should have to compete for federal money with other worthy projects.

With those sensible checks in place, the Senate should pass this bill.

Jack Bauer Insurance (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

What would Jack Bauer do? If he worked at the CIA in real life today, the anti-terror hero of Fox's "24" would apparently be buying insurance in case the ACLU or John Kerry decided to sue or subpoena him for protecting America with too much vigor.

The Washington Post reported yesterday that more CIA counterterrorism officers are signing up for private insurance that would pay for civil judgments and legal costs if they are sued or charged with a crime. These are the agents who interrogated Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, Abu Zubaydah and other jihadis, using what President Bush last week called methods that were legal but "tough." Those methods succeeded in breaking these men into divulging information that led to the arrest of other al Qaeda bigs, and to the foiling of plots that could have killed thousands.

"'There are a lot of people who think that subpoenas could be coming' from Congress after the November elections or from federal prosecutors if Democrats capture the White House in 2008," wrote the Post, quoting a retired intelligence officer close to the CIA's Directorate of Operations, which conducted the interrogations. This is not paranoia. We reported yesterday how Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat, is blocking Bush nominees simply for having been mentioned in passing in emails about Guantanamo. Some of us also remember the infamous Frank Church hearings of the 1970s that pilloried the CIA and weakened it for decades.

Though the government pays the premiums for this kind of insurance, it is a sorry spectacle that these agents must now fear partisan retribution for having done precisely what the country asked them to do. The story is one more reason Congress should follow through on Mr. Bush's request to put its stamp of approval on such interrogations, including ex post facto immunity for these CIA officers.

Intelligence is the front line of this anti-jihadi conflict, and the danger from the current political second-guessing is that CIA officers will go back to the FBI's law enforcement mentality of reading terrorists their Miranda rights that failed the country leading up to 9/11. The country needs Jack Bauer insurance, too.

The Aftermath Of Hurricane Katrina (HILL)

By Rep. Neil Abercrombie

The Hill, September 12, 2006

I have witnessed destruction before, some caused by humankind and some by nature. But nothing I've seen prepared me for the scale of devastation in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast of Mississippi. It looked like a neutron bomb had detonated, leaving the shells of dwellings standing in forlorn rows, virtually devoid of human presence.

One year after Hurricane Katrina, the area remains a terrible, twisted portrait of lives and families and whole communities washed away; home by home, block by block, neighborhood by neighborhood. One year after President Bush viewed the destruction from 40-thousand feet as he flew back to Washington from his vacation; one year after he vowed—"We will do what it takes," promises of timely federal assistance to help the people of the region rebuild are as empty as the endless square miles where homes and businesses once stood.

Twenty-five of my congressional colleagues and I spent two full days on a battlefield in the war between the Bush administration and America's middle-class. Make no mistake: post-Katrina is class warfare with a vengeance. Black or white doesn't matter. The Bush administration is an equal opportunity purveyor of indifference.

Infrastructure and Public Services

The City of New Orleans is still struggling to provide basic municipal services. Nearly 60 percent of homes and businesses still have no electricity, heating gas or a dependable supply of potable water. In fact, the lower 9th Ward has been without safe drinking water since Katrina struck. New Orleans neighborhoods had to wait 11 months for mail delivery. Major traffic arteries critical to Louisiana and the nation still suffer from major delays in reconstruction.

Housing

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita created the greatest housing crisis in our nation since the Great Depression— more than 650,000 people displaced. Only 35 percent of New Orleans' housing units are occupied, according to a recent city estimate, and thousands of homes will have to be razed. The Mississippi Gulf Coast has vast landscapes that were once neighborhoods — but the houses have vanished. Driveway after driveway leads to an empty lot. Homeowners have become slab owners.

Rather than providing housing vouchers that quickly and effectively provided emergency shelter in previous disasters, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) threw together a $10 billion housing program that wasted vast sums of money and left thousands of victims without a roof over their heads.

Healthcare

There are shortages of doctors, nurses, and hospital beds, and medical costs are rising to staggering levels. Depression and mental health challenges, as well as physical injuries, are rampant. Yet, in New Orleans Parish, only three of 10 hospitals have re-opened, leaving the most vulnerable— the uninsured—with even fewer options for care.

Small Business And Government Contracting

One year after Hurricane Katrina, 80 percent of the small business owners with approved Katrina loans from the U.S. Small Business Administration are still waiting for the funds. Congressional hearings into FEMA's contracting procedures have found massive fraud, mismanagement and gross incompetence.

Mississippi And Gulf Coast

These same kinds of conditions pervade the Mississippi Gulf Coast, in smaller numbers perhaps, but just as starkly. The refusal of insurance companies to pay claims is now a principal cause of homelessness in the area, and in many cases, insurance company actions are scandalous — even fraudulent.

Conclusion

The federal government's treatment of lower income areas in one of the country's most unique and historic cities, and nearly all the Mississippi Gulf Coast region, are a national disgrace. Yet, beyond the Gulf Coast, there is no outrage.

The Army Corps of Engineers has only begun to raise sinking levees and deal with unfinished hurricane protection and flood prevention projects. But, they're only rebuilding the levees to withstand a Category 3 storm, Katrina's level. Prudent planning and common sense would dictate that they be raised to Category 5 levels.

DHS waited eight months to even begin a review of its response to Hurricane Katrina, and now three months later, it refuses to make the results public.

Congress has been a mute witness, forsaking once again its Constitutional oversight responsibilities. But, one year after the most destructive natural catastrophe to strike the U.S., the "federal response" is still not effective. It is high time the legislative branch got engaged.

FEMA must be restored to independence from the Department of Homeland Security, with a legislative mandate to rebuild now.

Hospital and community clinic construction must begin now. Non-profit health and human service agencies need immediate funding and contractual support.

Legislative action to cut through the insurance standoff over availability and cost in New Orleans, and more particularly, on the Mississippi Gulf Coast, must be taken now. DHS has failed miserably to coordinate hurricane evacuation and emergency communication capacity. A desperate lack of emergency services leaves an already vulnerable and battered city and Gulf Coast even further in harm's way. This must be remedied now.

The Pentagon has just announced a new czar for infrastructure construction in Iraq. The American people should demand that the federal government's post-Katrina priorities reflect an equal and urgent commitment to the infrastructure of the U.S.

WAR NEWS:

Grim Outlook Seen In West Iraq Without More Troops And Aid (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11 — The political and security situation in western Iraq is grim and will continue to deteriorate unless the region receives a major infusion of aid and a division is sent to reinforce the American troops operating there, according to the senior Marine intelligence officer in Iraq.

The assessment, prepared last month by Col. Peter Devlin at the Marine headquarters in Anbar Province, has been sent to senior military officials in Iraq and at the Pentagon.

While the American military is focused on trying to secure Baghdad and prevent the sectarian strife there from escalating into a civil war, the assessment points to the difficulties in Anbar, a vast Sunni-dominated area of western Iraq where the insurgency is particularly strong. The province includes such restive towns as Ramadi, Haditha and Hit.

DOJ_NMG_0061792

Marine commanders have been mounting a campaign to secure the province in the face of a virulent insurgency. But they have had to cope with seriously short-handed Iraqi Army units and a Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad that has tended to view the area as a low priority for government spending and programs.

Elements of the assessment were reported Monday in The Washington Post. Military officials familiar with the document disclosed additional material and provided several quotations from the assessment.

One factor that has hampered the American counterinsurgency effort has been the limited number of American troops. As a general rule, a substantial number of troops are required in a counterinsurgency campaign to protect the population from attacks and intimidation by insurgent groups.

There are about 30,000 marines, soldiers, airmen and sailors in Anbar, a region that borders Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia and is roughly the size of Louisiana.

American forces can generally maneuver where they want and are fighting to regain control of Ramadi, the provincial capital, neighborhood by neighborhood. But there are areas of the province where the Americans have not established a persistent presence, the assessment says.

Without the deployment of an additional division, "there is nothing MNF-W can do to influence the motivation of the Sunni to wage an insurgency," the report states, according to a military officer familiar with it. MNF-W stands for Multinational Force-West, the formal name of the Marine command. A division numbers about 16,000 troops. The limited number of troops, however, is just one problem in countering the insurgency there, the report says. The assessment describes Anbar as a region marked by violence and criminality. Except for a few relatively bright spots, like the towns of Falluja and Qaim, the region generally lacks functional governments and a respect for the rule of law.

Anbar does not have valuable resources like oil. Nor does its Sunni population appear to represent an important constituency for the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad. Although there is economic growth in relatively secure areas, much of it can be attributed to the American-supported reconstruction effort. The level of economic activity in the province is just a fraction of what it was before 2003, the assessment says.

Feeling marginalized in the new Iraq, the Sunnis in Anbar have generally lost faith in the new Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad. The Sunnis' "greatest fears have been realized," the report says.

The Sunnis' suspicion of the government makes the task of forging a political reconciliation more difficult, and has also complicated one policy option that some critics of Bush administration's strategy have proposed as an alternative means of stabilizing Iraq: dividing the country into Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni enclaves. Such a plan would not be welcomed by Sunnis, since they would not trust the central government to share proceeds from oil sales, the assessment says.

As the situation has deteriorated, insurgent attacks have increased. The report describes Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia as an "integral part of the social fabric" of Anbar. The organization, which is predominantly made up of fighters who are native Iraqis, is flush with cash, much of it earned from black market or criminal activity.

As an intelligence assessment, the report is intended to analyze trends, not make policy recommendations. A spokesman for the Marine command declined to comment on the assessment. Many of the points in the analysis were also presented to Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, when he met with senior Marine officers at Camp Falluja in August.

Several elements of the intelligence assessment are consistent with the views of some Marine officers who were interviewed in the field in July. Discussing force levels, Lt. Col. Ronald Gridley, the executive officer with Regimental Combat Team 7, a Marine unit that is charged with securing a large swath of the province, said then that his regiment had recommended that additional troops be allocated to its section of Anbar. Even a battalion or two, he said, would help a great deal.

"What we recommend and what we get is going to be two different things," Colonel Gridley said. "In our perfect world, we could use some more infantrymen to be able to patrol the streets and partner with the Iraqi Army."

Since the intelligence assessment was prepared in August, however, no reinforcements have been sent. To the contrary, the strain on the American troops in Anbar has increased. An American Stryker unit, which was under the overall Marine command, has been sent from Rawa to Baghdad to help with the operation there. Also, military police who had been earmarked for training the Iraq police in Anbar have also been sent to Baghdad. The Marines have sought to make up the shortfall by using existing troops.

The Iraqi Army has deployed two divisions in the region with a combined authorized strength of some 19,000. But the Iraqi military is under strength. The two Iraqi divisions in Anbar together are some 5,000 troops short of that level, while hundreds more are absent without leave. As a result of these developments and the practice of giving monthly leaves, the day-to-day strength of the two divisions is 50 percent for one division and 35 percent for the other.

A separate report, titled "Stabilizing Iraq," issued Monday by the Government Accountability Office, says that, although the solution to securing the country is not entirely military, there is an important relationship between security conditions and efforts to strengthen the economy.

The G.A.O. report noted that attacks against the American-led forces and Iraqi security forces reached an “all-time high during July 2006.”

“Despite coalition efforts and the efforts of the newly formed Iraqi government, insurgents continue to demonstrate the ability to recruit new fighters, supply themselves, and attack coalition and Iraqi security forces,” the G.A.O report added. “The deteriorating conditions threaten the progress of U.S. and international efforts to assist Iraq in the political and economic areas.”

Pentagon Weighing Report On Anbar (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The Pentagon is taking "very seriously" a classified intelligence report concluding that the U.S. military has fought to a stalemate in Iraq's western Anbar province as political conditions also worsen in the "epicenter" of the country's Sunni insurgency, a senior defense official said yesterday.

In congressional testimony on security in Iraq, Pentagon officials also said the rise of "ethno-sectarian violence" has laid the conditions for civil war, aborting plans by U.S. commanders to begin withdrawing U.S. troops. Gaps in the capabilities of Iraqi security forces leave open the prospect that U.S. forces may have to stay in the country for as many as five or more years, they said.

Calling Anbar "a very hot zone on the battlefield," Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Eric S. Edelman said the secret report on the volatile, strategic province was gaining high-level attention at the Pentagon.

"It is an important report. We've taken it very seriously," Edelman told a panel of the House Government Reform Committee. "This is an operational assessment by one very good intel officer," he said, adding that "a lot of us are looking at it very closely" and are seeking a further assessment on Anbar from top U.S. commanders in Iraq.

The report, first outlined publicly in The Washington Post yesterday, said a shortage of U.S. and Iraqi troops in Anbar and the collapse of local governments have left a vacuum that has been exploited by the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq. It painted a bleak picture of security prospects in Anbar, a large province bordering Syria and Jordan that includes the troubled cities of Fallujah and Ramadi.

"Anbar has been the epicenter of the insurgency," Edelman said, adding that "a purely military solution to any insurgency is not possible." He said the report was a "snapshot" that does not represent the entire country.

Edelman prompted an angry retort from Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio) by saying that it would not be "productive" to discuss the classified report on the conflict in Anbar in a public hearing.

"But wouldn't it be of interest to the parents of American soldiers who are being sent to fight, that they would know that a report existed that said that a province was beyond repair and the thing couldn't be won militarily? Wouldn't that be of interest, Mr. Edelman?" Kucinich replied. Edelman explained that he was concerned because "the enemy, you know, is clearly following the discussion."

On overall security in Iraq, lawmakers pressed Edelman and Rear Adm. William D. Sullivan, vice director for strategic plans and policy on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, on why the growth of Iraq's military and police forces has not yet permitted a reduction in the number of U.S. troops, which increased to 140,000 over the summer.

Iraq expects by December to have completed the training and equipping of 325,000 security forces, including 137,000 military personnel and 188,000 police and other Ministry of Interior forces, Sullivan said. And the U.S. military has turned over 53 of its 100 bases in Iraq to the Iraqi government. But he said the emergence of sectarian violence in addition to the Sunni insurgency has led U.S. commanders to decide "that they cannot afford to draw down our own troop levels while the Iraqis are still building up theirs."

Sullivan conceded that in the longer term, because Iraq's military has been trained and outfitted primarily to fight an insurgency, rather than to defend Iraq against foreign attack, U.S. forces could be required as backup for many years.

"Am I wrong in making the assumption that we're going to have American troops there or nearby for a long time . . . in order to defend this nation?" asked Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), chairman of the Government Reform subcommittee on national security.

"It is very much a possibility," Sullivan replied. He said the intent in developing Iraq's military was to create a force "that would have a modicum of its own self-defense capability without being an army that could threaten its neighbors." Iraqi leaders are still trying to "figure out what kind of military ultimately they need," he said.

Edelman said he did not know whether U.S. troops would be withdrawn from Iraq in five or fewer years. Asked whether they would be home in 10 years, he replied: "I certainly hope so."

Sadr Holds Out Against Plan To Divide Iraq (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0061794

By Amit R. Paley And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 11 -- Moqtada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite Muslim cleric, remains adamantly opposed to a controversial plan to partition Iraq into a federation of three largely independent regions, a top Sadr aide said Monday.

"Iraq must not be divided," said Riyadh Nouri, the aide to Sadr, who has opposed the U.S. presence in Iraq.

Sadr's objection to the plan remains steadfast despite a meeting Sunday night in Najaf between Sadr and his intermittent rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the prominent Shiite political party that is leading the push for federalism.

The dispute between two of the most influential Shiite politicians in Iraq highlights the bitter divisions between various parties in the country's fragile ruling coalition. The rift also underscores the divisive nature of the federalism issue, which has pitted Sunni Arabs against some Shiites and Kurds.

The main Sunni bloc in parliament, the Iraqi Accordance Front, boycotted Sunday's legislative session to protest a measure that would create a mechanism for carving Iraq into three autonomous regions. The Sunnis fear the creation of a predominantly Shiite region in the south of Iraq that would resemble the largely independent zone controlled by the Kurds in the north. The Sunnis would be left with swaths of the country devoid of the oil reserves in the other regions.

Sadr's bloc broke with Hakim's party to support the Sunni boycott on Sunday. That move prompted Hakim to meet later in the day with Sadr and then with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, although he declined to describe their conversations.

"We stand to benefit from federalism because the Sadr movement enjoys wide support of the majority of the people in the center and the south," said Nouri, the Sadr aide. "But we will not accept that, because national interest is above any other interest."

The speaker of parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, warned political leaders "not to fish in troubled waters" on the subject of federalism, a principle established in the constitution approved by voters last fall.

"Federated Iraq is a principle that is agreed to in Iraq," he said. "This is not alterable."

The tumult came on another day of bloodshed in Iraq. A man wearing an explosive belt boarded a minibus carrying Iraqi army recruits Monday morning and detonated it when the vehicle reached a recruiting center in western Baghdad, according to Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Abbas of the Interior Ministry. Abbas said 15 people were killed and 18 wounded.

The genocide trial of Saddam Hussein resumed on Monday with the former Iraqi leader calling the tribunal an attempt to pit Arabs against Kurds. Prosecutors accuse Hussein of trying to annihilate the country's Kurdish minority during the Anfal campaign in the 1980s, in which as many as 180,000 people were killed.

"The intention is to create a split in the Iraqi population," a visibly angered Hussein said of the case. "This is a preparation to divide Iraq."

When the judge assured him the country would not be carved up, Hussein responded: "Of course not. Iraq is not 50 years old or 200 years old. It's 9,000 years old, and Iraqis won't be divided."

Katrin Michael, a former peshmerga militia fighter in Kurdistan who now lives in Virginia, testified at the trial about the horror in her village when Iraqi planes dropped chemical weapons.

"I saw hundreds of people with tearing eyes vomiting," she said. "They had pain in their stomach. They were screaming from the pain. People were collapsing because they lost their sight."

She lost her sight for three days. When she opened her eyes, Michael testified, she saw a man named Abu Rizgar who had gone totally blind. He had heavy blisters on his back, and he couldn't speak properly. Later that day, he died.

"His voice is still in my ears," Michael said.

Sarhan reported from Najaf. Special correspondents Naseer Nouri, K.I. Ibrahim and Salih Dehima in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Top Aide To Sadr Outlines Vision Of A U.S.-Free Iraq (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Sudarsan Raghavan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

NAJAF, Iraq -- In a shabby but spotless living room in the holy city of Najaf, a top deputy of Shiite Muslim leader Moqtada al-Sadr quietly sketched out his vision of the Iraq to come, after the Americans withdraw.

First, "there will be a civil war," said the aide, Mustafa Yaqoubi, as his three young children wandered in and out of the room. The rising violence and rivalries under the American occupation make a shaking-out all but inevitable once foreign forces go, Yaqoubi said. "I expect it."

"No matter the number of people who would lose their lives, it is better than now," he added. "It would be better than the Americans staying."

DOJ_NMG_0061795

When the tumult ends, the Sadr aide said, Iraq's Shiite majority will finally be able to claim its due, long resisted by the Americans -- freedom to usher in a Shiite religious government that Yaqoubi said would be moderate and perhaps comparable in some ways to Iran's. The bespectacled, bearded cleric's mild tone buffered his talk of the blood that would have to be spilled to achieve this goal. No matter when the Americans withdraw, "the first year of transition, it will be worse," Yaqoubi warned. "After that, it will gradually improve."

Yaqoubi speaks as one of two or three longtime intimates of Sadr, the young heir of a revered Shiite clerical family. Sadr's rough-edged, strongly anti-American street movement of poor, largely uneducated Shiites has burgeoned into one of the strongest political and armed forces in Iraq.

When Sadr's father, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, was shot to death with two of his sons in 1999, in an assassination blamed on Saddam Hussein, Yaqoubi helped Moqtada al-Sadr, then only 25, keep the family's mosque-based network alive, despite unrelenting pressure from Hussein's intelligence services.

Yaqoubi's arrest by U.S.-led coalition troops, on charges in the brutal stabbing death of a Sadr rival, ignited full-scale street battles between Sadr followers and U.S. forces in April 2004.

Freed in August 2005 after 16 months in prison, Yaqoubi helped preside over a remarkable political transformation that culminated with elections last year that put Sadr in charge of the largest individual bloc in parliament.

While Sadr and his aides, including Yaqoubi, stayed in Iraq throughout the darkest years of Hussein's rule, others among Iraq's current leaders went into exile in London, Tehran or Detroit, returning here only after Hussein's overthrow. Leaders of the other main Shiite religious parties were quick to make accommodation with the U.S.-led occupying forces. Overnight, many of them adopted a life of secondhand splendor in the former palaces and villas of Hussein's regime.

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, for example, who leads the Shiite religious party that most nearly matches Sadr's movement in strength, moved into the marbled villa of former Hussein foreign minister Tariq Aziz, who is now in U.S. military custody. Sadr and his aides, in contrast, make their homes in the Shiite neighborhoods of the capital and the Shiite holy cities of the south. Sadr lives in a gleaming, whitewashed concrete mansion behind high walls in Najaf. His top aides there have more modest houses, less freshly painted.

Yaqoubi is considered an intellectual, in the vanguard of Sadr's Shiite movement. In an interview over the course of an afternoon, he outlined his views of an organization that is scarcely known to Americans. His children occasionally came in to interrupt, putting a hand on his knee to whisper a message from the women out of sight in the back of the house.

Despite their ascendancy now, Yaqoubi said, Iraq's Shiites owe no gratitude to the Americans. "The Americans are not saving us from Saddam for the sake of the Iraqi people," he said. "They gave Saddam clearance in the 1990s to strike at the Shia people. It was in their own interest to get rid of Saddam."

According to Yaqoubi, the Americans brought the armed resistance on themselves by staying after the invasion and by ignoring Iraqi protests. For example, he said, tens of thousands rallied this summer in Baghdad's Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City to protest the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, but the Americans ignored them. "It was the largest rally in the world. But with them, it's useless," he said, referring to U.S. officials. "No one ever reacts, no one responds to these protests."

Ordinary Americans, on some level, must understand the resistance to the foreign forces, he said.

"We believe the American people are not coming from Mars. They see on their televisions how it is here," Yaqoubi said. "They have the same mentality we have. We believe that if the Americans were occupied by another country they would do the same as we are, or even more."

Yaqoubi said the U.S. failure to meet even the simplest security needs of Iraq was to blame for much of the current instability. As a result, he said, "when the Americans pull out, there will be a civil war. They are using that now, as an excuse for staying."

The Sadr deputy spoke confidently and simply of which faction would emerge the winner. "I don't want to use this expression, but you have an expression," he said. " 'Survival of the fittest; the strongest survive'?"

He added, "If there may be other forces to use their strengths, I don't think they have the capability to match us."

Sadr's armed followers are often accused of enforcing strict Islamic codes; commanders of his militia, known as the Mahdi Army, have acknowledged beating up alcohol vendors.

How would a Sadr government look, should the cleric come to full power? "Our main goal, by our nature, we are Islamists," Yaqoubi said. "Our only desire is to obey God. We want the heavenly laws to be applied, in a normal way."

Yaqoubi described a gentler version of Shiite Islamic government. He insisted that Iraq would not model itself on Shiite Persian Iran next door. But he spoke approvingly of Iran in hinting how Iraq might look, saying, "There is freedom of journalism, women can drive, can go without veils."

Many Western analysts say Iran's religious government and its people have learned to coexist. Newspaper editors now tend to self-censor, and women, while often allowing a generous display of hair to show, still wear head coverings.

DOJ_NMG_0061796

Asked if Iraq might adopt the same de facto tolerance as Iran, Yaqoubi replied, "Possibly."

Yaqoubi suggested that statistics support his vision for Iraq. Shiites make up at least 60 percent of Iraq's people, he said, and millions of them follow century-old traditions of fealty to the instructions of their religious leaders.

"The Americans wanted elections and wanted democracy," the Sadr aide said. "This is what they wanted."

Iraqi Militias Seen As Spinning Out Of Control (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — As U.S. and Iraqi officials seek a way to disarm Shiite militias involved in the sectarian violence driving Iraq toward civil war, the paramilitary forces are splintering into more extreme groups that militia leaders say they are powerless to control.

U.S. officials had hoped that an ongoing military sweep in the capital would curtail the Sunni Arab insurgency and convince the Shiite Muslim militias — armed partisan brigades that guard neighborhoods, mosques and political offices — that they could leave security to the Iraqi government.

"I think when the people begin to feel more confidence in their security forces, they'll feel less need to rely on the militias," Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said during a recent news conference.

But a series of devastating paramilitary strikes against Shiite neighborhoods has eroded early gains attributed to the security sweep and severely undermined U.S. arguments for disarming militias.

Recent violent clashes pitting Shiite paramilitary fighters against Iraqi and U.S. troops, and against rival Shiite forces, also have cast doubts on militia leaders' ability to rein in their fighters even if they choose to do so.

U.S. forces have been drawn into confrontations with militiamen in recent weeks. Late last month, U.S. warplanes dropped a 500-pound bomb on militia members battling Iraqi troops in the southern city of Diwaniya, further complicating efforts to negotiate with the groups.

Militia representatives say fighters often act without consulting their commanders, and in some cases flout orders to stand down. Such disobedience was evident shortly after the Feb. 22 bombing of a revered Shiite mosque in Samarra allegedly orchestrated by Al Qaeda in Iraq. Despite public calls for calm by the national leaders of the two Shiite militias, reprisal attacks in the following weeks left dozens of Sunni mosques smoldering and hundreds of Sunni Arabs dead.

"Let us be honest and transparent: Some of these fighters are acting without orders and rebelling. We are not responsible for their acts," said Sheik Razzaq Naddawi, a representative for anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, founder of the Al Mahdi militia.

"The real Sadr followers are loyal; they listen to their leaders," said Amir Husseini, another prominent Sadr follower. "But this is a fast-growing movement, and some who have joined the Sadr movement recently are not controlled."

Though U.S. officials say that Sadr representatives have occasionally exaggerated the degree of their fighters' independence to provide political cover for the organization, most senior military officials interviewed agreed that Sadr's control over his fighters had waned over the last year.

The cleric "has a measure of control, but when you get down to the bottom of that stack, I don't think he has ultimate control of every entity that operates under his name," a military official in Baghdad said.

An Al Mahdi commander, who requested anonymity because he was not allowed to speak to the media, said that in Najaf, a Sadr stronghold, the cleric had attempted to take a stronger hand by dismissing or demoting several militia brigade leaders in recent weeks.

"Even when Sadr fires the brigade commanders, their soldiers follow them and not Sadr," the commander said. "Now Sadr fires commanders every month, so their fighters will not become too loyal to them. This is the same thing that Saddam [Hussein] did with his army."

U.S. commanders say they are more concerned about Sadr's Al Mahdi army than the Badr Brigade, another leading Shiite militia.

Badr Brigade commanders acknowledge that renegade squads have occasionally taken up arms in violation of orders. But U.S. officials believe that the militia, whose members include veterans of Hussein's armed forces and a decades-long resistance movement against the former regime, has retained a strong command-and-control structure.

U.S. officials are concerned, however, about Badr's strong presence in Iraq's police forces, where militiamen have been accused of operating anti-Sunni death squads.

Sadr's militia rose from Iraq's impoverished grass roots after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion and includes many fighters who have never served in the military or received any formal education. And unlike Badr members, the cleric's followers have engaged in frequent attacks on U.S. and British troops and strongly oppose the U.S. military presence in Iraq.

Confronting either of the militias is a tricky proposition for the U.S. military because the groups are part of the Shiite-dominated government that the Bush administration helped install. Both militias are affiliated with parties in the leading Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance.

The Badr militia is the military wing of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which holds 30 seats in parliament and several Cabinet positions.

Sadr's political movement has an equal number of seats and controls the Health and Transportation ministries. Any broad assault on the militias would undermine the already-shaky political support for the U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

The situation has led Maliki to insist on advance notice from U.S. commanders before American forces venture into militia-controlled areas and to argue for a more negotiated approach to disarming paramilitary groups.

"Our fear is that the Americans will treat Al Mahdi army and other militias the same way that they treat the Saddamists and the terrorists," Maliki spokesman Ridha Taqi said. "We don't want to solve this problem with military force."

U.S. forces have refrained from major strikes on Shiite strongholds such as the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City, a base for militia-affiliated death squads and kidnapping gangs, and have instead used smaller special forces units to target specific paramilitary cells.

U.S. military officials have been circumspect in their descriptions of militiamen, using vague euphemisms such as "illegal armed groups" and "guys with guns" to avoid identifying the politically backed paramilitary forces by name.

In recent public statements, military officials have also taken pains to redefine terms such as militias and death squads, which usually refer to Shiite groups, to include Sunni insurgent groups. And although American commanders said their forces had rounded up dozens of death squads during the Baghdad sweep, they have avoided descriptions of their sectarian or militia affiliations.

Despite daily discoveries of suspected victims of Shiite-affiliated death squads throughout Baghdad, U.S. commanders say they have found no links between captured death squad members and the Iraqi government.

"I'm happy to report to you that we have been capturing these bad guys tied directly to extrajudicial killings, and to my knowledge so far none of them have been tied to the Ministry of Interior," said Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, the commander of the U.S. police training mission in Iraq.

Privately, U.S. commanders say they are tempering their public statements in an attempt to deal with Shiite militias politically and are urging Iraqi legislators to draft laws that will force paramilitary fighters to disarm.

A proposal introduced by Abdelaziz Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, calls for the formation of "popular committees" to handle security in Iraq's neighborhoods.

Hadi Amri, a commander of the Badr militia, said the committees would be assigned to their residential areas to respond to emergencies, provide security and gather intelligence on local threats.

Local volunteers, Amri said, "would be in each street and each house."

Proponents of the plan say that such localized security forces have worked in the Kurdish region in northern Iraq, the Shiite south and in Baghdad neighborhoods controlled by Al Mahdi fighters, where militia members force residents to register their names and submit to close monitoring. Casey said he would support popular committees as long as they were unarmed.

But there is wide disagreement about whether such forces would simply add another uncontrollable element to the nation's chaotic patchwork of gangsters, revenge squads and insurgents.

A Baghdad University professor, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of retribution by the militias, said Hakim's proposal amounted to semantics.

"It is an attempt to find another name for militias," the professor said. "I do not think the people want popular committees or militias — they want an independent government which respects the law and applies it in a strong and just way."

Iraqi Elections Believed To Have Worsened Divisions, Report Says (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Iraq's political process has sharpened the country's sectarian divisions, polarized relations between its ethnic and religious groups, and weakened its sense of national identity, the Government Accountability Office said Monday.

In spite of a sharp increase in Sunni-Shiite violence, however, attacks on U.S.-led coalition forces are still the primary source of bloodshed in Iraq, the report found. It was the latest in a series of recent grim assessments of conditions in Iraq.

But the report was unusual in its sweep, relying on a series of other government studies, some of them previously unpublicized, to touch on issues from violence and politics to electricity production. Published on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the GAO report was downbeat in its conclusions - underscoring how Iraq's deteriorating security situation threatens the Bush administration's goal of a stable and democratic regime in Baghdad.

"Despite coalition efforts and the efforts of the newly formed Iraqi government, insurgents continue to demonstrate the ability to recruit new fighters, supply themselves, and attack coalition security forces," the report says. "The deteriorating conditions threaten continued progress in U.S. and other international efforts to assist Iraq in the political and economic areas."

The report relied on a number of findings made earlier this year by the United Nations, the U.S. State and Defense departments, U.S. intelligence agencies and other sources to reach its conclusions. Unlike the majority of those agencies, the GAO, which reports to Congress, has no responsibility for forming or executing policy in Iraq.

The GAO said Congress must ask several questions as it considers what to do next. Among them:

-What political, economic and security conditions must be achieved before the United States can draw down and withdraw military forces from Iraq?

-Why have security conditions continued to worsen even as Iraq has met political milestones, increased the number of trained and equipped forces, and increasingly assumed the lead for security?

-If existing U.S. political, economic, and security measures are not reducing violence in Iraq, what additional measures, if any, will the administration propose for stemming the violence?

The report, citing the Pentagon, said that enemy attacks against coalition and Iraqi forces increased by 23 percent from 2004 to 2005 and that the number of attacks from January to July 2006 were 57 percent higher than during the same period in 2005.

A graph showed that the number of attacks rose from around 100 in May 2003 to roughly 4,500 in July 2006. More than half of those were against coalition troops; the rest appear to have been split almost evenly between attacks on Iraqi security forces and attacks on civilians.

The report said that electricity production remains inadequate, with Baghdad residents receiving less than six hours of power a day, on average. Residents outside Baghdad received electricity less than 11 hours a day, on average.

Though the Bush administration has hailed each political milestone in Iraq as another step on the march to freedom, the report cited a Defense Intelligence Agency finding that "the December 2005 elections appeared to heighten sectarian tensions and polarize sectarian divides."

That finding was echoed, the GAO said, in a March 2006 report from the government-funded U.S. Institute for Peace. That report said that the political process had sharpened ethnic and sectarian identities "while nationalism and a sense of Iraqi identity have weakened."

Further, a report by the office of Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte concluded in February 2006 that Iraqi security forces "are experiencing difficulty in managing ethnic and sectarian divisions," the GAO said. The intelligence director's report said many Iraqi troops remain loyal to sectarian and political interests, the GAO said.

Reinforce Baghdad (WP)

By William Kristol And Rich Lowry

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

We are at a crucial moment in Iraq. Supporters of the war, like us, have in the past differed over tactics. But at this urgent pass, there can be no doubt that we need to stop the downward slide in Iraq by securing Baghdad.

There is no mystery as to what can make the crucial difference in the battle of Baghdad: American troops. A few thousand U.S. troops have already been transferred to Baghdad from elsewhere in Iraq. Where more U.S. troops have been deployed, the situation has gotten better. Those neighborhoods intensively patrolled by Americans are safer and more secure. But it is by no means clear that overall troop numbers in Baghdad are enough to do the job. And it is clear that stripping troops from other fronts risks progress elsewhere in the country.

The bottom line is this: More U.S. troops in Iraq would improve our chances of winning a decisive battle at a decisive moment. This means the ability to succeed in Iraq is, to some significant degree, within our control. The president should therefore order a substantial surge in overall troop levels in Iraq, with the additional forces focused on securing Baghdad.

There is now no good argument for not sending more troops. The administration often says that it doesn't want to foster Iraqi dependency. This is a legitimate concern, but it is a second-order and long-term one. Iraq is a young democracy and a weak state facing a vicious insurgency and sectarian violence. The Iraqis are going to be dependent on us for some time. We can worry about weaning Iraq from reliance on our forces after the security crisis in Baghdad has passed.

The administration emphasizes that there needs to be a political, not simply a military, solution to Iraq. This is of course true. But the violence intersects with politics. Violence is radicalizing. It serves to empower extremists who are aligned with our enemies. So long as we don't succeed in controlling the violence, it will make any political settlement far more difficult.

Indeed, the violence perpetrated by the Shiite militias is directly related to politics. It is part of a power play by the likes of Moqtada al-Sadr to marginalize moderate figures such as Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani. Sistani's recent statement of disgust with Iraqi politics suggests that Sadr's gambit may be working. Sending more American troops at this juncture would not be a simple-minded and clumsy substitution of military force for political finesse. It would be an attempt to influence Iraq's political situation in our favor.

The administration's military strategy has long been based on getting the Iraqis to do the "holding" in the counterinsurgency strategy of "clear, hold and build." That would obviously be ideal. But the experience of the past three years is that the Iraqis aren't yet up to it, at least not in hotly contested areas such as Baghdad. The administration deserves credit for the strides it has made in training the Iraqi army. But for now we have to do much of the holding ourselves for it to be effective. That simply requires more manpower.

If American troops hand neighborhoods over to Iraqis, they are likely to soon deteriorate again -- in the same dynamic we have repeatedly seen of trouble spots being brought under control by American troops only to slide back again when the Americans leave.

One reason to prefer having Iraqis hold secured areas is that indigenous forces, in theory, don't risk creating the kind of nationalist reaction that can be prompted by a foreign occupying army -- i.e., us. But in the current environment of sectarian bloodletting, all signs are that American troops are more trusted and more welcome than Iraqis. Many Sunnis -- confronted by Shiite militias -- now accept our troop presence, and moderate Shiite leaders want us to stay. In fact, the chief fear of Iraqis in Baghdad neighborhoods patrolled by Americans is apparently that we will leave, not that we will remain.

Harvard Law School's William Stuntz recently made the core point powerfully: "The territory over which we fight is among the most strategically important in the world. Victory will place the most dangerous regime on the planet, Iran's fascist theocracy, in serious peril. Defeat will leave that same regime inestimably strengthened. If there is any significant possibility that the presence of more American soldiers on the ground would raise the odds of success, not putting those soldiers on the ground is a crime."

Administration spokesmen have jettisoned talk of "staying the course" in Iraq in favor of "adapting to win." If those words are to have meaning, the administration can't simply stay the course on current troop levels. We need to adapt to win the battle of Baghdad. We need substantially more troops in Iraq. Sending them would be a courageous act of presidential leadership appropriate to the crisis we face.

Even Dating Is Perilous In Polarized Baghdad (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

BAGHDAD -- He was a dashing young computer engineer. She was a shy student at his alma mater. They fell in love over lunch last year in the university cafeteria and promptly became engaged.

As they prepared for a future together, the couple barely discussed a subject that, under Saddam Hussein's rule, amounted to a footnote in matters of the heart: He was a Shiite Muslim; she was a Sunni Kurd.

But now those labels are tearing the couple apart. Barred by their families from marrying anyone of the opposite sect, the couple has erased one another's cellphone numbers and stopped speaking.

"There is no hope in this country anymore for Sunnis and Shiites to fall in love," said Husham al-Gizzy, a 25-year-old engineer, as he buried his face in his hands and recounted the story.

For decades, marriages between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq were as ordinary as the daily call to prayer. But the sectarian warfare gripping the country has created a powerful barrier to Sunni-Shiite romances.

Married couples have filed for divorce rather than face the scorn of their neighbors. Fiances have split up as a result of death threats. And, increasingly, young single Iraqis have concluded that it is simply easier to stick to their own kind when it comes to love and family.

In a country where intermarriage was long considered the glue that held a fragile multi-ethnic society together, the romantic segregation of Sunnis and Shiites is more than just a reflection of the ever more hate-filled chasm between the two groups. It is also a grim foreboding of the future.

"Everyone is just taking sides to prepare for a big civil war," said Adnan Abdul Kareem Enad, manager of Sot al-Jamayaa, a radio station that has aired tales of star-crossed Sunni and Shiite lovers. "You can see the polarization of Iraq in the tensions between Sunnis and Shiites in marriage and dating."

The new taboo on Sunni-Shiite romances is only one of many impediments to love in this war-ravaged country. Religious authorities have forbidden casual dating. Women fearful of the bloodshed have become prisoners in their own homes. Couples have shunned posh restaurants once filled with lovebirds because they fear suicide bombers or kidnappers.

"This is the age of cellphone love," said Omar al-Azzawi, 33, an Internet cafe owner who has a Sunni father and a Shiite mother. "If I marry someone, we'll have to get married on the phone. We'll probably have to make love on the phone, too."

Still, the burgeoning obstacles to Sunni-Shiite romances remain among the most ominous signs of the rapidly deteriorating relationship between the two sects. Although underlying tensions always simmered between Hussein's Sunni government and the country's oppressed Shiite minority, few expected them to flare so violently and so quickly after his government collapsed.

For Hameed Ayad, a 24-year-old Sunni, the disintegration of his engagement to a Shiite classmate came swiftly after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. His betrothed shocked him by expressing newfound pride in once-suppressed Shiite customs such as public self-flagellation and pilgrimages to the holy cities of Karbala and Najaf.

Ayad accused his fiancee of fanaticism and broke off the relationship. But to hear him describe Shiite Islam as a "backward" religion suggests that he, too, has sided with his own.

"Even if she were the last woman on Earth, I wouldn't marry a Shiite," Ayad, a recent graduate in business administration from al-Turath University, said as he picked at a breakfast of scrambled eggs and cucumbers. "You could even put her in a frame of gold, but if I will break this gold, I would find mud inside of her."

Like many young Iraqi men, Ayad is so busy just trying to stay alive that he has given little thought to dating over the past three years. "I cannot guarantee my own life," he said. "How can I get married and be responsible for others?"

So when will it be safe enough in Iraq for him to get married?

"When the rooster will lay eggs," he replied, stone-faced.

For young Iraqi women, the isolation is often more extreme. The relentless carnage in the city so petrified Areej Abbas, 25, that she did not leave her home a single time for more than three years. She had no cellphone. No friends. No guests. All day she watched television.

"I was miserable," she said in a Sot al-Jamayaa studio, where she started working as a science show host this month in her first venture out of the house. "I probably would have committed suicide if it weren't for the satellite television."

Universities remain perhaps the safest place for a romantic rendezvous, though religious Shiites have begun to infiltrate campuses such as Baghdad University, posting signs warning about the evils of dating and promiscuity. Still, high school students now say the primary reason they want to attend university is to meet members of the opposite sex, according to a recent survey by Sot al-Jamayaa.

"It's becoming impossible to meet girls outside of the college," said Enad, the Sot al-Jamayaa manager. "Even older men now are desperate to go back to school if they are single."

But even if soul mates find each other on a university campus, sectarian differences can quickly split them apart. Many young people say it is primarily parents who are driving a wedge between members of mixed couples.

Samar Hussein, now a 27-year-old Shiite civil servant, said her parents initially rejoiced when a Sunni classmate asked for her hand in marriage four years ago. Her older brother and aunt had both married Sunnis, and the family cared little about religious affiliation.

But Hussein's family now worries about the practical considerations of intermarriage. Vast swaths of Baghdad have become no-go zones to members of certain sects. Those who do venture there face abduction or death.

"If a Shiite gets married to a Sunni guy, how will her mother be able to go and visit her?" Hussein asked. "And when the country is divided into Sunni and Shiite areas, there will be a difficult question: Will the women choose to go with their husbands or stay with their families? And the kids? Who is going to take care of them?"

She paused. "It will be a great tragedy," she said.

Hussein's parents forbid her to see the Sunni man, but she continues to trade covert I-love-you's with him on the phone. She will not break a tradition that requires parental approval for marriage, but she hopes their families might one day change. "We will leave it up to God," she said. "Maybe He will plant love between our families and show them the right way."

Many couples -- particularly well-educated, secular city-dwellers -- continue to intermarry. But even when the lovers and their parents consent to the marriage, mixed relationships are often fraught with danger.

Qais Jassim, 26, a Shiite from the Adhamiyah section of Baghdad, spent his wedding night petrified that his Sunni wife's relatives would abduct and behead him. After three months of one-on-one meetings with the woman's father, Jassim had finally persuaded her parents to support their marriage. But her cousins disagreed.

DOJ_NMG_0061801

"Leave her alone or we'll kill you," the cousins screamed at him, Jassim recalled.

Such disputes, however, arise only after lonely Iraqi souls manage to find a potential mate, an increasingly daunting proposition in a country with curfews, limited mobility and the constant threat of death squads. Some teenage boys have taken to dialing random numbers in hopes that a girl will answer. Other young Iraqis have tried to connect via ubiquitous Internet chat rooms.

In cyberspace, like almost everywhere in Iraq these days, one of the first questions is often: Are you Sunni or Shiite? Give the wrong answer, and the conversation is over. Manal Hussein, a 34-year-old biology student at Baghdad University, recalled someone in a chat room inquiring about her sect.

"When I told him I was Sunni, he said, 'Okay, bye-bye,' " she recalled.

Each thwarted Sunni-Shiite relationship etches the gulf between the two groups a little deeper and foils another opportunity to produce the next generation of children with mixed backgrounds -- those living testaments to the not-so-distant peace between the sects.

Ayad, the 24-year-old Sunni who said he would never marry a Shiite, fears that Iraq has already begun a free fall into carnage.

He shook his head and pointed at a dirty white ashtray filled with five crumbled cigarette butts. "The future of Iraq will be like this," he said.

Saddam Accuses Kurds Of Sowing Hatred (AP)

By Qais Al-bashir

AP, September 12, 2006

A defiant Saddam Hussein accused Kurdish witnesses at his genocide trial Monday of trying to divide Iraqis by alleging chemical attacks and mass arrests during a crackdown that the prosecution says killed up to 180,000 people.

Three Kurdish witnesses told of brutal repression during Operation Anfal, the 1987-88 campaign against a Kurdish revolt in the final stages of Iraq's war with Iran. Saddam accused the Kurds of helping Iran in the war.

One of the witnesses, a Kurdish-American, said she saw people sickened and dying during a chemical attack and demanded compensation from foreign companies that supplied Saddam with chemicals, supposedly for agriculture.

"All the witnesses said in the courtroom that they were oppressed because they were Kurds," Saddam shouted after hearing the testimony. "They're trying to create strife between the people of Iraq. They're trying to create division between Kurds and Arabs and this is what I want the people of Iraq to know."

The deposed president said the Iraqi people "should not suffer from the guilt that they killed Kurds" and insisted that he treated loyal Iraqi Kurds fairly. Only those who joined the Kurdish insurgency were punished, he said.

Since the trial opened Aug. 21, witnesses have offered grim testimony of entire families dying in chemical weapons attacks. They said survivors plunged their faces into milk to try to end the pain from the blinding gas or fled into the hills on mules as military helicopters fired on them.

Saddam is among seven defendants charged with genocide or other offenses during Operation Anfal. If convicted, they could face death by hanging.

The trial resumed Monday after a nearly three-week break.

Katreen Elias Mikhail, a Kurdish Christian and former militia fighter, testified that four Iraqi planes unleashed a wave of bombs on the evening of June 5, 1987, on the Kurdish town of Qalizewa in northern Iraq.

"I smelled something dirty and strange," she told the court. "People were falling to the ground. They vomited and their eyes were blinded. We couldn't see anything."

"We were all afraid," she said, her voice cracking. "It was our first time seeing bombs falling on our heads."

Mikhail said she had come to court to lodge a personal complaint against Saddam, his cousin and co-defendant Ali "Chemical Ali" al-Majid as well as all those who provided the regime with chemicals used in the attacks.

"I demand compensation," she said.

Witness Ahmed Abdul-Rahman told the court he was rounded up from a village near Sulaimaniyah and imprisoned for four months "where they investigated us, they tortured us and they beat us."

A third witness, Sardar Ali Salih, said Saddam's Republican Guards raided his village in 1987, arresting Kurdish men and seizing sheep, the residents' livelihood.

"While in prison, they beat and tortured us. I stayed there for three months," Salih said. "There were 126 detainees with me. They took 58 and put us in another room. They told us that we would be released, that Saddam ordered our release." The others disappeared, including two of his brothers.

DOJ_NMG_0061802

Saddam is still awaiting a verdict on Oct. 16 in the first case against him — the nine-month-long trial over the killings of 148 Shiites in Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt against him there. In that case as well, he and seven other co-defendants could face the death penalty.

The Anfal trial, which began in August, is also likely to take months.

The Bush administration had argued that the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq was needed to unseat Saddam because he possessed weapons of mass destruction and had ties to al-Qaida.

As recently as Aug. 21, President Bush said people should "imagine a world in which you had Saddam Hussein" with the capacity to make weapons of mass destruction and "who had relations with al-Zarqawi," referring to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq who was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June.

However, a recent U.S. Senate committee report found no link between Saddam and the terror network, and Saddam's alleged possession of weapons of mass destruction was debunked after the invasion, when none could be found.

Yet the Anfal case points to his alleged use of poison gas against Iraqi citizens, a charge often leveled by Washington.

Kurdish survivors say many villages were razed and countless young men disappeared.

They also accuse the army of using prohibited mustard gas and nerve agents. The current trial does not deal with the most notorious gassing — the March 1988 attack on Halabja that killed an estimated 5,000 Kurds. That incident will be part of a separate investigation.

Saddam Says Genocide Trial 'Dividing Iraq' (AFP)

By Jay Deshmukh

AFP, September 12, 2006

Ousted dictator Saddam Hussein has charged that his genocide trial was "dividing Iraq" as Kurdish witnesses told of the horror of gas attacks unleashed against them during the brutal Anfal campaign of 1987-88.

"The whole beginning (of witness testimonies) is aimed at creating a split within Iraq between the Kurds and Arabs," Saddam said in a tirade from the dock as the trial resumed after a three-week recess.

Saddam and six co-defendants including his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid, dubbed "Chemical Ali", face charges including genocide over Anfal which prosecutors say was a systematic campaign of slaughter that killed 182,000 Kurds.

"I want to give a message to the Iraqi people that they should not suffer from this guilt that they killed Kurds. This is shameful," he said.

Saddam, who is also awaiting a verdict in a trial over the killing of Shiite villagers after an attempt on his life in 1982, is charged with genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity over the Anfal campaign.

If found guilty, he faces execution by hanging.

But Saddam, showing flashes of anger, claimed he had on several occasions acted on behalf of the Kurdish minority in Iraq.

"After the Iran-Iraq war ... I made a statement on TV and radio giving orders that no Iraqi security force should arrest Kurds, and if anyone has problems with Kurds, they should complain to Saddam Hussein."

The former dictator also said it was he who agreed autonomy for the Kurds in northern Iraq in 1970, when he was vice president.

"If the Arabs were racist and discriminatory, why would they accept an autonomy for the Kurds," he said, vowing however that "Iraqis will not split".

Saddam's outburst came after three more witnesses testified against him and six co-defendants accused of gassing Kurds and bombing their villages to quell an insurgency that coincided with the last years of the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war.

Katherine Elias Mikhail, once a peshmerga Kurdish guerrilla, described how she was present when first her unit and then a year later her village were gassed by Saddam's air force.

"I saw hundreds of people -- not dozens but hundreds -- and they were vomiting and teary-eyed," she said describing a 1987 attack on a peshmerga base. "People with me collapsed because they had lost their sight."

In late 1988, the planes struck her village.

"We had been frequently attacked by aircraft, but this time the sound of the explosions was not as loud as before and after the explosion there was white smoke," said the woman who now works as a writer in the United States.

Most prominent among his co-accused is Ali Hassan al-Majid, dubbed "Chemical Ali" over his alleged role in gas attacks who said Monday that some villages were burnt because "those who stayed in those villages were servants of peshmergas and Iranians."

DOJ_NMG_0061803

Mikhail, who has long since shed her guerrilla fatigues for a business suit, said she lost most of her family to the old regime and her complaint was against Saddam and Chemical Ali and "the international companies who supplied the Iraqi regimes with these weapons".

She was followed on the witness stand by two more Kurds, including Ahmed Abdel Rahman, a farmer who described how troops came through his village in 1987, set fire to his village and drove off their cattle.

"We followed after them and begged them to return our cattle, and they told us that the Iraqi government had ordered them to kill us and loot our livestock," he said, going on to describe his subsequent imprisonment.

The trial resumed on the same day the United States marked the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks on New York and Washington that left close to 3,000 people dead.

On Friday a US Senate report concluded that Saddam had no links with Al-Qaeda prior to the September 11 attacks as US President George W. Bush's administration had repeatedly charged.

Since the genocide trial began on August 21, nine witnesses have given graphic testimony about how their villages had been gassed, their fields destroyed and their families exterminated in brutal death camps run by Saddam's forces.

Monday's session began with a Tunisian lawyer for Saddam quitting the defense team after the judge said foreigners could only work as legal advisors and not attorneys.

The trial has been adjourned to Tuesday.

Hussein Trial Resumes; Sectarian Attacks Continue In Streets (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Tuesday, Sept. 12 — The trial of Saddam Hussein on charges of genocide against Iraq's Kurds resumed Monday, after a nearly three-week hiatus, while sectarian violence continued on Baghdad's streets, including the suicide bombing of a crowded downtown bus that killed more than a dozen people.

At a meeting of Parliament inside the fortified Green Zone, meanwhile, an effort by a group of Shiite lawmakers to promote legislation that would allow Iraq to be partitioned into autonomous regions appeared to lose some momentum on Monday after a rival Shiite bloc dissented.

Also Monday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said in a statement that he planned to make his first state visit to Iran on Tuesday, to discuss security and political issues.

In the trial, Mr. Hussein and six other former officials in his government face charges that they killed more than 50,000 Kurdish Iraqis, during a campaign in northern Iraq in 1988 in which the government used conventional and chemical weapons against civilians. Mr. Hussein also faces the charge of genocide.

He and his co-defendants maintain that the campaign was military in nature, to support Iraqi troops who were trying to suppress Kurdish militias backed by Iran.

On Monday, three Kurdish witnesses described attacks in 1987 and 1988 in which chemical gas attacks in Iraq's mountainous northeast region by Iraqi troops left villagers blinded and desperately ill.

Katrin Michael, 56, a Kurdish woman who said she now lived in Virginia, said she and several other villagers saw Iraqi military planes drop bombs that issued white smoke that smelled of garlic. Villages who did not die from the chemicals developed large blisters, she said.

A second witness, Ahmed Abdel Rahman Ahmed, described Iraqi troops razing his village in September 1987. "They evacuated the village and burned the houses," he told the court, adding that they also stole farm animals, including 100 of his sheep and goats.

Defense lawyers characterized those raids as a necessary reaction to the Kurdish villagers' refusal to leave their homes after being ordered to relocate to a new, restricted area by the Hussein government.

As has become his custom, Mr. Hussein spent part of his day lecturing the chief judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, about what he characterizes as the illegitimacy of the charges against him. At one point, Mr. Hussein accused the Kurdish witnesses of trying to exacerbate the ethnic divisions between them and the country's Arab majority.

"The whole point is to make a split between the Arabs and the Kurds," Mr. Hussein huffed, before being told to be quiet.

In Parliament on Monday, lawmakers aligned with the political movement led by the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr came out against efforts to enact legislation that would allow Iraq to be divided into autonomous regions, with Shiites and Kurds controlling the oil-rich south and north. Sunni Arabs, who would be left holding the barren western and central regions, are vehemently opposed to the legislation.

Baha al-Araji, a Shiite member of Parliament from Mr. Sadr's political movement, which controls about 30 seats in Parliament, said the movement would not support the bill or its reading next week.

DOJ_NMG_0061804

"We believe that this draft does not serve the interest of Iraq now," he said in an interview on Monday afternoon.

"It is better to discuss it after the withdrawal of the occupation," he added, referring to the 138,000 American troops in Iraq. "Discussing this subject will increase disharmony with our Sunni brothers, so we should have more time so that Iraqi people can understand the real meaning of federalism."

But other Shiite members of Parliament, mostly from the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful party with close ties to Iran, said they would press a reading of the bill next week regardless of whether other Shiite political parties supported it.

"We will go with them or without them," said Khalid al-Atiya, the Shiite deputy speaker of Parliament, in an interview on Monday evening.

Violence continued in Baghdad and nearby cities on Monday. At 9 a.m., a man wearing a belt of explosives boarded a minibus full of Iraqi Army recruits and blew himself up, killing 13 people and wounding 3 others, an Interior Ministry official said.

Early Tuesday morning, American soldiers from a patrol in the Ghaziliya neighborhood of Baghdad, a religiously mixed area where Sunnis and Shiites have clashed, delivered six headless bodies to Yarmouk Hospital, a hospital official said. They also turned over a seventh body, which was not mutilated and was found in another neighborhood, in northeast Baghdad, the hospital official said.

Outside of Baquba, a city northeast of Baghdad that has fallen into an almost daily cycle of sectarian revenge killings, Sunni insurgents attacked a Shiite mosque with mortars and small-arms fire, killing four guards, a provincial police official said.

The attackers then rigged the inside of the mosque with explosives, which they detonated, razing the mosque, the official said. A gun battle between local residents and the insurgents left three more people dead.

Near the northern city of Kirkuk, four oil refinery workers were killed in an attack as they drove toward south toward Tikrit, the Iraqi police said.

Bomber Attacks Afghan Governor's Funeral (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 11 — A suicide bomber blew himself up Monday at the funeral of the assassinated governor of Paktia Province, killing at least seven people and wounding up to 40. Five of the dead were policemen, and two were children.

The funeral was for Hakim Taniwal, a tribal elder and provincial governor who was killed in a suicide attack outside his office on Sunday. He was buried in his home district of Tanai, in Khost Province, where he had also served as governor after the fall of the Taliban.

"The number of wounded is very high," the provincial police chief, Gen. Muhammad Ayub, said by telephone. "Actually, we don't know how many people were wounded yet."

President Hamid Karzai, who was a close friend of Mr. Taniwal's, denounced the attack as a "heinous act of terrorism" and "an act against Islam and humanity."

"The enemies of Afghanistan, by carrying out a terrorist attack on the funeral ceremony of Hakim Taniwal, showed that they are not only against the traditions and culture of Afghans, but also against Islamic law," Mr. Karzai said in a statement issued by his office. "Enemies of Afghanistan" is the Afghan government's description for Taliban insurgents and other groups opposed to the government.

The attacks on Mr. Taniwal and on his funeral were seen by some here as a message from the Taliban that they are ready to strike in areas outside their traditional homeland, which is in the south, and are showing they can hit where they want.

A Taliban spokesman, Dr. Muhammad Hanif, said the Taliban was responsible for the death of Mr. Taniwal, and identified the suicide bomber as Ghulam Gul, from the Zurmat district of Paktia Province, an area of known Taliban influence. But he denied that the Taliban was behind the bombing at his funeral, saying, "We never do any action at religious ceremonies."

Dr. Hanif was contacted by telephone and was speaking from an unknown location. He is one of two spokesmen who regularly talk to the news media, but it is not known how closely he represents the Taliban leadership. NATO and American military officials have said fissures are showing in the Taliban movement, with some Taliban commanders based inside Afghanistan opposed to suicide bombing and, in one case, a commander refused orders from top leaders to execute a hostage he was holding. The hostage was later rescued by foreign troops.

About a thousand people had gathered for Mr. Taniwal's funeral, including the ministers of the interior, refugees, communications and parliamentary affairs, and other officials, who had flown in from Kabul, said General Ayub, the police chief. The explosion went off around 3 p.m., just 600 yards from the ministers as they were heading toward helicopters to return to Kabul, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0061805

None of the ministers was hurt, but the head of police security of Khost Province was among those wounded, he said. An Afghan journalist from Radio and Television Afghanistan was also wounded.

The suicide bomber appeared to be about 15 years old, General Ayub said.

A medic at Khost's city hospital, Muhammad Wali Nuri, said it had taken in seven dead from the attack, five policemen and two boys 10 to 11 years old. The hospital had also received 40 wounded, both police officers and civilians, and sent six of the most seriously wounded to the American military base in town.

Blast Hits Funeral Of Slain Afghan Governor (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 11 -- The crowded funeral ceremony of a provincial governor killed Sunday by a suicide bomber was attacked by another bomber Monday in Khost province, leaving six more people dead and dozens wounded.

Four cabinet ministers escaped injury when explosives detonated among mourners leaving services for Hakim Taniwal, who was governor of Paktia province. It was the third major suicide attack in Afghanistan in four days. On Saturday, a car bomber blew himself up alongside a U.S. military convoy here in the capital, killing 14 Afghans and two U.S. soldiers.

A purported spokesman for the Taliban, which has been battling NATO troops across southern Afghanistan for weeks, asserted responsibility for Taniwal's death but not for the funeral bombing, telling news agencies by telephone that it was against Taliban policy to attack religious ceremonies.

Taniwal was the most senior official to be slain in escalating attacks that have included remote-control and suicide bombings, as well as armed assaults. The attacks appear to be part of an orchestrated offensive by the revived Taliban militia, which ruled most of Afghanistan from 1996 until it was ousted by a U.S.-led military assault in 2001.

The current violence, the most intense since the defeat of the Taliban, has killed nearly 2,000 people this year, according to military reports. In the southern province of Kandahar, where NATO troops have been battling insurgents in two districts, officials said Monday that 92 more Taliban fighters had been killed, bringing the total to 510 in less than a week. Twenty foreign troops have been killed in recent weeks.

President Hamid Karzai called the funeral attack "a heinous act of terrorism that is an action against Islam and humanity." By bombing the gathering of mourners, he said in a statement, the killers showed they were against "not only the tradition and cultures of Afghanistan, but also against Islamic law."

Jamal Arsala, governor of Khost province, said in a telephone interview Monday night that more than 1,000 people were leaving the funeral for Taniwal in his native village of Hisarak when the bomber blew himself up in the middle of the crowd.

"The occasion made it especially sad. There was nothing the security people could do in that large crowd. It hurts me a lot," Arsala said. "It seems like they are going after soft but high-profile targets now, such as governors. Khost has so much potential to become an important economic center. This could take that opportunity away."

Paktia and Khost provinces border Pakistan. Afghan officials have repeatedly complained that Taliban renegades are being sheltered and supported by religious or intelligence groups in the rugged tribal border regions of Pakistan. The Pakistani government has denied the allegations and sent 80,000 army troops to curb extremist violence in the region.

Last week, however, Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, signed a peace agreement with Taliban groups operating in North Waziristan, a tribal region that borders Khost province. The deal requires the Taliban forces to stop attacks on both sides of the border, but critics in the two countries have said they fear it will actually give the Taliban more freedom to infiltrate into Afghanistan and carry out attacks.

Taniwal, 63, a former sociology professor, was a close adviser to Karzai who returned from long exile in Australia in 2002 at the new Afghan president's request to become governor of Khost. Later, he was briefly named to a cabinet ministry and then appointed governor of Paktia last year.

Taniwal died, along with his nephew and at least two other people, when a man wrapped in explosives ran toward his vehicle as he was leaving his office Sunday in Gardez, the capital of Paktia. Taniwal's body was flown to Kabul, and a procession and brief mourning ceremony were held at the Eid Gah, a majestic old mosque in the capital, before the retinue continued on to Khost by helicopter.

Karzai and other senior officials attended the Kabul ceremony under heavy security, along with U.N. officials and prominent Afghans who arrived and left quickly in Land Cruisers. The area around the mosque and the adjacent national stadium was cordoned off by soldiers and police, and no traffic was allowed to pass.

"He was a great person, and he worked hard for the peace process until the day he died," said Abdul Khan Suleimankhel, a member of parliament from Paktia who was at the service, wearing the traditional yellow turban of his region. "This will stop things for a while, but we elders will get together and find a way to keep the process going."

Taniwal was leading efforts in Paktia to persuade Taliban fighters to reconcile with the Karzai government and resolve a variety of tribal conflicts, a mission he had previously undertaken in Khost.

Rasool Amin, a former minister of education, described him as an "enlightened man who had worked hard for democracy all his life."

"He was a friend for 33 years, so this is a great shock," Amin added as he stood outside the Eid Gah. "Something has gone terribly wrong. Most Afghans want peace and progress, but we have been hijacked by extremists."

Justice Department Lawyers Lose Appeal On Overtime Pay (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

There's no dispute that Justice Department lawyers worked overtime and on holidays, and there's evidence the lawyers were "expected and induced" to work extra hours. But that's not enough to win back pay, a federal court ruled yesterday.

Overtime hours must be "ordered or approved" in advance for pay purposes, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit said.

The ruling is the latest in a long-running class-action lawsuit involving more than 9,000 Justice Department lawyers, but it's not the end of the case.

The agency lawyers, represented by Williams & Connolly LLP, will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court, said Robert A. Van Kirk , a lawyer for the firm.

"The Federal Circuit's decision essentially guts the Federal Employees Pay Act and gives federal agencies the green light to disregard the mandatory overtime provisions of the law," Van Kirk said.

The Justice Department would not comment on the ruling. In the past, the department has said that its lawyers are professionals who accept that they will work more than 40 hours a week to carry out their responsibilities.

Yesterday's ruling was the second defeat for the Justice Department lawyers -- many are assistant U.S. attorneys -- at the circuit court. They had prevailed in a federal claims court only to see that decision reversed on an appeal by the department. The lawyers went back to the circuit court in hopes of readdressing certain issues in the case.

The agency lawyers are seeking compensation for overtime, holiday and "administratively uncontrollable overtime," a special pay category. The department has said the case covers the period between 1992 to 1999, but the lawyers think the case could extend to the present.

The back pay at stake is substantial -- a 2001 estimate suggested it could be as high as $500 million. That year, the department successfully lobbied for legislation that it thinks will prevent the use of appropriated funds to pay overtime to its lawyers. That tactic brought criticism from some House members, who said the department was not leading by example and should conduct itself beyond reproach.

Yesterday's ruling, issued by federal Circuit Court Judges Alvin A. Schall , Randall R. Rader and Sharon Prost , focused on precise language in the 1945 federal pay law and in federal regulations. At issue was the court's finding that overtime hours must be approved in advance in writing and that the lawyers were not on a list of Justice Department employees who qualify for uncontrollable overtime -- a pay differential that goes to criminal investigators and others who regularly work long and irregular hours because of their assignments. The court also said an earlier ruling against the lawyers was correct and precluded them from getting holiday pay.

Even though the Justice Department kept two sets of books on the lawyers -- one for pay purposes and one for determining actual hours worked -- the court rejected for a second time the lawyers' argument that the records represented the department's approval of the extra hours.

"These records merely showed that the agency had awareness that attorneys worked extra hours -- not that they had been authorized to receive overtime pay for working extra hours," the court said.

When lawyers asked about overtime, they were told they were not entitled. The department also told lawyers there was no system in place to request overtime, according to the plaintiffs.Fellowship Program

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Tension At The Top (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The Justice Department, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a House subcommittee have started their own probes into how Hewlett-Packard Co. investigators obtained private phone records in an attempt to identify a source of company leaks to the media, according to the company and regulatory filings released yesterday.

Last night, the HP board of directors also reconvened to consider ousting its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, who led the company's efforts to identify the source of the leaks from its own board.

The company revealed yesterday in a regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it had been contacted by the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California for information regarding its investigation.

A spokesman for the FBI said the agency also was looking into the methods of HP's investigation. The House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on oversight and investigations has asked HP to submit information as part of the committee's broader look at breaches of private information. Last week, the California state attorney general's office launched its own investigation, and the Federal Communications Commission requested information from AT&T Corp. about the disclosure of the phone records.

How HP's investigators obtained phone records and other private information about its directors and several members of the news media has touched off a storm of criticism and investigations, and has raised concerns that such aggressive tactics are commonplace in the corporate world.

The company, started in the Silicon Valley garage of its founders and incorporated in 1939, is considered an icon in the technology world. But moving its old-line business into the new age divided the company in recent years, a tension that has created one of the fiercest feuding corporate boards.

When Dunn joined the board as a director in 1998, the company was known more for its line of printers than for computers. In 2001, then-HP chief executive Carly Fiorina championed a $19 billion acquisition of Compaq, arguing that buying the maker of personal computers would give the business bigger scale and a broader base of corporate customers. Fiorina clashed bitterly with Walter Hewlett, son of co-founder Bill Hewlett, who sought to keep HP from venturing afield of its profitable printer business. Hewlett had the backing of members of the Packard family, but when Fiorina prevailed and HP bought Compaq, he was dismissed from the board.

Dunn backed Fiorina in that battle but turned against her three years later, calling for the resignation of the brash and charismatic Fiorina as HP faltered after the merger. Fiorina, one of the few female Fortune 500 leaders, resigned. Dunn took over her position as chairman, and former NCR Corp. chief executive Mark Hurd eventually assumed the position of chief executive.

Under Hurd, the company's profit has soared as it cut costs and eliminated more than 15,000 jobs. The company's stock has also made a dramatic recovery during his tenure. When he joined the company in April 2005, its stock was trading at about $22 per share. The stock gained 27 cents per share yesterday to close at $36.36, which is near its 52-week high of $36.73.

This month, however, the company disclosed to the SEC that one of its board members, venture capitalist Thomas Perkins, resigned in May. Perkins is a former HP employee who was best known for co-founding the prominent Silicon Valley venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers.

His resignation came in protest over the methods used to determine which board member had been leaking information to the news media.

In trying to find the leak, the company hired an investigator, who then hired an agency that had its employees pose as HP board members and nine journalists to gain access to their personal phone records -- a practice known as pretexting. HP had determined that George A. Keyworth II had leaked the information. Keyworth was asked to resign but declined. The company said it would not re-nominate him to the board.

DOJ_NMG_0061808

Dunn, who was named board chairman after Fiorina was ousted, has become the central figure in the scandal because the investigation was ordered under her watch.

Dunn, 53, the daughter of a Las Vegas showgirl, started her career as a secretary for Wells Fargo Bank and worked up to chief executive of Barclays Global Investors.

During her tenure on the board, she has presided over a number of acrimonious battles at HP. This time, she has publicly denied any knowledge of the methods of investigation and has criticized Perkins, the former board member, after he called for her resignation.

"Tom knew more about the investigation than probably any other director," Dunn told the San Jose Mercury News in an article on Saturday. Perkins advocated going further, including subjecting board members to lie detector tests, Dunn told the newspaper, a claim Perkins denied.

In an e-mail, Perkins also complained to HP general counsel Ann Baskins that minutes from the board meeting did not reflect his dismay at the surveillance tactics. HP's outside counsel, Larry Sonsini, chairman of the law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, also told Perkins in a June e-mail that the investigation and its conduct were legal.

"In corporate scandals, this is as bad as it gets," said Charles Elson, director of the Center of Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. While leaks are undesirable, it was far worse that the company investigated its own board, which is supposed to be independent, and was allowed to criticize management practices, he said. "The chairperson of the board should be held accountable" for such a violation of directors' independence, he said.

H-P's Leak Probe Comes Under Wider Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton In San Francisco And John R. Emshwiller In Los Angeles

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The Justice Department has joined a probe of potentially illegal tactics by Hewlett-Packard Co. in investigating leaks by its board of directors.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California yesterday confirmed that his office and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are probing the "processes employed" in the H-P leak investigation. Separately, a House committee said it is seeking information from H-P about the matter, including the identity of private investigators that H-P has said it used in the investigation, which involved accessing the private phone records of board members and nine journalists.

1 WHO'S WHO IN THE SCANDAL

See profiles2 of H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, former director Thomas Perkins and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. · Complete coverage3

The inquiries were disclosed ahead of the second phase of a closely watched H-P board meeting, which adjourned Sunday and resumed last evening. The directors were expected to discuss the investigation and its potential fallout, including questions about the role of Chairman Patricia Dunn and senior company executives in authorizing and conducting the probe.

The focus of the government inquiries is an H-P investigation that was requested by Ms. Dunn in 2005 and intensified in early 2006. That company probe involved a practice known as "pretexting," in which a person's private phone records are obtained by someone impersonating them.

The Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker has disclosed that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out the inquiry and the firm, still unidentified, hired a second firm that used pretexting to obtain phone records. Ms. Dunn has said she knew directors' phone records were being scrutinized, but didn't realize those records had been obtained improperly.

According to two people close to H-P, one reason for the board's adjournment Sunday was discussion about whether former director Thomas Perkins should be asked to rejoin the board. Mr. Perkins resigned last spring to protest the investigation of the leaks. Since then, the wealthy venture capitalist has suggested that directors remove Ms. Dunn as chairman and put him back on the board, according to these people familiar with the situation.

"He gets his prestige from sitting on corporate boards" and being an H-P board member was very important to him, one knowledgeable individual said. He was surprised when the board accepted his resignation, this person added.

However, Mr. Perkins's spokesman, Mark Corallo, said, "Tom Perkins will not return, even if asked, to the board of H-P. He remains steadfastly loyal to H-P and is motivated only by the company's best interests." As for Ms. Dunn, she has said she will resign if the board requests it. Both people close to H-P said the board has been cool to the idea of Mr. Perkins returning as an H-P director. It is unclear whether the board will ask Ms. Dunn to resign as chairman, director or both.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said a crime was likely committed in the H-P probe, although his office has yet to determine who committed it. A spokesman for Mr. Lockyer's office yesterday said two potential felonies could be involved -- illegally accessing and using computer data and accessing personal-identification information and using it for illegal purposes, such as illegally accessing computer data.

Each of those crimes carries a maximum of three years in prison and a $10,000 fine. A person could be charged with multiple counts of the same crime, which presumably could happen because numerous individuals had their private records accessed.

The state agency could bring civil suits against individuals. The spokesman said there were various possible statutes under which to bring such actions. For instance, someone could be charged with unlawful business practices. Each violation of that statute carries a $2,500 fine.

FBI Deputy Director John Pistole told the Associated Press that the bureau opened its probe yesterday and was investigating two possible crimes: illegal computer intrusion and wiretapping. Under federal law, improperly obtaining personal phone records could be seen as a violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, which attempts to protect consumer information. Regulations of the Federal Communications Commission require companies to keep customer information private.

But federal law may not be completely clear.

Late Friday, leaders of the House Judiciary Committee sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist urging him to move legislation stalled in the Senate that would make pretexting a federal crime. That legislation passed the House in April although a similar bill remains stalled there. In the letter, the lawmakers cited a letter by Larry Sonsini, H-P's outside attorney, reportedly suggesting that using pretexting services wasn't clearly illegal.

"If an attorney of Mr. Sonsini's caliber...believes that pretexting is not already a crime, then the time has come to clearly and unambiguously make such activity illegal," the lawmakers wrote.

On top of whatever federal statutes may have been broken, prosecutors could pile on conspiracy-related charges that could trigger a minimum of five years imprisonment, said Behnam Dayanim, a partner and privacy specialist in the Washington office of the international law firm Paul Hastings.

To put together a case, Mr. Dayanim added, investigators would have to first show records were accessed without proper authorization. Then, they would have to determine how much knowledge each of the parties had that a crime was taking place. H-P might argue that it wasn't aware of what activities were conducted by the private investigators.

The investigators could be asked to cooperate in showing the company was aware of the tactics, in exchange for lighter prosecution, he said. "This isn't a complex case," Mr. Dayanim said. "It will be a matter of proving what was done."

The Securities and Exchange Commission has asked H-P about a disclosure in May regarding Mr. Perkins's resignation. H-P didn't disclose a reason for the resignation, and has said it believes its disclosures about the matter were appropriate. Mr. Perkins has raised questions about that assertion, in view of the fact that he had disagreements with Ms. Dunn and resigned in connection with the investigation.

Mr. Perkins has disclosed that he asked federal prosecutors to look into the probe's tactics, and approached the FTC and FCC. The FCC on Thursday asked AT&T Inc., one of the phone carriers involved in the investigation, about possible improprieties linked to H-P's probe, a person familiar with the matter said.

Meanwhile, House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Rep. Joe Barton (R., Texas) and Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), the panel's senior Democrat, asked Ms. Dunn to identify firms or people hired to obtain directors' and journalists' phone records. "The committee is troubled by this information, particularly given that it involves H-P -- one of America's corporate icons -- using pretexting and data brokers to procure the personal telephone records of the members of its board of directors and of other individuals without their knowledge or consent," the letter said.

House Panel And U.S. Attorney Join H.P. Inquiry (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 11 — As its directors continued to confer on the future of its chairwoman, Hewlett-Packard found itself under increased legal and political scrutiny Monday over the use of private investigators to trace the source of news leaks in the board.

The United States attorney's office in San Francisco said it was looking into the methods used by the investigators, which included the questionable if not illegal tactic of "pretexting" — posing as directors and journalists to get their phone records.

The House Committee on Energy and Commerce, meanwhile, asked the company to identify the consulting firm it hired for the investigation, the subcontractor that carried out the ruses and all of the targets. It also demanded copies of contracts and legal opinions in the matter.

The company's board, which met inconclusively on Sunday, resumed telephone consultations Monday afternoon. Foremost among the topics was the role of the chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, who the company says first authorized the investigation last year.

Ms. Dunn recused herself from parts of the discussion, according to a person with knowledge of the board's deliberations, leaving the company's outside counsel, Larry W. Sonsini, chairman of the powerhouse Silicon Valley law firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, to preside.

Mr. Sonsini and his firm were consulted at various points in the investigation, according to the company. As a result, his role at the board meeting was "an odd choice," said Jeffrey A. Sonnenfeld, a professor at the Yale School of Management who advises companies on corporate governance. "They have a highly conflicted law firm right now," he said.

Hewlett-Packard spokesmen would not comment on the board's deliberations, and Mr. Sonsini has not responded to requests for comment since the upheaval at the company became public last week.

Over the weekend, in a reflection of the high stakes, Ms. Dunn brought in Sitrick & Company, a well-known and tenacious public relations firm specializing in crisis management, to represent her and the company. Michael S. Sitrick, the firm's chairman and chief executive, has represented a number of high-profile clients, including the supermarket billionaire Ronald W. Burkle when a contributor to The New York Post was accused of trying to extort money from him.

One reason for the board's extended talks was reported to be discussion of Thomas J. Perkins, who quit the board in May in anger at Ms. Dunn over the internal investigation. A person with knowledge of the board's deliberations said that Mr. Perkins, a pre-eminent Silicon Valley venture capitalist, sought to return to the board but that members are split on whether he should.

Mr. Perkins's spokesman, Mark Corallo, disputed that report. "Mr. Perkins will not return to the H.P. board, even if asked," Mr. Corallo said, but "he believes in the performance and prospects of the company under the leadership of Mark Hurd."

While Mr. Perkins has been an ally of Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive — Mr. Perkins, like Mr. Hurd, sees H.P. as a growth company — his public airing of his problems with Ms. Dunn has injured the company's image. (Hewlett-Packard's stock, though, has been relatively unscathed since the furor became public last week. It closed up slightly Monday at $36.36.)

Mr. Perkins's insistence that the company acknowledge his reason for resigning in May — and his disclosure of what he had learned about the investigative tactics — led to the current upheaval. He and his lawyer presented information to the federal authorities at the same time that they sent information to the California attorney general and the Securities and Exchange Commission, both of which have indicated they are already conducting inquiries.

Corporate governance experts are split over whether the board should ask Ms. Dunn to step down.

"This is one of the biggest corporate blunders in the past 10 years," said Charles M. Elson, director of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "To get this far off tells you that something was wrong with the board."

Mr. Sonnenfeld said the directors would be wise to keep the board's chairmanship separate from the chief executive position, if only because the chairman can "take the bullets" that might otherwise hit the chief executive. "It keeps Mark Hurd above the fray," Mr. Sonnenfeld said.

Removing Ms. Dunn, he said, will not make the problems go away, but will just shift the focus to Mr. Hurd, who sits on the board. "I wouldn't think he'd want to be in the chair right now," he said.

A big part of the company's problem is that it has been unwilling to speak out. Joseph A. Grundfest, a professor of law and business at Stanford Law School, said the company should be saying two things.

First, it needs to say that pretexting is wrong. "There hasn't been a clear, unambiguous message," he said. Saying that would allow the company to shift the terms of the debate, he said.

"Dunn was also pretexted," he said. "She was as much a victim."

He also said the focus should be on the leaker, George A. Keyworth II, a long-serving board member who was asked to resign but has refused. "This verges on the preposterous," Mr. Grundfest said, adding that he thought the company should even take legal action against him.

"Mr. Keyworth has said, 'You can't trust me, but share confidential company information with me,' " Mr. Grundfest said.

Another public battle may not be the most appealing prospect, but Ralph D. Ward, the publisher of Boardroom Insider, an online magazine on corporate governance, suggested that an outside panel was needed to evaluate the board. "Not Larry Sonsini," he said. "He seems to have been part of the problem."

The panel, composed of governance experts, might help to establish the board's credibility and independence, Mr. Ward said.

Feds Scrutinize HP Probe Of Leaks (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 12, 2006

A congressional committee and several federal agencies are investigating whether Hewlett-Packard illegally obtained phone records of board members and journalists.

DOJ_NMG_0061811

HP's board met late Monday to discuss the growing scandal, which stems from an earlier attempt to find out which board member was leaking company information to the press. The internal issue attracted regulatory attention after HP said it hired detectives who pretended to be other people to get their confidential records.

That technique, called “pretexting,” falls in a legal gray area but has regulators concerned. HP says it is cooperating with officials.

In a five-page letter Monday to HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, the House Energy and Commerce Committee said it was “troubled” by reports of pretexting.

The letter, signed by two Republicans and two Democrats, asks HP for the names of everyone involved and other data.

The FBI has begun a preliminary inquiry, agency spokeswoman LaRae Quy confirmed Monday. The agency's focus has not been determined, but it could include computer and wire fraud, she said.

The Justice Department has asked HP for information “similar to that sought” by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, who has launched a criminal inquiry.

HP disclosed the department's interest Monday in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing.

The Federal Communications Commission sent a letter to AT&T on Thursday requesting information about phone records that HP may have obtained.

The scandal dates to early 2005, when HP's board was clashing with then-CEO Carly Fiorina. Leaks to the press became a problem, so Fiorina ordered an investigation.

After Fiorina was ousted, Dunn hired a detective firm to continue the search. HP now says the firm used pretexting to obtain the phone records of nine reporters. Former board member Tom Perkins says his phone records were also obtained via pretexting.

Equity analyst Charles Wolf at Needham & Co. says the problems started with the controversial 2002 acquisition of Compaq Computer, which sparked a shareholder revolt and boardroom battle.

Dunn, 53, may have to leave to quell the current flap, Wolf says. Although the scandal is a distraction for CEO Mark Hurd, he should be relatively unaffected because it began before he joined HP in April 2005, says tech analyst Martin Reynolds at researcher Gartner.

HP's stock closed up 27 cents at $36.36 Monday. Equity analyst Bill Fearnley Jr. at FTN Midwest Securities says investors are focused on Hurd's leadership.

Federal Prosecutors Ask For Info On HP Probe; Board Ponders Dunn's Fate (LAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, The Associated Press

AP, September 12, 2006

Federal investigators stepped into the fray surrounding Hewlett-Packard Co.'s possibly illegal investigation of media leaks, as the company's board planned to meet again to discuss the fate of embattled Chairwoman Patricia Dunn.

HP revealed in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing Monday it had been "informally contacted" by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California concerning the company's methods for rooting out who was giving confidential company information to journalists.

The Palo Alto-based maker of computers and printers said it is cooperating fully with the federal inquiry, along with an investigation by the California state attorney general's office, which requested similar information. An HP spokesman had no further comment.

Hewlett-Packard's board adjourned an emergency phone conference Sunday without announcing whether it would oust Dunn for her role in the investigation that may have used illegal means to spy on colleagues and journalists. The board was scheduled to reconvene late Monday afternoon.

Dunn's resignation now seems likely, said Roger Kay, who follows HP as president of Endpoint Technologies Associates, a market research firm. "The right thing to do now is for her to step down, clear the air and let the company carry on," he said.

Dunn, a former freelance journalist who has become one of the most powerful women in corporate America, ordered the outside investigation of fellow board members to determine who anonymously leaked information, especially as it related to the job status of former chief executive Carly Fiorina.

HP hired private investigators who used Social Security numbers and other personal information to impersonate HP directors and journalists. The impostors then tricked phone companies into turning over detailed logs of their home and cellular phone calls.

Although a common tactic among private investigators, the subterfuge -- known as "pretexting" -- tests the bounds of California law.

DOJ_NMG_0061812

California's attorney general has said the investigation violated two state laws related to identity theft and illegal access to computer records. It's still unclear, however, whether the company or anyone acting on its behalf will face civil or criminal charges.

A spokesman for Attorney General Bill Lockyer had no comment Monday on the involvement of the U.S. Attorney.

A federal investigation further complicates the situation for HP, experts said.

"It opens the company to more scrutiny on a broader and more powerful level," said Ken Sukhia, a former U.S. Attorney in Tallahassee, Fla.

Martin Reynolds, vice president of the research firm Gartner Inc., said it may be more likely that criminal charges are filed against the private investigator, rather than Dunn or another HP board member. The company has not revealed the name of the investigator it used.

That may be one reason investors have largely ignored the scandal. HP shares rose 27 cents Monday to close at $36.36 on the New York Stock Exchange, near the top end of its 52-week range of $25.53 to $36.73.

"It's a good thing they're not trying to close a difficult merger or negotiate for a new CEO right now," Reynolds said. "But the business of HP and the leadership there is strong enough that this is just not an issue. It's certainly embarrassing, and it's obviously not the best press, but the good news is this is pretty much divorced from the day-to-day operations of HP."

The Federal Communications Commission has also taken interest in the HP investigation, asking AT&T Inc. last week how the company's private investigators managed to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists.

Following the investigation, board member George Keyworth II was identified as the source of the leak, and HP responded by barring him from seeking re-election.

Another HP director, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, resigned from the board in May in protest of the investigators' tactics.

Perkins this weekend called on Dunn to resign.

Dunn told The Associated Press last week she would resign if asked, but said several fellow board members had urged her to remain on the job despite the criminal investigation. She also said the media leaks were an "egregious breach" of the company's standards and that the board of directors fully backed an investigation to root out the source.

The nine reporters whose phone records were compromised are Pui-Wing Tam and George Anders of The Wall Street Journal; Peter Burrows, Ben Elgin and Roger Crockett of BusinessWeek; John Markoff of The New York Times; and Dawn Kawamoto, Tom Krazit and Stephen Shankland of CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com.

Investigators hired by HP also targeted Thomas Shankland, a semiretired geophysicist in Los Alamos, N.M., who is Stephen Shankland's father. The younger Shankland is married to Associated Press reporter Rachel Konrad, who has also covered HP.

Keyworth, the board member who will not be re-nominated, was the former science adviser to President Reagan and director of the Physics Division at Los Alamos National Laboratory, which he joined in 1968. Keyworth has acknowledged leaking information to reporters.

AP business writers Michael Liedtke and Paul Elias contributed to this report.

Hewlett-Packard Says Justice Department Joins Probe (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo And Ian King

Bloomberg, September 12, 2006

Sept. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co., the world's second-largest personal-computer maker, said the U.S. Justice Department joined a probe into whether the company broke the law in its investigation of news leaks by directors.

The U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California is looking at the use of fake identities by private investigators to obtain phone records of board members and nine journalists, Hewlett-Packard said in filing today. A U.S. House committee also requested information, and the Federal Communications Commission has asked AT&T Inc. about its involvement in the matter.

The new inquiries add pressure on Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who authorized the probe that California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has already said may result in criminal charges. Hewlett- Packard's board is meeting today for a second day to discuss the scandal and consider calls by former director and venture capitalist Tom Perkins for Dunn's resignation.

``There's no way to spin this from a positive viewpoint," said Chuck Jones, an analyst at Atlantic Trust Stein Roe in San Francisco, which manages $16 billion in assets including Hewlett- Packard's shares. He also owns the shares personally. The problems probably won't affect Hewlett-Packard's earnings performance, he said.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard, which ranks second to Dell Inc. in PC revenue, rose 27 cents to $36.36 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. The stock has gained 27 percent this year.

The company won't provide additional details about the Justice Department inquiry, said Hewlett-Packard spokesman Ryan Donovan.

More Inquiries

The U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee asked Dunn in a letter today to turn over information related to how Hewlett- Packard obtained private phone records. Also today, an FCC official confirmed the commission is seeking information from San Antonio-based AT&T related to Hewlett-Packard's investigation.

Michael Balmoris, an AT&T spokesman, said the company is working with law enforcement officials to catch those who fraudulently obtain access to customer information.

Dunn, 53, ordered the investigations beginning last year in an effort to find out who leaked news about company strategy and the ouster of former Chief Executive Officer Carly Fiorina.

After meeting for ``several hours'' yesterday, the board will convene again this afternoon, Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard said yesterday.

`Sharp Conflict'

``This strongly suggests there is sharp conflict among board members and uncertainty as to next steps,'' said James Post, a professor at Boston University School of Management. ``Some of those directors know she has to go.''

Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd, addressing employees on Sept. 8, said the board has a ``long history'' of leaking information that needs to be resolved. In an interview earlier that day, Dunn acknowledged that ``there were things not done particularly well, including by me, and certainly not intentionally'' as part of a yearlong external probe.

Fiorina, Hurd's predecessor, began an internal review into the source of board leaks in the weeks before her February 2005 ouster after stories about board deliberations appeared in publications including the Wall Street Journal. The internal review failed to yield the source of the leaks, prompting Dunn to initiate an outside investigation in mid-2005.

Outside Counsel

After reviewing private records, Dunn confronted longtime director George Keyworth at the board's May 18 meeting. He admitted to divulging information, was asked to resign and declined. His friend, Perkins, co-founder of venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, objected to the way the investigation was handled and resigned.

Perkins, who quit in May because of the probe, later demanded that a review be conducted into how outside investigators obtained directors' phone records. Perkins was assured by Hewlett-Packard outside counsel Larry Sonsini in a June 28 e-mail that the probe was ``well done and within legal limits.''

``I acted not from any ill will toward Ms. Dunn but to protect the best interests of H-P,'' Perkins said in an e-mailed statement. Perkins's questioning of tactics used in the probe led to Hewlett-Packard's disclosure of possible illegal activity last week. ``The past months and days have shown that those interests are best served if Ms. Dunn would resign from the board.''

`Tarnished Image'

Upon further review, Sonsini, of Palo Alto-based Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, couldn't confirm that the investigation complied ``in all respects'' with the law. Hewlett- Packard detailed the investigation in a Sept. 6 regulatory filing before learning that reporters' phone records had also been accessed as part of the probe.

``The board needs to get together and repair its terribly tarnished image,'' said David Beim, professor of finance at Columbia University, in an interview last week. He said Dunn's resignation is one of the options the board has to consider.

Dunn, who is also vice chairwoman of Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco, said on Sept. 8 that she feels she has the confidence of directors and trusts their judgment. She said she would resign if asked by the board.

Privacy Piracy (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Just how easy is it for people to obtain your private telephone records? The scandal at Hewlett-Packard provides a stark and troubling answer.

The computer-maker is in turmoil over Chairwoman Patricia Dunn's use of private investigators to find which of her fellow board members leaked company information to the press. Those investigators found the leaker simply by asking phone companies for the personal calling records of board members and certain reporters.

Dunn denies any advance knowledge of the specific tactic used by the investigators — an unsavory practice known as “pretexting” in which investigators misrepresent themselves as the people whose records are being sought. Even so, a savvy executive should know that hiring people to plug leaks is fraught with peril, as Richard Nixon discovered after he set up his “plumbers” unit.

This unseemly saga is particularly disturbing because HP is one of the nation's most admired companies, one of 30 that make up the Dow Jones Industrial Average. It cannot inspire confidence when the board chairwoman is spying on her own directors.

Aside from exposing dysfunction in the HP boardroom, the episode illustrates just how loose phone companies are with customers' records.

Despite its obvious deceit, however, pretexting might not violate federal law if is not used for identity theft. California, where HP is based, has more stringent laws, and authorities there are investigating whether any of them were broken.

If nothing else, the events at HP should put pressure on telephone companies to make it harder to get sensitive data. They should adopt restrictions that would keep private records out of the hands of unscrupulous poseurs, such as requiring passwords and mailing records only to the customers' listed addresses.

A federal response might be in order as well, both to set standards for releasing sensitive data and to crack down on the pernicious practice of pretexting, which some Internet companies have turned into a for-profit business model.

Perhaps then, people would feel more secure. And perhaps companies like HP would focus more on their customers, and less on themselves.

Dell Delays Briefing, Filing Profit Report As Woes Mount (USAT)

By Byron Acohido

USA Today, September 12, 2006

SEATTLE — Amid rising uncertainty about its strategic course, Dell on Monday delayed filing its quarterly report and postponed a high-profile analysts briefing for the second time in six months.

The No. 1 PC maker also put its stock-repurchase program on hold and noted that the Justice Department has joined the Securities and Exchange Commission in examining its accounting practices. In a statement with few details, Chairman Michael Dell vowed to make things right.

"We will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," Dell said.

Federal regulators are examining whether Dell misstated financial reports "including issues relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items," Dell said. Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of New York has requested to review accounting documents from 2002 to the present.

The Round Rock, Texas-based PC maker's shares dipped 5% on the news, but recovered to close at $21.19, down 2%. Dell disclosed the SEC investigation last month, and has started a parallel internal audit.

Many company watchers were anticipating details about a turnaround strategy at Wednesday's postponed briefing, which was initially pushed back from April. The briefing has not been rescheduled.

"We're in a vacuum here," said Brent Bracelin, senior research analyst at Pacific Crest Securities.

Analysts had been eager to question Dell about last quarter's disappointing results, which included lower-than-expected net income and reports that rival Hewlett-Packard was gaining share. Some analysts viewed that as a low point for Dell, but Bracelin says the company's fortunes could continue to fall.

Dell raced past rivals like HP, Compaq and Gateway in the 1990s. But growth has slowed and profits are under pressure. Senior executives say they've had problems estimating demand and may have lowered prices too much. Critics point to a string of missteps, combined with a dose of bad luck, including:

·Laptop lag. Rival HP has gained ground thanks partly to a hot consumer laptop market, in which buyers prefer to see and hold the product before buying; Dell sells mainly online.

·Poor service. Dell officials will spend $150 million in the current fiscal year on initiatives to shed its reputation for ignoring complaints.

·Bad batteries. Dell was recently forced to recall 4.1 million laptop batteries because they can overheat and cause fires.

Richard Farmer, analyst at Merrill Lynch, called Dell's announcement "an additional overhang for the stock."

Expanding Investigations Increase The Heat On Dell (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The hole for Dell Inc. seems to keep getting deeper.

The computer maker said it would delay filing its fiscal second-quarter report because of a widening Securities and Exchange Commission investigation and its own probe into its financial accounting. Dell also said it has been subpoenaed by the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York over its financial reporting.

The news increases the spotlight on Dell's reporting methods and could spell more trouble for chief executive Kevin Rollins.

DOJ_NMG_0061815

When Dell disclosed the SEC investigation in August, the Round Rock, Texas, company said it didn't think the investigation would materially affect its financials; now Dell isn't ruling out needing to restate prior results. The subpoenas from the U.S. attorney, which has requested documents related to Dell's financial reporting from 2002 to the present, hadn't previously been disclosed.

Dell was also forced to take two other embarrassing steps yesterday.

It suspended its share-buyback program until further notice. The company spent $7.2 billion to repurchase 204 million shares in fiscal year 2006, which ended in February. In addition, Dell canceled its financial-analysts' day for the second time this year; the meeting with Wall Street analysts was to have taken place in New York tomorrow.

Yesterday, Dell shares slid 2.1%, down 46 cents to $21.19 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Dell shares have declined by nearly 30% this year.

Analysts said the investigations, along with the company's plunging stock price, increase the pressure on Dell's management, in particular Mr. Rollins and chief financial officer Jim Schneider. Questions may also arise for Dell's independent auditing firm PricewaterhouseCoopers LLC.

"A big part of this is it further undermines management credibility, which is already very low," said Toni Sacconaghi, analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. "Certainly the finger is going to be pointed most squarely at Kevin Rollins and CFO Jim Schneider."

Founder Michael Dell, who remains Dell's chairman, said in a statement that the company was cooperating with the investigators.

"We will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," he said in the statement. The company declined to make any further comment.

The intensifying investigations are the latest setbacks for Dell.

Over the past year, Dell -- the world's largest personal-computer maker measured by units shipped -- has seen its sales and profits slow and competition ramp up from rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co. The company also announced a battery recall, involving millions of laptops, last month, because of a potential fire hazard.

Dell was already being investigated by the SEC for the timing with which it recorded its revenue. Yesterday, Dell said in a statement that the investigations indicated potential issues "relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items." The company said it is working with its audit committee and independent auditors to determine whether it has to restate its prior results.

Companies use accruals and reserves when they sell services but deliver them at a later date. In Dell's case, the company typically sets aside funds from current operations to cover the cost of future warranty claims.

Dell said that in responding to the SEC in mid-August, it discovered information that "raises potential issues" related to the fiscal years before 2006. Dell management then recommended that its board audit committee investigate the matter, according to the statement.

"We have not yet reached any conclusion on materiality as to these issues," said Don Carty, a Dell director who is chairman of the audit committee, in the statement. "We are continuing to investigate the matter fully." The other members of Dell's audit committee are William H. Gray III, former president and chief executive of the United Negro College Fund, and Sam Nunn, a former Georgia senator who is now CEO of the Nuclear Threat Initiative.

While Dell declined to give any other details of its possible financial misstatements, accounting experts said the company could potentially have engaged in "cookie-jar reserves," which have also been seen at Xerox Corp. and Sunbeam Corp.

When using "cookie-jar reserves," a company is in effect creating a rainy day fund by setting up excess provisions on its balance sheet for future expenses that it doesn't truly expect to incur. It can then dip into the jar in leaner times to create the appearance of profit.

In a report in November, accounting expert Albert Meyer, then at research firm 2nd Opinion Research, wrote that he found one "cookie-jar reserve" that Dell created following its fiscal 2005 results. In that instance, Dell repatriated $4.1 billion in foreign earnings in its fiscal 2005.

The repatriation tax charge is 5.25%, meaning the tax provision Dell should have taken would have amounted to $215 million.

Instead, Mr. Meyer said in his report, the company accrued $280 million, resulting in a $65 million "cookie jar." Such a tactic could have added 5% to Dell's earnings-per-share growth rate in fiscal 2006, Mr. Meyer calculated.

"They overaccrued," Mr. Meyer -- now president of money-management firm Bastiat Capital in Plano, Texas -- said in an interview. In his report, he wrote that such a tactic "smells."

DOJ_NMG_0061816

While most of the current attention at Dell is on Mr. Rollins, Mr. Dell, who founded Dell out of his University of Texas dorm room in 1984, isn't escaping notice either. In asking for documents going back to 2002, the U.S. attorney's office is scrutinizing a period when Mr. Dell was CEO of the firm. Mr. Rollins was appointed Dell CEO in 2004.

Shannon Cross, analyst with Cross Research, said the news would add "a layer of uncertainty" to the stock, making it harder for investors to buy into Dell.

"I think there are a number of changes that need to be made at Dell, and we need to get a good idea of what the strategy is on an ongoing basis," she said.

Dell's Quarterly Report Is Delayed As Probe Widens (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, September 12, 2006

Dell Inc., the world's largest personal-computer maker, delayed filing its quarterly report and said the U.S. Justice Department had joined the Securities and Exchange Commission in investigating the company's accounting.

The announcement prompted Dell to postpone an analysts meeting Wednesday, where it had planned to present its strategy to revive earnings.

Dell hasn't determined whether it will need to restate results but is suspending a stock buyback program, the Round Rock, Texas-based company said in a statement Monday.

The investigations by the SEC and the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York may sidetrack efforts by Chief Executive Kevin Rollins for a turnaround. Dell missed profit forecasts for two straight quarters, announced the recall of 4.1 million notebook batteries and is struggling to improve customer service after losing orders to Hewlett-Packard Co.

"Confidence in Dell is shaken," said Nirav Parikh, an analyst with Los Angeles-based TCW Group Inc., which holds more than 25.8 million Dell shares. "The company is having to restrategize with a lot going on in the marketplace, and it seems it's having difficulty doing that."

Dell said the investigations indicate possible errors related to so-called accruals and reserves -- estimates of future company obligations -- reported in previous financial statements. The company said last month that the SEC started requesting information in August 2005 relating to revenue recognition.

Shares of Dell dropped 46 cents, or 2 percent, to $21.19 in Nasdaq Stock Market trading.

"We will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," Chairman Michael Dell said in Monday's statement.

The company hasn't reached any conclusion as to how material the issues are. In August, Dell said its own review of accounting found some "potential issues" that are unlikely to have a "material impact" on finances.

The SEC's investigation undermines management's "already fragile credibility," Toni Sacconaghi, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York, said in a note Monday.

"Dell's senior management team has been under fire over the last six-plus quarters," said Sacconaghi, the top-ranked computer analyst by Institutional Investor magazine. Monday's "disclosures that the company also appears to have been remiss in understanding its own financial controls is likely to further unnerve investors."

Analysts also raised concerns about the delay of Dell's financial day, which already had been postponed from April. It will be rescheduled to a later date, Dell said Monday. The company still plans a meeting with reporters today, which will be held by Michael Dell and Rollins.

"Dell pushing out the analyst day meeting from April 2006 initially and now again suggests, in our view, that Dell has yet to finalize a strategy to reaccelerate growth and/or improve margins," said Brent Bracelin, an analyst at Pacific Crest Securities in Portland, Ore.

The U.S. attorney requested documents related to the company's financial reporting dating back to 2002, Dell said. The company said it plans to file its latest report as soon as possible and it is cooperating with the investigations.

Heather Tasker, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office, and John Nester, an SEC spokesman, declined to comment. Dell isn't commenting beyond the statement, said Bob Pearson, a company spokesman.

David Nestor, a spokesman for Dell's auditor, New York-based PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, said the firm's policy is not to comment on client matters.

Dell Delays Quarterly Report Due To Accounting Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Slagle, Ap Technology Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

(AP) - DALLAS-Dell Inc. has delayed filing its fiscal second-quarter financial report and suspended its share repurchase program because of an ongoing federal accounting probe. It was the latest in a series of setbacks for the world's largest PC maker.

The Round Rock, Texas, company said it could not file the quarterly report because of "questions raised" by an informal Securities and Exchange Commission investigation into accounting issues and a subsequent internal probe.

The company also said the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York had subpoenaed documents related to its financial reporting from 2002 to the present.

In a statement, Dell said investigations have shown that the company may have misstated prior financial reports, including issues relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items, which may affect previously reported financial results.

Dell shares dropped 16 cents to $21.49 in afternoon trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market. That is near the lower end of their 52-week range of $18.95 to $35.25 and is down 28 percent since the end of 2005.

Dell said it has not yet determined the material impact of any of the accounting issues.

"We are fully cooperating with the investigations and working to resolve any and all issues raised in connection with those investigations as quickly as possible, and we will take any appropriate remedial or corrective actions to address any problems," Chairman Michael Dell said in a statement.

The company said it plans to file the second-quarter report as soon as possible but didn't offer a more specific timetable. Third-quarter earnings are scheduled to be posted Nov. 16.

It's believed to be the first time Dell has ever missed a quarterly filing, said spokesman Bob Pearson, who declined to comment beyond what was in the news release.

"This particular news couldn't come at a worse time for Dell given all of the problem," said Tim Bajarin, analyst with Creative Strategies.

Dell grew to prominence on a patented, direct-sales model to consumers and businesses but has been rattled in recent months as it revamps its customer service programs and deals with fierce competition from rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co.

Dell first disclosed the accounting probe in last month's quarterly report, in which revenues plummeted 51 percent.

At the time, Dell officials played down its significance and said they didn't expect it to have any material impact on the company's bottom line.

Also last month, Dell issued a voluntary recall of 4.1 million potentially flammable laptop batteries made by Sony Corp.

Dell also postponed its annual analysts meeting planned for Wednesday in New York. The company will host two Web conferences with Dell and Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins to provide a company update and show new products.

Justice Said To Drop Criminal Investigation Of Freddie Mac (WP)

By Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

After laying dormant for two years, the Justice Department's criminal probe into accounting transgressions at Freddie Mac is apparently over, according to company officials.

"The U.S. attorney's office has not initiated contact with us in well over two years, and it is our understanding that the matter is inactive," said David R. Palombi, a spokesman for the McLean-based mortgage finance company. "Accordingly, we expect no further action in this matter."

The inactivity at the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria also extends to investigations of several former Freddie Mac executives, including chief executive Leland C. Brendsel, president David Glenn and chief financial officer Vaughn A. Clarke. Sources familiar with the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they did not want to be seen as speaking for the department, said lawyers for the ousted officials have not been contacted by the Justice Department since 2004.

Palombi's statements appear to resolve one of the final issues that have been dogging the company since its accounting problems became public in 2003.

In 2003, Freddie Mac admitted it had improperly managed its earnings through a series of transactions that smoothed out earnings growth. The company reduced its reported earnings by $5 billion between 2000 and 2003, hoping to defer those earnings to later years.

Freddie Mac is still working to produce an up-to-date and accurate set of books. But the company has cleared itself of most of the liability from the matter in the past three years. It has paid a $125 million fine to federal regulators, more than $400 million in shareholder lawsuit settlements, and $3.8 million in civil fines to settle Federal Election Commission charges of improper political fundraising.

But the possibility of a criminal action remained. In recent weeks, the company sought clarification from the Justice Department over whether its long silence meant the case was closed -- particularly after the department issued a statement in August that it had closed its criminal investigation of similar accounting problems at Freddie Mac rival Fannie Mae.

"It is Freddie Mac's understanding that it is the practice of the U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of Virginia neither to issue official notices nor to confirm publicly the conclusion of an investigation," Palombi said.

A spokesman for Chuck Rosenberg, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia said only: "We cannot comment on that issue."

The lack of federal interest in bringing a criminal case is no surprise. Experts on white-collar crime say prosecutions of accounting malfeasance are notoriously difficult and risky, given the complexity of the issues. In Freddie's case, there is the added issue that the company understated, rather than inflated, its earnings.

Brendsel's attorney, Brendan V. Sullivan, and Clarke's attorney, Steven Salky, could not be reached for comment. Glenn's attorney, Thomas P. Vartanian, declined to comment.

The sources familiar with the investigation, however, said none of the attorneys expects further action by the Justice Department in the matter.

Editorial: White-collar Blues (FT)

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Corporate America has had a rough ride since Enron: between Eliot Spitzer, New York attorney-general, and the Sarbanes-Oxley act, US companies have paid a high price for their pre-Enron bad habits (not to mention the bad behaviour of others).

But corporate America's problems have come not only from the scourge of Albany, and the new regulatory burden imposed by Congress. The US Department of Justice has made white-collar crime (rightly) one of its top priorities. But in its zeal to catch corporate criminals, the DoJ has used some dubious tactics that arguably violate the US constitution and may even defeat the whole purpose of its corporate crime crusade - to create a new culture of compliance that encourages companies to do the right thing without having to be prosecuted.

Later today, the powerful Senate judiciary committee will open its own inquiry into the department's hardball tactics, particularly the practice of forcing companies to waive the privilege that normally protects communications with lawyers - including those between whistle-blowers and in-house lawyers. Businessmen have been complaining about this practice for years: they say they cannot risk talking to their lawyers - even to find out how to obey the law - if the DoJ has the power to use that information against them. Last week, a group of top former justice department officials wrote to Alberto Gonzales, the attorney-general, to say the same thing. The group included former attorneys-general with impeccable tough-on-crime credentials, and its criticisms will be hard to ignore.

The crux of the problem is a 2003 policy (known as the "Thompson memorandum") that says prosecutors should decide whether to indict a company partly based on the company's co-operation with the government; and the best way to prove co-operation is to waive attorney-client privilege, and give the government all the information it needs to make its case. Companies have little choice but to turn over the information: an indictment is tantamount to a death sentence.

This is the wrong way to fight corporate crime. Companies need legal advice to be able to obey complex laws; if they cannot get it - without the risk that what they say will be revealed to the government - they may not try to obey the law at all.

Even worse, the tactic defeats a larger purpose: it discourages insiders from reporting wrongdoing, for fear their information may land them in jail - and without that information companies cannot police themselves and catch wrongdoing before it goes too far. The bar, the courts, the business community and now the lawmakers are telling the prosecutors that they are abusing the remarkable power of their office.

The DoJ should rewrite its policy on waiver of attorney-client privilege - before Congress does so for it.

Grasso Seeks New Judge For Trial (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

NEW YORK -- Former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso is seeking a new judge for his pending trial on civil charges brought by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer.

DOJ_NMG_0061819

Mr. Grasso's lawyers last week filed a motion to have the case reassigned to a new judge. New York Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos has been handling the pretrial stage of the case and is set to preside over a trial that may start as soon as October.

Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Mr. Grasso alleges that his $187.5 million pay package was excessive for the head of a New York not-for-profit company, which the NYSE was before it went public in March as NYSE Group Inc.

Lawyers for Mr. Grasso at Williams & Connolly LLP filed papers arguing for a new judge on the grounds Justice Ramos held settlement discussions with the parties in which he made statements that could be interpreted as "impairing Mr. Grasso's right" to a fair trial. The filing also stated that -- before the case was filed -- Justice Ramos twice unsuccessfully approached the Big Board to be considered for a board seat.

Gerson Zweifach, a lawyer for Mr. Grasso, declined to comment. A spokesman for Mr. Spitzer's office called the motion "a delaying tactic" designed "to put off a trial."

Mr. Grasso's lawyers also have appealed Justice Ramos's ruling that certain parts of the case be decided at a bench trial instead of before a jury.

Pathmark loss bigger than expected Supermarket chain Pathmark Stores had wider-than-expected losses for its second quarter, in which the grocer had flat sales and increased expenses.

The company based in Carteret lost $8.8 million, or 17 cents a share, for the quarter ended July 29, compared with a loss of $5.1 million, or 12 cents a share, in the year-ago period. Analysts had been expecting a loss of 12 cents a share, according to Thomson Financial.

Sales increased 0.2 percent, to $1 billion, while sales at stores open at least a year increased 0.5 percent. Pathmark said its results were affected by lower gross mar gins at its pharmacy related to Medicare Part D, and higher costs for utilities, workers' compensation, medical and pension bills.

However, Pathmark did benefit from $3.2 million in gift cards that were sold but never redeemed. Additionally, Chief Executive John Standley said merchandising initiatives are connecting with consumers.

Execs accused in bribe Two former executives of a Princeton international telecom munications company approved more than $250,000 in bribes to officials in several African nations, se curities regulators charged in a lawsuit filed yesterday.

The actions of the men, Steven Ott of Princeton and Roger Michael Young of London, while at ITXC violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, the Securities and Exchange Commission charged in the complaint filed in federal court in Trenton. Ott, vice president for global sales, and Young, managing director of the Middle East and Africa, approved $267,468 in bribes to phone company officials in Nigeria, Rwanda and Senegal between 2001 and 2004, the lawsuit alleged.

In exchange, the once publicy traded ITXC landed contracts that earned the company $11.5 million in profits, the SEC said. In 2004, ITXC merged with Teleglobe International Holdings, which was ac quired in February by Videsh San char Nigam.

The men's attorneys both declined to comment, saying they had not seen the complaint.

Last year, ITXC salesman Yaw Osei Amoako was indicted on federal criminal charges related to the alleged bribes.

Utility merger progress Public Service Enterprise Group and Exelon have not made a lot of headway in reaching an agreement with the state of New Jersey to win approval of their $18 billion merger.

"There is a meaningful gap" between what the companies have offered and the state has proposed, Thomas O'Flynn, chief financial officer and executive vice president for Public Service told analysts at a Lehman Bros. energy conference in New York City yesterday.

The deal has won all of the necessary regulatory approvals except from the state Board of Public Utilities which has sought to squeeze more money and other concessions from the two companies than their "last and best" offer submitted last month. The company has offered a package amounting to about $600 million while the state is seeking roughly $820 million.

Neither O'Flynn nor John Young, Exelon's chief financial officer, offered any details on how the negotiations are proceeding al though the former said he agreed with comments made by Exelon in a filing which said the probability of the deal closing was "no longer more likely than not."

SEC Charges 2 More Ex-ITXC Execs (HC)

By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires

Houston Chronicle, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday said it has filed civil charges against two more former employees of telecommunications company ITXC Corp.

The agency accuses them of approving and in some cases negotiating almost $267,500 in bribes paid to senior officials of government-owned telephone companies in Nigeria, Rwanda and Senegal.

The SEC accused Steven Ott, the former vice president for global sales, and Roger Michael Young, the former managing director for the Middle East and Africa, of violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. The SEC said the men also caused the company to falsely record the bribes as legitimate business expenses.

An attorney for Ott couldn't immediately be reached. An attorney for Young wasn't in the office and couldn't immediately return a phone call.

The civil suit came as Yaw Osei Amoako, a former ITXC regional manager, pleaded guilty in Trenton, N.J., to conspiring to violate the anti-bribery law in connection with payments of bribes to employees of foreign state-owned telecommunications companies. He faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 11, the Justice Department said. The SEC had filed a civil suit against Amoako last year.

ITXC was based in Princeton, N.J. In 2004, it was acquired by Teleglobe International Holdings Ltd., now part of Videsh Sanchar Nigam Ltd. ITXC allegedly earned $11.5 million in net profit thanks to the contracts approved by Ott and Young, the SEC said.

The Justice Department said it had charged Amoako and unnamed co-conspirators with arranging for ITXC to pay $166,000 in commissions to a foreign official at Nitel, a Nigerian government-owned company; $26,000 to Rwandatel, owned by the Rwandan government; and about $74,000 to an employee of Sonatel, partly owned by the Senegalese government.

An attorney for Amoako couldn't be located. Earlier this year, a federal judge put the SEC's case on hold until the resolution of the criminal case.

Capitol's New Bank Examiners (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Four years after enacting landmark corporate-governance laws, the men behind Sarbanes-Oxley are leaving Congress. The retirements of Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D., Md.) and Rep. Mike Oxley (R., Ohio) spell changes next year in the House and Senate committees that regulate Wall Street, banks and finance.

The new leaders of the banking panels will affect how Congress deals with issues such as whether hedge funds should be regulated, whether commercial banks should be allowed to enter the real-estate brokerage business and how the government should treat Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

The broader change will come in the House, which will see a new committee chairman regardless of whether Republicans or Democrats control the chamber after the November elections. On the other side of the Capitol, Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.) will succeed Mr. Sarbanes as the senior Democratic member of the Senate Banking Committee. Should Republicans, as expected, retain a majority in the Senate, the panel's chairman will remain Sen. Richard Shelby (R., Ala.), but the ranking member still influences the panel's agenda. Mr. Dodd is close to the securities and insurance industries, which have significant presences in his state.

Things are more complicated in the House, where as many as five lawmakers could win the top spot on the Financial Services panel. If Democrats win majority control in November, the liberal Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) would inherit the gavel. If Republicans keep their majority, a contest is shaping up between Reps. Spencer Bachus of Alabama and Richard Baker of Louisiana. Two other Republicans, David Dreier of California and Deborah Pryce of Ohio, have outside chances to succeed Mr. Oxley.

There has been no public airing of the qualities each member would bring to the post. It is considered bad form for lawmakers to talk publicly about campaigns for committee chairmanships, particularly before an election that could decide control of Congress.

"The chairmanship of the committee will not be scheduled for a vote until after the election of the next Congress," Mr. Bachus said in a statement. "Until that time, my focus will be on legislative duties and maintaining our majority."

Republican committee chairmanships are doled out by a special panel made up of party leaders and representatives of different regions of the country. Committee members have no formula, but generally make decisions based on seniority, party loyalty, fund-raising, personality and effectiveness.

"The race for the [Financial Services] committee chairmanship will likely be the most closely contested of all the full committees," says Rick Lazio, a former Republican member of the panel who now works for J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. "Both candidates have their strengths and have had positions of leadership in the committee. It's still up in the air."

Mr. Baker, in his 10th term, is a former real-estate agent and broker who advocates overhauling Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, the two congressionally chartered companies that provide funding for home mortgages. More policy wonk than backslapper, he doesn't have many close friends among lawmakers, but wins praise for his knowledge of financial markets.

Mr. Bachus, a former attorney, has less seniority than Mr. Baker and would have scant chance of leapfrogging him but for his fund-raising abilities and political savvy. Earlier this year, Mr. Bachus backed Rep. John Boehner in his successful race for majority leader over Rep. Roy Blunt. He is a supporter of community banks and this year worked with Democrats on legislation to crack down on predatory lending.

Mr. Baker and Mr. Bachus split on a number of financial-services issues. Wells Fargo & Co., Wachovia Corp., Bank of America Corp. and other large banks could get a lift from Mr. Baker's plan to allow banks to compete with real-estate agents in the housing market.

Mr. Bachus opposes the idea and is backed by real-estate agents, who have donated almost $97,000 to him. That is twice as much as the industry has contributed to Mr. Baker, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group that tracks campaign-finance data.

The banking-committee fight is one of several contests to replace panel chairmen who are departing. Due to a combination of retirements and a six-year term limit on chairmanship tenures, Republicans must pick leaders for the Budget, Science, Transportation and Infrastructure, Judiciary, International Relations and Ways and Means committees.

Just a few races are competitive. Rep. Jim McCrery (R., La.), for example, is considered such a favorite to head the Ways and Means Committee that he has donated $10,000 to help his would-be rival Rep. Clay Shaw (R., Fla.) win a tight re-election campaign.

A Democratic takeover would produce wholesale changes at top committee posts. Among Democrats, seniority is a primary factor in determining committee chairmanships. Michigan Reps. John Conyers and John Dingell would take over the Judiciary Committee and Energy and Commerce panel, respectively. California Reps. Henry Waxman and George Miller would inherit the Government Reform Committee and the Education and Workforce panel. Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin would head the Appropriations Committee and Mr. Frank would climb to the helm of the Financial Services Committee.

The new Democratic chairmen would bring a more liberal agenda to Capitol Hill after 12 years of Republican control. Mr. Waxman has made it clear that he would use the Government Reform Committee's subpoena power to investigate the Bush administration. Mr. Miller and Mr. Obey likely would team up to try to increase spending on public education and teacher salaries.

If Mr. Frank became chairman of Financial Services he says his top priority would be creating more affordable housing. He says he already has spoken to Mr. Rangel at the tax-writing committee about lifting tax credits for low-income housing.

Mr. Frank also would like to curb predatory lending, investigate mortgage-pricing differences among minority groups and focus on consumer-protection issues.

Mr. Frank generally supported Mr. Oxley's legislation to overhaul Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Mr. Frank says he would continue to press for the legislation.

Mr. Frank says the biggest shift in priorities under his tenure would be in public housing. "We will want to get back into the business of building subsidized housing," Mr. Frank says.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Probe Of Veco, Lawmakers Led By Justice Dept. (ADN)

By Richard Mauer, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The federal influence-buying case that erupted with fury 10 days ago with searches of a half-dozen Alaska legislative offices is being managed independently of the Alaska U.S. Attorney's office, a U.S. Justice Department official said Monday.

"The whole office is recused," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said.

Instead, the wide-ranging investigation is being overseen by attorneys from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, Sierra said.

The Public Integrity Section has about 25 attorneys, a team that often lives out of suitcases in pursuit of corruption cases as far away as Guam. They've prosecuted petty thefts by sheriff's deputies, the massive frauds of Enron and the high-profile corruption case of Jack Abramoff.

Sierra wouldn't say why the Alaska office wasn't allowed to participate in the case or how many lawyers from Washington were assigned to it. But the case is even off-limits to Nelson Cohen, the new U.S. Attorney for Alaska who just arrived last month from Pittsburgh, he said.

Sierra said it's not unusual that the local U.S. Attorney's office will recuse itself from a sensitive corruption case and wall off its legal, public relations and even clerical staffs from the investigation and prosecutions. Sometimes one or two assistant U.S. attorneys might still be assigned to work with the Public Integrity attorneys, but Sierra said he didn't know if that was the case in Alaska.

FBI agents from Alaska are lead investigators, working the case alongside the prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section, said Eric Gonzalez, spokesman for the FBI in Alaska.

The investigation is being run out of the FBI building on East Sixth Avenue in downtown Anchorage.

If it's anything like the Enron case, Sierra said, the investigation has taken over a sizeable chunk of the FBI building.

Dozens of extra FBI agents were brought in from Outside to execute about two dozen search warrants when the first raids started at legislative offices and elsewhere on Aug. 31. After the initial round of searches and interviews, the Outside agents were sent home, Gonzalez said.

Authorities won't release any particulars, including how many FBI agents remain on the case, Gonzalez said. Other agencies also are involved, including the IRS.

While officials say little, the warrants target the relationships between legislators and the oil-field service and construction company Veco. The company, which has long been generous with campaign donations at the state and federal levels and lobbying in Juneau, has gone so far as to hire sitting legislators, including Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, the son of Alaska's powerful U.S. senator, Ted Stevens. In disclosures he was required to file as a legislator, Ben Stevens has reported that Veco paid him $252,000 over the last five years to serve as a consultant, including $57,000 in 2005. Neither Stevens nor Veco has described what he did for the money. Stevens is one of six lawmakers whose offices were searched Aug. 31.

Perhaps a year ago, the FBI began collecting campaign and other publicly available financial disclosure records on selected legislators, said Brooke Miles, executive director of the Alaska Public Offices Commission. As she remembers it, agents then came back at the beginning of this year for campaign reports and financial disclosure records on all legislators.

Created in 1976, the Public Integrity Section has a number of jurisdictions. It investigates election fraud, misconduct by federal judges, and corruption of elected officials.

U.S Attorney offices prosecute corruption cases, too. The Alaska office prosecuted a dozen officials, lobbyists and businessmen in a massive kickback scandal in the North Slope Borough in the 1980s. But the position of U.S. attorney is a political appointment headquartered in a local jurisdiction, so the Justice Department will sometimes assume control over cases involving powerful local figures.

"Public corruption cases tend to raise unique problems of public perception that are generally absent in more routine criminal cases," the Public Integrity Section wrote in its 2004 report to Congress, explaining why U.S. Attorney's offices are sometimes recused.

"An investigation of alleged corruption by a government official, whether at the federal, state, or local level, or someone associated with such officials, always has the potential to be high-profile, simply because its focus is on the conduct of a public official. In addition, these cases are often politically sensitive, because their ultimate targets tend to be politicians or government officials appointed by politicians. A successful public corruption prosecution requires both the appearance and the reality of fairness and impartiality."

Moses Got Campaign Cash From VECO Before Casting Deciding Vote (AP)

By Matt Volz, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

JUNEAU, Alaska (AP) - Days before an ailing Rep. Carl Moses flew from Anchorage to cast the deciding vote on a contentious oil and gas tax bill, six VECO Corp. executives contributed $3,000 to the Unalaska Democrat's campaign.

Four of the six executives have been linked to an FBI investigation that resulted in raids of six legislators' offices on Aug. 31.

Moses, contacted Monday in Unalaska, denies the VECO campaign contributions had anything to do with his vote and his name has not previously been connected with the FBI raids.

"Don't worry, I'm squeaky clean," Moses said. "I don't accept contributions on that basis."

One of the 20 search warrants executed in the FBI raids links the investigation to the tax bill passed last month by the Legislature and the draft natural gas pipeline contract proposed by Gov. Frank Murkowski and BP PLC, Exxon Mobil Corp. and ConocoPhillips.

The warrant called for seizure of documents concerning any payment, contracts, agreements, gifts or employment provided by VECO or company executives Bill Allen, Rick Smith, Peter Leathard and Roger Chan.

On Aug. 2, Allen, Smith, Leathard, Chan and VECO personnel manager James Slack each contributed $500 to Moses' campaign, according to Alaska Public Office Commission records. Then on Aug. 7, Thomas Corkran, VECO's chief information officer, donated $500 more.

VECO, an oil field services company and a major political player in Alaska, typically supports Republican candidates. The contributions to Moses are among the only donations company executives have given to a Democrat this election year.

Moses faced his stiffest competition in years in a primary election that still hasn't been decided. The outcome of the race between him and Bryce Edwards is still too close to call and appears headed toward a mandatory recount by the Division of Elections.

VECO and Allen, the company's chief executive, supported the net-profits production tax plan proposed by Murkowski, but it faced major opposition in the House of Representatives. Twice before, the tax plan had been rejected. Some lawmakers disliked the structure of a tax based on company profits, some thought the tax rate was too low and others thought it was too high.

On Aug. 10, the bill seemed doomed again. It was the final day of the second special session, when the House failed by a single vote to gather the 21 votes needed to pass the measure. The only legislator missing was Moses, who was recuperating in Anchorage from a pinched nerve.

A lengthy recess was called while Moses boarded a plane and flew to Juneau. That night, the House reconvened and passed the bill. The final vote was 26-14, with several legislators changing to "yes" votes after realizing the matter had been decided.

Moses said he had a big stake in that vote: Funding for a new school in New Stuyahok and millions in power cost equalization fund money was tied to passage of the production tax bill.

With the exception of Rep. Richard Foster, D-Nome, all members of the Democrat-heavy House Bush caucus voted for the measure, with the rural fuel cost subsidy a major incentive.

Moses said he does not plan to return the VECO executives' campaign contributions, as other candidates have already done.

"I accepted it in good faith, and I got contributions from all over the place," he said.

Meanwhile, a retiring legislator who received tens of thousands of dollars in consulting fees from VECO has not responded to reporters' inquiries about those fees for nearly two weeks.

Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, received $30,000 in consulting fees from VECO between 2003 and 2005, according to APOC filings.

Anderson and Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, are the only two legislators to report consulting fees from VECO in that time.

Stevens, the son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, has reported making $252,000 from the company since 2001.

Stevens' office was one of the six raided; Anderson's was not.

A review of Anderson's financial disclosures filed with APOC show that Anderson was paid consulting fees on three occasions by VECO totaling $30,000: "Election/proposition research;" "Consultation on Russian business endeavor;" and "Consulting on community council and government affairs."

Legislators are not required to detail the work they do for their consulting fees.

DOJ_NMG_0061824

Anderson's wife, Republican Rep. Lesil McGuire of Anchorage, is running for the Senate seat Stevens is vacating.

Anderson has not returned messages left by phone and e-mail since the raids took place. A legislative aide to McGuire said Monday that McGuire and Anderson were on vacation out of state and could not be reached for comment. Stevens also has not returned repeated calls.

Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said he could neither confirm nor deny Anderson and Moses are part of the FBI investigation.

"We're not confirming any details of the investigation at this point," Sierra said.

VECO has largely been silent on the investigation. The company's only public statement came last week in a press release denying the company had participated in anything improper or illegal.

Leading Developer Portrayed As 'Thief' Or 'Visionary' (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Despite his reputation as a maverick wheeler-dealer whose projects helped revitalize the city, prominent developer Douglas Jemal was "little more than a common thief," prosecutors said yesterday at the start of his trial on bribery and fraud charges.

Government lawyers said Jemal and his company, Douglas Development Corp., used bribes and fraudulent documents to keep an overextended real estate empire alive in the years before the boom in District property prices.

Jemal, his son Norman, who is the company's vice president, and leasing director Blake Esherick went on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington yesterday. They are charged with conspiring to bribe a former D.C. government official with cash, fine meals, trips to Las Vegas and a Rolex in exchange for "sweetheart" contracts with the city. Prosecutors said Jemal's company received inflated profits for leasing property to the city from 2001 to 2004.

All three defendants have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges in a trial that could last up to six weeks. The defense painted Jemal, 63, as a "visionary," and previously said that its witnesses could include Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and Washington Wizards' owner Abe Pollin, who built a sports arena in an area of downtown that is home to many of Jemal's retail properties.

Most of the allegations involve dealings with Michael A. Lorusso, a former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management. Lorusso, who was fired from his city job in January 2003, pleaded guilty to bribery and agreed to aid prosecutors. Lorusso, who is expected to be the key witness in the trial, faces a prison term of 57 to 71 months under federal sentencing guidelines, but prosecutors have said they could seek less time depending on the value of his cooperation.

In his opening statement to the jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark H. Dubester twice mentioned Lorusso's guilty plea to the jury. That drew calls for a mistrial from Jemal's defense attorney, Reid H. Weingarten, who argued that Dubester was trying to taint Jemal on the basis of Lorusso's guilt.

U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina rejected the motion for a mistrial but agreed to tell jurors that they should not take Lorusso's guilty plea to mean that Jemal also is guilty.

The government's case, as outlined by Dubester, will re-create for the jury the economic circumstances that Jemal and his company were facing in 2001. It was a time, Dubester said, when it was unknown whether the developer's numerous bets on the city's rebirth would pay off.

Dubester said he will take the jury through the company's financial records to show that the firm -- saddled with mortgages on empty office buildings and unleased properties -- was overextended in 2001.

Checks to contractors would sit in a pile in the company's accounting department for months, waiting for cash deposits that would allow them to be mailed, the prosecutor said, and some mailed checks did not have the funds to back them up. In 2001, the company racked up $100,000 worth of bank fees for insufficient funds, Dubester told the jury.

It was in this context that on April 26, 2001, Lorusso became involved with the Jemals. Lorusso allowed the developer to pick up the check for a dinner at the Capital Grille, a favorite place in Northwest Washington for Jemal to conduct business. Jemal sized up Lorusso as someone who could help him get favorable deals, Dubester said.

Soon, the Jemals were partying with Lorusso in Las Vegas, and Lorusso was helping the company get leases with the city for properties, including a building at 77 P St. NW and a parcel in Prince George's County that the city used as an impound lot.

While accusing Norman Jemal of paying for Lorusso's Rolex, and Esherick of writing phony documents, Dubester made it clear that he viewed Douglas Jemal as the architect of the alleged conspiracy.

"It was motivated by greed, fueled by ambition and given life in the culture of Doug Jemal's businesses," Dubester said.

Defense attorneys said that the Jemals and Esherick have not violated any laws, but that they were guilty of believing that Lorusso was their friend.

DOJ_NMG_0061825

In their opening statements, defense attorneys said Jemal was committed to the city's economic rebirth and worked hard to accommodate the District government's wishes.

They said the deal to put city agencies in 77 P St. NW was worked out with Lorusso's predecessor and that the city desperately needed a new impound lot. And Lorusso turned down many other real estate deals proposed by the Jemals, the defense contended.

Because Lorusso was a friend of the Jemals and Esherick, there was nothing wrong with buying him gifts, as long as it was not in return for public actions, the defense attorneys said. Lorusso returned his friends' generosity by picking up restaurant checks and giving the Jemals fancy sunglasses. And the trips to Las Vegas that prosecutors highlighted were actually business trips to attend conferences, the defense said, and Lorusso paid his own airfare.

Defense attorneys told the jury yesterday that the Jemals and Esherick were being set up by Lorusso.

"Make no mistake about why you are here," said Michelle Roberts, defense attorney for Normal Jemal. "Two words, one man: Michael Lorusso."

Gotti's Got Write Stuff (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 12, 2006

John A. (Junior) Gotti probably could have written an autobiography about growing up around his father's Little Italy social club called "And To Think That I Saw it on Mulberry Street."

But since Dr. Seuss already used that title, the mob scion had to look elsewhere for inspiration to pen a children's book.

Trying to soften their client's image, defense attorneys yesterday told jurors that the mobster - along with a cellmate-turned-illustrator - penned a kiddie book about a lovable pint-sized tiger and a fierce dragon.

Gotti decided to write "The Children of Shaolin Forest," after reading about the Jackson children of New Jersey who had been starved by their adoptive parents.

The book's illustrator, Brian Lindemann, testified at Gotti's latest racketeering trial that John (Dapper Don) Gotti's son advised him to give up the criminal life.

"He pretty much told me to stay away from a lot of idiots on the compound because they'll end up dragging you down with them," said Lindemann, 31, a stickup man and wanna-be mobster who ran with a Queens-based robbery gang dubbed the Giannini Crew.

Defense attorneys gave jurors a peek at pages from the 2004 book yesterday as they argued that he turned a page of his own - renouncing the Mafia life before going to prison in 1999.

On one page, a cute tiger locked in a cage weeps at the site of a steaming cauldron that burns before him.

Another shows a fierce green-and-red dragon. And, finally, there's the same little tiger smiling in a mushroom field warmed by a smiling sun.

But prosecutor Miriam Rocah showed Lindemann etchings found in his phone book in 2004, which didn't include any of the cuddly denizens of Shaolin Forest. In one, Lindemann drew a police badge beside the words "F--- the Police."

Meanwhile, the son of the government's star witness - mob turncoat Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo - disputed witness tampering charges against Gotti.

Prosecutors contend Gotti summoned DiLeonardo's then-teenage son to Ray Brook Prison in February 2003 to get him to persuade his father not to testify against the mob boss.

Michael Ricci, who changed his name from DiLeonardo, said he and Gotti talked about "school, girls and sports. How I was doing."

Ricci, 20, said he made the jailhouse visit after finding out his father was going to cooperate with the feds, meaning he probably wouldn't see him again. He said he was also angry after learning his dad had fathered a child out of wedlock.

Ricci has not seen his father since DiLeonardo entered the federal witness protection program.

"I was very upset, a lot of things running through my mind," Ricci said. "I didn't want people to know who I was in the paper. ... I wanted to live a normal life."

Ex-Schrenko Aides Get 8 Years Each Former State Schools Chief Reports To Federal Prison (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 12, 2006

Linda Schrenko reported to federal prison Monday afternoon while her former lover and deputy superintendent, Merle Temple, was sentenced to eight years and one month in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0061826

Another conspirator in the case, Alpharetta computer executive A. Stephen Botes, received an identical sentence to Temple: eight years and one month.

The three were charged as part of a scheme to defraud the government of $600,000 in federal funds earmarked for deaf and honors students.

Schrenko, the former state school superintendent, was sentenced to eight years, and will serve her time in a women's prison in Tallahasee, Florida.

Temple, who has 45 days to report to prison, will fulfill his sentence at a facility in Edgefield, SC, which is close to where he lives.

Temple, 58, of Evans, Ga., told the court he will spend the rest of his life "making spiritual restitution" for his actions.

"I would ask people to look at the total picture of my life and the good I've tried to do, versus what we see here today," he told reporters after the sentencing Monday. "I am just going to press on."

Temple plead guilty in January 2005 to charges of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud in exchange for testifying against Schrenko. Schrenko used some of the money to help finance her unsuccessful campaign for governor and for a $9,300 face lift.

Botes was found guilty of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud charges conviction earlier this year.

Georgia's Ex-top Educator Reports To Prison; Aides Sentenced (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

ATLANTA -- As former Georgia schools superintendent Linda Schrenko began serving an eight-year federal prison sentence Monday, her top aide was handed a slightly longer sentence for helping her in an embezzlement plot.

Schrenko reported to prison Monday afternoon to begin serving a sentence for embezzling about $600,000 in federal education money that funded, in part, a failed 2002 campaign for governor and a face lift.

Merle Temple, Schrenko's former campaign manager and ex-lover, was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Clarence Cooper to eight years and one month in prison Monday. He had pleaded guilty in January 2005 to charges of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud.

Another Schrenko ally, computer firm owner Stephan Botes, was sentenced later Monday to eight years and one month in prison for his role in the embezzlement plot. He also is to pay $382,394 in restitution.

His attorney, Brian Steel, said he plans to appeal the sentence.

Temple, 58, of Evans, Ga., told the court he will spend the rest of his life "making spiritual restitution" for his actions.

"I would ask people to look at the total picture of my life and the good I've tried to do, versus what we see here today," he told reporters after the sentencing. "I am just going to press on."

Temple's attorney, John T. Garcia, argued for a lesser sentence because the former aide takes care of his ill wife, who has diabetes and has suffered multiple strokes and several heart attacks. Garcia blamed Temple's actions with Schrenko in part on his obsessive compulsive disorder, and said Temple had lived an exemplary life up until his work with Schrenko.

Federal prosecutor Russell Vineyard argued for a full sentence for Temple, calling his actions "egregious."

"He wanted to be the power behind the throne if Ms. Schrenko was elected," Vineyard said.

Temple told the judge he hopes to serve his time in a federal prison in Edgefield, S.C., about 45 minutes from his house in Evans. He has already paid the $199,500 he owes in restitution.

Botes, who pleaded not guilty to charges that he helped Schrenko steal $614,000 in federal money, continued to maintain his innocence during Monday's hearing, saying he is only guilty of trusting the wrong people.

"I did not control what Linda Schrenko did inside the Department of Education," he told the judge.

Schrenko will spend the next eight years in Tallahassee's Federal Correctional Institution, a minimum-security prison where she'll live in college dorm-style cells and earn 12 cents an hour as an orderly, plumber or other maintenance job.

Temple had been expected to testify against Schrenko as part of his plea agreement.

But in the middle of Schrenko's May trial, she struck a plea deal in exchange for testifying against her co-defendants.

The deal led to the imprisonment of Temple, who was charged with obstruction of justice on suspicion of leaking information to her lawyers. And it was key in the conviction of Botes, who was found guilty of conspiracy, theft of federal funds and wire fraud charges conviction.

The state's former top educator pleaded guilty in May to charges of embezzling about $600,000 meant for Georgia students. In court, witnesses and prosecutors said she asked friends and family members _ including the staffers in her daughter's dental practice _ to endorse a batch of $590 checks that were later diverted to her campaign.

Schrenko, 56, an educator from suburban Augusta, made history in 1994 when she became the first woman elected to a statewide, nonjudicial post in Georgia. She also was one of the first Republicans elected to such an office in a state that had been dominated by Democrats since Reconstruction.

She was re-elected in 1998, but her bid to unseat Democrat Gov. Roy Barnes fell short when she lost the Republican primary to Sonny Perdue, a state senator who went on to beat Barnes.

Her November 2004 indictment made Schrenko the state's highest-ranking elected official in decades to face such serious charges. She was indicted on 22 counts of money laundering and 18 other counts ranging from conspiracy to fraud, with each count carrying up to 20 years in prison.

Botes and Temple are the last of Schrenko's aides to be sentenced in the case.

Former campaign manager Richard Leonard, 44, of Augusta, Ga., was sentenced Aug. 24 to one year of probation and a fine of $3,000 for trying to dissuade a witness from providing truthful testimony against Schrenko.

Aide Miller E. Finley, 64, of Evans, Ga., was sentenced July 21 to three years' probation and a $4,000 fine for making false statements to federal agents.

Prosecutors Say Trash Pickup Favors Behind Alleged State Payroll Scam (BVND)

By Jan Dennis

The Belleville News Democrat, September 12, 2006

PEORIA, Ill. - A former high-ranking Illinois secretary of state official helped three janitors pocket more than $150,000 in state pay for work they didn't do in exchange for special treatment by city trash collectors in his Springfield neighborhood, prosecutors said Monday.

Cecil Turner received no financial kickbacks in the alleged ghost payroll scheme, U.S. District Attorney Patrick Chesley said during opening statements in Turner's trial in federal court in Peoria.

Instead, Chesley alleged Turner aided in the scheme because one of the janitors - Dana Dinora - also worked for Springfield's public works department, arranging quick pick ups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors.

Defense attorney Michael Metnick told jurors Turner was unaware of the alleged five-year payroll scam he maintains was orchestrated by Dinora, one of three former janitors who pleaded guilty in the scheme and agreed to cooperate in the case against Turner.

Turner, 59, the former director of the secretary of state's physical services division, is charged with four counts of wire fraud that allege he helped the janitors hide the scheme, along with two counts of lying to investigators. He faces up to 20 years in prison on each wire fraud count and up to five years in prison on each count of lying to investigators if convicted.

Metnick told jurors that special trash pickups in Turner's neighborhood were arranged by another city employee, not Dinora, and are common for people with political connections. Turner is vice chairman of the Sangamon County Democratic Party and his wife, Doris, is a Sangamon County Board member.

"While none of us like it, it wasn't done because of Dana Dinora. It was done because of Cecil Turner," Metnick said.

Metnick called Dinora a "con man" with a long record of abusing time off who manipulated Turner after he was appointed to the $98,000-a-year job in 1999.

Chesley told jurors that Turner helped cover for the janitors, yelling at supervisors who questioned unfinished work and ordering them to "leave those guys alone."

"The janitors could not have done it without Cecil Turner. That's what the evidence is going to show," Chesley said.

The three janitors pleaded guilty last month in a scheme prosecutors allege handed them full pay for working only a fraction of their assigned hours from 1999 to August 2005. Dinora, 53, of Springfield, David Medvesek, 57, of Springfield, and Steven Boyce, 58, of Chatham, each face up to 20 years in prison when sentenced Dec. 21.

Chesley said the scheme started slowly, but that Dinora was barely working by 2004 and the other janitors were putting in only half their assigned hours. He said the janitors developed various methods to cover their absences, including leaving notes for other workers that said they were working elsewhere.

Turner and the janitors were fired after an investigation uncovered the scheme last year. Turner was among 20 department heads in the secretary of state's office, overseeing maintenance and janitorial services in state offices, including the Capitol building.

Secretary of State Jesse White has said he is angry the men broke the public's trust but said their firings should signal to employees and the public that corruption will not be tolerated in his office.

DOJ_NMG_0061828

His Republican opponent, state Sen. Dan Rutherford, charged Monday that White set the stage for the alleged scam when his office hired Turner despite knowing of his 1976 conviction in a scheme in which veterans' benefit checks were stolen from the postal service.

Rutherford also alleged that White aided the scheme six years ago through moves within the office that he says made doling out jobs, not weeding out corruption, a priority.

"I believe that if Jesse White had been attentive and not been asleep at the wheel that this trial today could have been prevented," Rutherford said during a news conference across the street from the Peoria courthouse.

David Drucker, a spokesman for White's re-election campaign, said White hired Turner despite his criminal conviction because "it happened almost 30 years ago and he had turned his life around."

Drucker also said White's internal investigators uncovered the alleged scam and accused Rutherford of using the trial to bolster his campaign.

"The fact that he's going back six years on this thing is indicative that his campaign is in real trouble," Drucker said.

Turner's trial, which attorneys say could last a week or more, resumes Tuesday morning.

2 Cuban Activists Plead Guilty To Weapons Charge (FLSUNSEN/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 12, 2006

MIAMI -- A prominent Cuban exile who virulently opposes the communist government of President Fidel Castro pleaded guilty Monday to weapons charges arising from seizures last year of machine guns, a grenade launcher and thousands of rounds of ammunition.

Santiago Alvarez, 64, a wealthy developer and key benefactor of jailed Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles, pleaded guilty to a single criminal conspiracy charge. A longtime employee of Alvarez's, 64-year-old Osvaldo Mitat, also pleaded guilty.

Their pleas came a day before jury selection was scheduled to begin for a trial before a federal judge in Fort Lauderdale. Alvarez and Mitat had both faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted on the original six-count indictment.

Under the plea deal, each now face up to five years behind bars when they are sentenced by U.S. District Judge James Cohn on Nov. 14.

``I think both sides believe it's a just result," said Alvarez attorney Kendall Coffey. ``It recognizes that they are enemies of Castro, not the United States. But even patriots are accountable."

Prosecutors did not immediately comment on the plea agreement.

Alvarez is a longtime associate of Posada, a former CIA operative who is accused by the Cuban and Venezuelan governments with masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner in which 73 people died. Alvarez arranged for travel documents for Posada and helped him come out of hiding in Miami in May 2005, even staging a press conference for the Cuban militant.

Posada, 78, is now in U.S. immigration custody in Texas and has been ordered deported from the United States, but no country has been willing to accept him. Posada's lawyers argue that he should be released to his family in Miami.

Alvarez and Mitat were arrested in November after an informant tipped the FBI that a large cooler full of military-style weapons was being transported from apartments in Broward County owned by Alvarez to Mitat in Miami.

Later, investigators discovered more weaponry and ammunition at the apartment complexes and on Guinchos Cay, Bahamas, an island about 12 miles from Cuba that was linked to Alvarez. That island arsenal included grenades, grenade launchers and about five pounds of powerful C-4 plastic explosives.

Prosecutors had said those discoveries showed that Alvarez was actively involved in procuring weapons for an attempt by some Cuban exiles in Miami to topple the Castro government by force.

Documents discovered at Alvarez's office showed that he financially supported Posada during his trial and imprisonment for an alleged Castro assassination attempt in Panama in 2000. Posada was later pardoned by Panama's president.

Florida: Cuban Exiles Avoid Trial With Plea (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Two Cuban exiles who have vehemently opposed Fidel Castro will avoid a trial on weapons charges after each pleaded guilty to a single criminal conspiracy charge. The men, Santiago Alvarez, 65, and Osvaldo Mitat, 64, were scheduled for trial this week and would have faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted. But prosecutors reduced the charges in a last-minute plea deal, and the men now face a maximum sentence of five years. The men were arrested last year after the Federal Bureau of

Two Anti-Castro Activists Plead Guilty To Weapons Conspiracy (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, September 12, 2006

Two elderly anti-Castro activists facing weapons charges pleaded guilty Monday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale to one count of conspiracy to possess illegal weapons, which carries a five-year maximum prison penalty. The men face sentencing Nov. 14.

Santiago Alvarez, 65, and his friend Osvaldo Mitat, 64, went before U.S. District Judge James Cohn this afternoon after prosecutors reduced charges. The men were facing a maximum of 20 years imprisonment because initial charges included possession of illegal weapons, in addition to conspiracy.

Machine guns, firearms, a silencer with an obliterated serial number and a grenade launcher were among the weapons the men were accused of stashing in a Lauderhill apartment complex owned by Alvarez.

The conspiracy dated back to November 2004, prosecutors said. The men were arrested a year later. Alvarez helped Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles emerge from hiding in May 2005 before Posada's arrest for entering the country illegally. Posada is still in federal custody in Texas.

At least two dozen family members and friends of Alvarez and Mitat, who worked for Alvarez, were present at today's hearing.

"We're just happy it's over," Santiago Alvarez Jr. said about his father's case.

Francisco "Pepe" Hernandez, of the Cuban American National Foundation, said of Alvarez's decision to plead guilty: ``He didn't have any choice after the judge ruled on the insistence of the government bringing this trial in Broward."

"They realized their chances were slim," Hernandez said, ``and they wanted to spare the community this commotion."

Jose Basulto of Brothers to the Rescue said, ``George Washington would have been proud of these two men as patriots."

Cohn last week ruled that the men could get a fair trial in Broward County. Their attorneys argued that the strikingly different demographics between Miami-Dade and Broward should allow a two-county jury in federal court in Fort Lauderdale.

2 Cuban Exiles Accept Plea Deal (FLSUNSEN)

In a last-minute plea deal, prominent Cuban exile and local real estate developer Santiago Alvarez admitted Monday he illegally stashed weapons at a Broward County apartment complex and attempted to move them after federal authorities appeared at his office with a search warrant.

Alvarez and co-defendant Osvaldo Mitat each pleaded guilty in Fort Lauderdale federal court to a single conspiracy charge stemming from the Nov. 18 seizure of a white fishing cooler containing machine guns, numerous firearms with serial numbers removed, an unregistered silencer and a grenade launcher.

Prosecutors contended Alvarez, 65, and Mitat, 64, both staunchly anti-Castro Cuban exiles, maintained caches of weapons, including one in the Bahamas, to use in attacks on Cuba. The agreement specifies that the maximum prison term Alvarez and Mitat can receive is five years, far less than they could have received had they been convicted at trial. U.S. District Judge James Cohn set sentencing for Nov. 14.

One longtime friend and supporter said Monday's guilty pleas marked a "shameful day for Cuban patriots."

According to a factual summary of the case agreed to Monday by both sides: Federal agents executed a search warrant on Alvarez's Hialeah office Nov. 18, after intercepting a parcel addressed to Alvarez containing counterfeit Guatemalan identification documents. As the search continued, Alvarez asked an employee to transport a cooler containing weapons from a Lauderhill apartment complex to a location in Miami, where Mitat would pick it up.

The employee, who was an FBI informant, tipped off agents to the exchange. Authorities arrested Mitat as he took possession of the weapons and arrested Alvarez later.

Magistrate Rules In Cuban Militant's Favor In Bid To Leave Jail (AP)

By ALICIA A. CALDWELL

AP, September 12, 2006

EL PASO, Texas -- A federal magistrate judge has agreed that an anti-Castro Cuban militant should be able to leave a federal immigration jail while he waits to be deported.

DOJ_NMG_0061830

U.S. Magistrate Judge Norbert Garney issued a 23-page written ruling Monday that Luis Posada Carriles should be set free from the El Paso immigration detention center where he has been held since his arrest on immigration charges last year, Posada's El Paso lawyer, Felipe D.J. Millan said Monday.

Millan said the ruling will now go to a federal district judge. If Garney's ruling is upheld, which Millan believes will happen, he anticipates that Posada could be set free in about 30 days.

"As far as we're concerned, we're on the right track," Millan said of the favorable ruling.

A Department of Justice spokesman said Monday evening that the agency is reviewing the decision.

The 78-year-old Cuba native and naturalized Venezuelan citizen is wanted in Venezuela on charges that he plotted the deadly 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner from Caracas.

Eric Wingerter, a Venezuelan government spokesman in Washington, said Garney's ruling "is exactly the wrong message to be sending" in time of an increased focused on fighting terrorism.

"We're talking about a guy who blew up an airplane that was holding the most innocent people imaginable," Wingerter said. "If that is not the definition of a terrorist, I don't know what is."

Wingerter said the date of the ruling, the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, was "particularly insulting to the families of the victims.

"If we are serious about fighting terrorism then we need to prosecute all terrorists, not just those opposed to U.S. foreign policy."

Posada was arrested in Miami last year on charges that he illegally crossed into Texas from Mexico.

Last year an immigration judge ruled that Posada should be deported but said he could not be sent to Cuba or Venezuela because of the fear that he could be tortured.

Wingerter said that ruling "is not grounded in facts" and lawyers for the Venezuelan government are continuing efforts to have Posada sent back to face trial

During a brief hearing in federal court last month, Posada asked Garney to let him return to Miami, where his wife and children live, until the U.S. government can find another country to send him to.

Federal authorities have been trying since October to find a country that would accept Posada. Canada, Guatemala, Mexico, Costa Rica and El Salvador have all rejected formal requests.

Posada, a former CIA operative and U.S. Army soldier, has applied for U.S. citizenship. That application is pending, Millan said.

8th Circuit Grapples With Sentencing Guidelines (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 12, 2006

An 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge warned recently that the appellate court may be creating unconstitutional sentencing precedents that violate the spirit of last year's Supreme Court decision in U.S. v. Booker, which gave judges discretion to shape reasonable sentences.

Nationally, circuits have been grappling with how much leeway to give trial judges in fashioning sentences that are either more or less lenient than the traditional guideline range established by the U.S. Sentencing Commission.

The 8th Circuit overturned the 11-year prison term for repeat offender Jeffrey A. McDonald in a methamphetamine case because it was less than half the recommended sentencing guideline range of 22 to 27 years and just one year more than the law's minimum limit.

The court ordered resentencing without such an extreme variance.

This prompted Judge Kermit E. Bye to point out in dissent that, since the Booker decision, the 8th Circuit has reversed 25 sentences below the guideline range while affirming four, yet affirmed 16 sentences above guideline range while reversing just one.

"If we fail to implement the promise of Booker and do not relinquish greater discretion to experienced district court judges whose proximity to sentencing renders them eminently more qualified to appreciate the subtleties of each case, we will find ourselves the architects of a new -- and equally unconstitutional -- de facto mandatory sentencing system crafted from the ashes of the last," Bye wrote in U.S. v. McDonald, No. 05-1617.

Around the country, six circuits have held that sentences within the guideline range are presumptively reasonable. Only the 2nd Circuit declined to create a per se rule on the reasonableness of any sentence within approved ranges. U.S. v. Crosby, 397 F.3d 103 (2005).

DOJ_NMG_0061831

Last year, in U.S. v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the portion of the Sentencing Reform Act that made guidelines mandatory, holding that it violated a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury, and converting the 20-year-old guideline system to advisory status.

Bye invited the circuit panel to re-examine its recent sentencing rulings, a challenge taken up by Judge Raymond W. Gruender in a lengthy footnote in his majority opinion.

Seven of the 25 lower sentences were vacated because the sentencing judge did not explain the reason, and may be upheld when properly explained, according to Gruender. Another seven were reductions of more than 100 months and five others gave no prison time when guidelines called for one to five years, he said.

McDonald's attorney, Kevin Cmelik, an assistant federal public defender in Davenport, Iowa, said that his office may seek reconsideration by the entire court. "In this circuit there is a debate building over how right we are in our reasonableness doctrine," he said.

Andrew Kahl, chief of the criminal division in the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of Iowa who argued the McDonald appeal said, the "variance wasn't warranted on the facts presented" in the case. "It was a very extreme drop from the sentencing guidelines."

Woman Missing From Carnival Cruise Ship (MH)

By Andrea Robinson

The Miami Herald, September 12, 2006

Federal officials are investigating the reported disappearance of a passenger who had been aboard a cruise ship that returned to the Port of Miami-Dade on Monday.

The 36-year-old Ohio woman was reported missing from Carnival Cruise Lines' Imagination as it was en route from Mexico.

FBI officials in Miami spent Monday morning interviewing family members who were on the ship. They declined to release the woman's identity.

FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said the investigation is just beginning.

"We're looking into it," she said. ``It doesn't look like foul play at this time."

By early afternoon, she said, Miami-Dade police were searching the woman's cabin, looking for possible evidence.

The U.S. Coast Guard also is assisting in the investigation.

Petty Officer Jennifer Johnson, a Coast Guard spokeswoman, said Carnival called the Coast Guard about 9:30 a.m. Monday to report the woman missing. She said a sea search had not yet been ordered.

"We haven't launched any assets yet. We're working together to determine if that's necessary," Johnson said.

The Imagination had left Miami on Thursday on a cruise to Key West and Calica, Mexico.

In a written statement, Carnival officials said a guest aboard the cruise told information desk workers early Monday that the family could not locate the woman, last seen about 1:30 a.m. Sunday after the ship departed Calica.

The International Council of Cruise Lines, an industry lobbying group, said earlier this year there were 24 reports of people missing during cruises between 2003 and last year. Its findings were based on data from 15 cruise lines.

In July, Elizabeth Galeana, 22, of Naples, apparently fell off a cruise ship and drowned. Her body was found off the coast of Italy last month.

In May, Daniel DiPiero, 21, of Canfield, Ohio, fell off a cruise ship headed to the Bahamas after a night of heavy drinking with friends.

This report was supplemented with material from The Associated Press.

MIAMI -- Authorities are investigating the disappearance of an Ohio woman who was reported missing Monday from a Carnival Cruise Lines ship.

The 36-year-old woman, whose identity was not released, had been on a four-day cruise to Key West and Mexico.

The Miami-based cruise line said relatives last saw the woman early Sunday but did not report her missing until Monday, when the ship returned to Miami. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said, however, that she was not aware of any delay in reporting the disappearance.

"It doesn't look like foul play," said Orihuela, whose agency is investigating the case.

The disappearance from the Carnival cruise ship Imagination was the latest missing person case involving a cruise this year.

Elizabeth Galeana, 22, of Naples, Fla., apparently fell off a cruise ship in July and drowned. Her body was found off the coast of Italy last month. In May, Daniel DiPiero, 21, of Canfield, Ohio, fell off a cruise ship to the Bahamas after a night of heavy drinking with friends.

The International Council of Cruise Lines, an industry lobbying group, reported earlier this year that a review of data from 15 lines showed 24 reports of missing people between 2003 to 2005.

One of the highest-profile cases involving a cruise ship disappearance occurred last summer, when George Allen Smith IV, 26, of Greenwich, Conn., vanished from his honeymoon cruise in the Mediterranean after an apparent late night of drinking. Bloodstains were found on a canopy that covers lifeboats. No one has been charged and no body has been found.

Loaded Gun Found In D.C. Court Cellblock (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, September 12, 2006

Investigators were trying to determine how a loaded handgun got into a cellblock inside District of Columbia Superior Court.

A cleaning contractor found the .25-caliber semiautomatic pistol under a wad of paper in a cell toilet Friday, said Steve Conboy, the U.S. marshal for Superior Court.

It was the first time such a serious security breach occurred at the busy downtown courthouse in at least 10 years, authorities said.

Conboy, who oversees courthouse security, said he does not know how the small pistol was smuggled into the building.

"We're not ruling anything out," he said. "At this point everybody's a suspect."

All prisoners are patted down by deputy marshals before being taken into the cellblock -- whether coming from the D.C. jail, police headquarters or off the street.

But only people who are taken into custody in a courtroom after coming in off the street are scanned by a metal detector, Conboy said.

He said it was not unusual for drugs, makeshift weapons and other contraband to turn up, but finding a gun is far more serious because marshals do not carry firearms when working in the cellblocks.

Conboy said many possibilities could explain how the weapon got into the building.

For instance, a person coming to court for a hearing in a criminal case could have sneaked the gun into the courthouse -- despite the presence of metal detectors -- and ditched the gun in the cellblock after being ordered into custody.

Or the gun could have been smuggled in by an employee or a contractor who has access to the cellblocks.

In 1988 and again in 1994, loaded guns were seized in the cellblocks before they could be used to do any damage, Conboy said.

Court officials noted the potential for tragedy if someone had used the gun in an attempt to escape.

"It's everybody's nightmare," said Superior Court Chief Judge Rufus G. King III.

California Opens Inquiry On Breaches Of Computers (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 11 — The California Highway Patrol is investigating outside breaches of a computer system used by aides to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to store downloaded audio files, a spokesman for the patrol said Monday.

In those files, some of which were leaked to The Los Angeles Times, the governor was heard telling Susan Kennedy, his chief of staff, that Cubans and Puerto Ricans were naturally passionate because of their combination of “black blood” and “Latino blood.”

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who is seeking re-election, apologized for the remarks on Friday after they were reported by the newspaper, and he was criticized by his Democratic opponent, Phil Angelides.

“We are looking into the security of the governor’s office computer system,” said Fran Clader, a spokeswoman for the Highway Patrol, which is in charge of policing state facilities.

Ms. Clader would not provide details of the investigation, but a person associated with the governor said that three times over the last week of August and the first week of September a person or group of people gained access to the governor’s staff computers from outside the Sacramento offices. The person spoke on the condition of anonymity because the matter could become the subject of a criminal investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0061833

There are no immediate theories, the person said, as to who is responsible for the breach, first reported by The San Francisco Chronicle.

The governor's legal affairs secretary, Andrea Lynn Hoch, issued a statement Monday night saying that an internal audit had revealed some information about the person involved in the breach and that the information had been turned over to the Highway Patrol.

In remarks to Ms. Kennedy and Gary Delsohn, a speechwriter, Mr. Schwarzenegger praised the legislative style of State Senator Bonnie Garcia, who is of Puerto Rican descent, saying: "I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot. They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

On Friday, Ms. Garcia held a joint news conference with Mr. Schwarzenegger in Los Angeles to announce that his remarks had not bothered her in the least, but the governor said that reading the remarks in the newspaper made him "cringe."

Mr. Delsohn records conversations with the governor to use as reference material when he is writing his speeches, but shares them with a limited number of sources, The Chronicle reported.

Some experts on computer security said the person or people who entered the governor's system most likely knew what they were looking for — rather than randomly stumbling across the files — and could have easily stolen the password needed to get them. They said it was likely that the files were not properly secured.

Sondra Schneider, the chief executive of Security University, a company that provides training in protecting electronic assets, theorized that someone sent an e-mail message that compromised the governor's computer system when it was opened, allowing the sender to steal the password.

"Anyone at any time of any day can do that to anyone," Ms. Schneider said. "It happens every minute of the day."

In the case of the governor's office, Ms. Schneider said: "They just had to know that those audio files were in existence. I don't think someone was fishing around on the site looking for it. They knew it was there and it was made available because it was not secured properly."

The governor's press office referred all calls to the California Highway Patrol. David Garcia, a spokesman for The Los Angeles Times, said in an e-mail message that the paper had not been contacted by the patrol.

Governor Schwarzenegger is in a tough re-election battle. He has been known to get into hot water with his remarks, including once calling a group of legislators "girlie men."

17 Charges Filed In Rape Case Linked To Phoenix Killings (WP/AP)

By Chris Kahn, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

PHOENIX, Sept. 11 -- An ex-convict and construction worker was charged with 17 felony counts Monday in two sexual assaults linked to an investigation of a string of serial killings.

Maricopa County Attorney Andrew P. Thomas said that authorities are not calling Goudeau the "Baseline Killer" and that he has not been named as a suspect in 22 other robberies, rapes and shootings that left eight people dead since August 2005.

For more than a year, a predator known as the Baseline Killer has terrorized the Phoenix area with killings, rapes and robberies. Police continue to try to understand how and whether Goudeau is connected, Thomas said.

The case is one of two serial-predator cases in the Phoenix area in the past year. Police have arrested two men in the other, dubbed the "Serial Shooter" investigation.

At a news conference, Thomas said Arizona's parole board was "naive and misguided" when it granted early release to Goudeau in 2004. Goudeau had eight more years to go on a prison sentence for unrelated assault charges.

"The victims of these brutal crimes deserve justice," he said. "I will do everything in my power to ensure that this defendant never again walks the streets a free man."

Goudeau is accused of attacking two sisters, who were 21 and 23, in September 2005 while they were walking in a park at night. Defense lawyer Corwin A. Townsend said that Goudeau plans to plead not guilty to the charges. And as soon as he gets the chance, Townsend said, he will independently test the DNA evidence that authorities used to arrest Goudeau.

Goudeau's wife also has said he is not guilty.

"This is a huge miscarriage of justice," Wendy Carr said. "And they have an innocent man in prison. This is all a mistake. He shouldn't be in prison for something he didn't do."

The Baseline Killer, so named because the earliest incidents occurred along Baseline Road, has been linked to 23 crimes in the metro area dating to August 2005, including eight killings, 11 sexual assaults of women and girls, and several robberies.

Investigators said they connected the crimes either through forensic evidence or through similarities in the way they were committed.

Government Joining Case Against Drug Maker Over Pricing Allegations (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

BOSTON The federal government is joining in a whistleblower's lawsuit in Boston alleging a drug maker inflated prices for medications and defrauded Medicare and Medicaid.The Justice Department said today it is intervening in the case against Dey (DAU) Incorporated, a California-based U-S affiliate of the German drug maker Merck.The government is joining a complaint by a Florida pharmacy and provider of home drug-infusion services. Ven-a-Care also has brought complaints alleging drug makers defrauded government programs.Officials accuse Dey of reporting prices for drugs that were more than five times the actual sales prices, costing the government more than 500 (m) million dollars in reimbursement.The company had no immediate comment.

Dey Denies Allegations On Drug Pricing (UPI/UPI)

United Press International, September 12, 2006

NAPA, Calif., Sept. 11 (UPI) -- Dey LP, a California drug company, denied Monday that it engaged in wrongdoing in the pricing or marketing of its medicines.

The denials follow word from the U.S. Justice Department earlier in the day that it intervened in a whistleblower suit against Dey.

Justice's complaint alleges that Dey engaged in a scheme to report "fraudulent and inflated" prices for several pharmaceutical products, knowing that federal healthcare programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices.

Dey's denial took aim at the method used by the government in developing its complaint.

"When virtually an entire industry is sued -- as has been the case with the pricing lawsuits that have been filed around the country by dozens of attorneys general -- it indicates that the real issue is not the industry's conduct, but rather the government's own reimbursement system," said John M. Kling, senior vice president-legal at Dey.

N.J. Gets $500K Settlement From GlaxoSmithKline (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

(CBS/AP) WASHINGTON New Jersey prosecutors say the state will get nearly $500,000 dollars from GlaxoSmithKline to settle claims it overcharged the government for two anti-nausea drugs.

New Jersey was reimbursed more than $472,000 from a $149-million national settlement with the Justice Department.

The government said Glaxo engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health care providers based on the manufacturers' prices.

The drugs are typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals and are mainly used to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation.

The Justice Department claims the company charged health care providers less for the drugs, knowing the providers would get to pocket the difference, and would be more likely to prescribe them again.

Glaxo admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement.

Big Tobacco's Promises To Reform Go Up In Smoke (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Tobacco companies have spent years trying to look as if they've reformed their old deceptive ways.

But in just the past month, new information has come to light that strongly suggests they are still willing to sacrifice smokers' lives for profits:

·On Aug. 17, a federal judge found that cigarette-makers marketed and sold their lethal products by deceiving the public about the risks of smoking for five decades. The duplicity and manipulation, she wrote, “continues to this day.”

·Two weeks later, the industry returned to court brazenly seeking a loophole that would allow it to continue the deception overseas.

·On Aug. 29, Massachusetts health officials reported that the average nicotine delivery in scores of cigarette brands had increased by an average of 10% during seven years ending in 2004. Nicotine is the chemical that hooks smokers and keeps them hooked.

DOJ_NMG_0061835

These findings and the industry's own actions suggest that its recent show of good corporate citizenship is as ephemeral as a puff of smoke. They might also prove expensive.

Last month's ruling in the government's landmark tobacco lawsuit could force the industry to remove misleading labels such as “light,” “mild,” and “low tar” from cigarette packs and marketing as of Jan. 1, imposing major new branding and marketing costs. U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler found that the industry used those terms to falsely portray lower-tar cigarettes as somehow less harmful than full-flavor brands to keep smokers from quitting.

It was a profitable ploy while it lasted. In the 1960s, when the surgeon general first warned of smoking's hazards, cigarette-makers answered the challenge with “low-tar” cigarettes. And smokers began to switch.

To satisfy their addiction, they smoked more or inhaled more deeply. In 2001, the National Cancer Institute reported the tragic result: The “net effect of the introduction and mass marketing” of these brands may have been an increase in smoking-related deaths.

Cigarette-makers “marketed and sold their lethal product with zeal, with deception, with a single-minded focus on their financial success, and without regard for the human tragedy or social costs,” Kessler wrote.

Has the industry been chastened by her withering opinion?

Not by a long shot. After the ruling, the defendants sought “clarification” that it did not apply overseas. In essence, they were seeking a green light to mislead people in countries that have been their growth markets.

Massachusetts' nicotine report, meanwhile, raises questions about whether the industry manipulated nicotine levels to hook new smokers. After that report was released, R.J. Reynolds declined comment. Lorillard didn't return calls. Philip Morris disputed the findings and insisted that any variations were the result of the natural process of growing tobacco and making cigarettes.

That's hard to swallow. The industry can “precisely control nicotine delivery levels and provide doses of nicotine sufficient to create and sustain addiction,” Kessler found.

Sadly, the public doesn't know what the industry is doing with nicotine or any ingredient. Thanks to industry lobbying and campaign contributions, there is no meaningful regulation. Never mind that tobacco kills 400,000 Americans a year. Until Congress gets serious about regulating cigarettes, Big Tobacco will have the last word.

Nicotine Study Faulty (USAT)

By Michael A. Farriss

USA Today, September 12, 2006

The Massachusetts Department of Public Health recently issued a report based on data from 1998 to 2004 that concluded “the amount of nicotine that is actually delivered to the smoker's lungs has increased significantly.” The MDPH report cites Philip Morris USA and its Marlboro brand.

The principal reason the MDPH report seems to show an upward trend for Marlboro is because it did not include the earliest reported data from 1997 and the most recent reported data from November 2005. We believe that when one looks at the Marlboro data from all the years reported to the MDPH (1997 through 2005), there are variations in nicotine yields, both up and down, in different brand packings, but there is no trend in nicotine yields, up or down.

For example, the nicotine yield measured in Marlboro Lights King Size Box, the largest selling cigarette brand packing in the country, went up from 1997 to 1998, down in 1999, up in 2000, down in 2001, up in 2002, down in 2003, up in 2004 and down in 2005. The annual variability, both up and down, ranged from 0.01 to 0.11 milligrams of nicotine. These year-to-year variations occur because of the normal processes of growing tobacco and manufacturing cigarettes.

The MDPH report also links the nicotine measured by a smoking machine to nicotine “delivered to the smoker.” Other public health authorities have said one should not link machine smoking to human smoking. For example, the World Health Organization Study Group on Tobacco Regulation concluded that “machine testing protocols are not likely to provide a valid basis for predicting health effects or for making claims about health effects because such protocols do not predict how the products will be used by individuals or at the population level.”

We do not believe that the MDPH's conclusions about the trends in nicotine yields for Marlboro are supported by the 1997 through 2005 data. Even so, there are some fundamental conclusions that Philip Morris USA and the MDPH seem to share: Cigarette smoking is addictive, cigarette smoking causes disease and death, and comprehensive federal Food and Drug Administration regulation of the tobacco industry would be good public health policy.

EEOC Seeks Key Testimony In Sidley Austin Age Discrimination Suit (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 12, 2006

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has moved to compel testimony about recent conversations between Sidley Austin partners and a former financial director who signed a 1999 letter stating that the firm had a mandatory retirement policy.

Sidley has denied having such a policy in the face of an EEOC suit claiming the Chicago-based law firm discriminated against 31 partners on the basis of age when it demoted them to counsel in 1999. The EEOC has claimed the financial director's letter "flatly contradicts" the firm's position.

The letter, dated Oct. 21, 1999, and addressed to the Social Security Administration in Chicago, states that "it is the general policy of Sidley & Austin not to permit a partner of the firm to continue as a partner commencing the first of the year following the year age 65 is reached." The letter is signed by William B. White, financial director.

According to the EEOC motion filed last Tuesday in Chicago federal court, White testified at a July 26 deposition that he believed the letter to be an accurate statement of the firm's retirement policy at the time he signed it. But he also testified that, after conversations earlier this year with Sidley partners William F. Conlon and Theodore N. Miller, he realized the letter did not accurately state firm policy.

The lawyer representing Sidley at the deposition, Michael Conway of Chicago's Grippo & Elden, objected to questions about these conversations on the grounds that they were privileged. The EEOC is seeking to compel White's testimony about them.

"This motion presents the classic example of a Defendant seeking to use the attorney-client and work-product privileges to improperly thwart the Plaintiff's discovery into areas that are potentially damaging for the Defendant," the EEOC claims.

The agency argues the conversations are not privileged because White, who is retired but still works at Sidley on a contract basis, was not seeking legal advice from either Miller, who is vice chairman of the firm's management committee and a member of its executive committee, or Conlon, an executive committee member who acts as the firm's general counsel.

"The fact that Conlon and Miller are lawyers does not render every conversation that they have about this case privileged," the EEOC says in its motion.

Conway did not return a call seeking comment but, according to a partial transcript of the July 26 deposition, he justified his objection on the grounds that the partners "were offering legal advice."

"Miller was acting as counsel to the firm in connection with this matter," said Conway. "Having a conversation with White about activities during the scope of his employment I think is privileged."

The EEOC had moved in June to have counsel separate from the firm appointed for White. The firm quickly agreed to the appointment, but the letter received some media attention at that time, including articles in the Law Journal and the Chicago Tribune.

Represented at his deposition by his new counsel, Michael Hannafan of Chicago's Hannafan & Hannafan, White testified that he first became aware the retirement policy stated in the letter was not correct after he read the June 6 article in the Tribune. That morning, he said, firm executive director Timothy Bergen showed him the newspaper and told him he was a "celebrity." Bergen then told him to call Miller.

White later testified that Conlon also had called him about the letter and its possible inaccuracy in February 2006.

In his deposition, White also said he did not actually write the 1999 letter, only signed it. He said the letter was drafted by now-retired partner Wilbur C. Delp, who asked the financial director to sign the letter "so he could put it in his file in case there was a problem with his self-employment tax on his retirement payments."

In the past, law firms have not worried about EEOC scrutiny of their partner retirement policies because partners have traditionally been considered employers exempt from the protection of federal anti-discrimination laws.

In its suit against Sidley Austin, the EEOC has taken the novel position that the demoted partners were employees because they never voted on firm policy and all decisions, including partner compensation, were made by the firm's self-selecting executive committee.

The suit, which is seeking back pay for the demoted partners, could have far-reaching effect on the profession, as many large law firms have adopted similarly centralized management structures in recent years.

Journalist Remains In Contempt Of Court (FINDLAW/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0061837

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal appeals court on Monday upheld the contempt of court citation against a freelance journalist who is refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigating an anarchists' protest he videotaped.

A federal grand jury subpoenaed Joshua Wolf to acquire the 30 minutes of unpublished material, but he refused and was ordered jailed Aug. 1. He was released a month later as he appealed his case.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Monday that a 1972 Supreme Court precedent requires everyone, including journalists, to appear before grand juries if they have been summoned.

"The Supreme Court has declined to interpret the First Amendment to 'grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy,'" a three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court wrote.

Wolf, 24, videotaped a July 2005 protest where anarchists allegedly vandalized a San Francisco police car and an officer suffered a fractured skull after being hit. The anarchists were protesting a G-8 international economic conference in Scotland.

Wolf sold some of the footage to San Francisco television stations and posted it on his Web site, but refused to turn over unpublished material. U.S. District Judge William Alsup found him in contempt of court and ordered him jailed.

Jose Luis Fuentes, Wolf's lawyer, said he would ask the appeals court to allow him to remain free while he petitions the court to reconsider the issue with a larger panel of 15 judges.

Theodore Boutrous Jr., a lawyer for the California First Amendment Coalition and other journalism groups, said he would support those efforts.

Although the incident Wolf caught on video involved San Francisco police, federal authorities investigated because it involved destruction of federally funded property.

Court Panel Denies Blogger's Appeal (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 11 — In a case closely watched by First Amendment advocates, a federal court panel has rejected an appeal by a freelance journalist and blogger who has refused to appear before a grand jury or turn over video he shot of a violent protest last summer.

The decision, filed Friday by a three-member panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, reaffirmed a contempt charge against the journalist, Josh Wolf, who was sent to prison on Aug. 1 by a lower court for refusing to cooperate with an investigation into an anti-capitalism protest here in July 2005.

At the protest, timed to coincide with the Group of Eight Summit of world economic leaders in Scotland, a police officer was injured and an explosive device, a smoke bomb or a firework, was put under a police car.

Mr. Wolf sold some of his film to local television stations and posted parts on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net. Earlier this year, the government subpoenaed Mr. Wolf to testify and to turn over the remaining video, which prosecutors wanted to use to gather evidence for potential arson charges. Mr. Wolf has refused, and in an interview on Monday, he remained defiant. "Nothing the government can do," he said, "will coerce me into submitting to their demands. I intend to appeal this through every measure possible."

Mr. Wolf remained free on Monday, and it was not clear if the decision would result in his returning to jail immediately. His lawyer, Jose Luis Fuentes, said he would ask for a rehearing before the entire court.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, said his office was awaiting an order from the Ninth Circuit "clarifying Mr. Wolf's custodial status."

Mr. Wolf, who has continued to post online updates about his case, said he was not fazed by the prospect of more prison time.

"My cellmates were totally chill and had my back," he said of his recent incarceration. "The fact I only got an hour of fresh air a day was frustrating, but you deal."

After Steps To Desegregate, Plaintiffs Drop Tennessee Suit (NYT)

By Theo Emery

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

NASHVILLE, Sept. 11 — In 1966, a young black woman named Rita Sanders, fresh out of graduate school, took a job teaching at a traditionally black college here. Angered by the school's inadequate financing and facilities, she sued the state two years later as maintaining an inferior system of higher education for blacks.

DOJ_NMG_0061838

Thirty-eight years later, the woman, now Rita Sanders Geier, stood alongside Gov. Phil Bredesen of Tennessee on Monday to announce that the state had met its obligations to desegregate higher education and that she, along with the other plaintiffs and parties, would ask a judge to dismiss the lawsuit.

"The things that we put in place have shown that they are efficacious, and can work and will work," said Ms. Geier, who now lives in Maryland.

The announcement signified the conclusion of a significant civil rights case that sought to erase vestiges of segregation that lingered long after Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 Supreme Court ruling that abolished segregation in public education.

The case perhaps best known for challenging segregated higher education is United States v. Fordice. That landmark 1992 Supreme Court ruling found that Mississippi had maintained separate systems, one for blacks and one for whites, after the official abolition of segregation.

But the Geier case was different. Long before the Fordice decision, the state agreed to merge a University of Tennessee extension in Nashville into Tennessee State University, where Ms. Geier worked. No other state has agreed to such a remedy, said Steve Suitts, program coordinator at the Southern Education Foundation in Atlanta.

Of 19 states with legally segregated systems of higher education, post-Brown lawsuits in only four states — Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana and Tennessee — went to trial. Alabama is the only state where the litigation is pending, Mr. Suitts said.

He said the litigation could have accomplished more, "but I think the fact of the matter is that these lines of cases have done about as much as they can at this point."

The Tennessee case has taken many twists and turns. Six years ago all the parties entered mediation, and a year later they hammered out an agreement that would result in the dismissal of the lawsuit after five years, if all the conditions were met.

On Monday, the parties said the conditions had been met, including appropriating $15.5 million for the Tennessee State endowment, $19.8 million in capital outlays and almost $15 million in financial aid. All told, the state has spent $77 million since 2001 to increase equality and diversity at state colleges and universities, according to Mr. Bredesen's office.

George Barrett, the lawyer for Ms. Geier and the other plaintiffs, said the case did for higher education what the Brown case did for elementary and secondary education.

"We have given to our children, and our children yet unborn, a system of higher education washed clean of the pernicious effects of the sin of segregation," Mr. Barrett said.

John C. Brittain, chief counsel of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, said he was not so sure. He said settlements such as in the Geier case did not do enough for historically black schools.

"I doubt that it's enough, and that it will be sustained long enough to really build up those institutions to competitiveness and comparability," Mr. Brittain said.

Segregated Schools: New Debate, Old Problem (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Ernie Chambers never made it to the Congressional Black Caucus' annual legislative conference last week, but he was the elephant in the room when some of the attendees got together to talk about this nation's racial divide.

They were participants in a workshop whose title, "Is there a rebirth of legal racial segregation?" suggested a wide-ranging exploration of an intriguing topic. But what unfolded was an emotionally charged discussion of the causes and aftereffects of something Chambers did.

The only black member of Nebraska's state senate, Chambers is the co-author of a law that divides Omaha's public school system into three smaller districts — one mostly black, another largely white and the other predominately Hispanic. "When the opportunity came to do something which other people call radical, but which I call very American … I took that opportunity," Chambers said in a videotaped message.

The law, which takes effect in 2008, is seen by some as a throwback to the time when the doctrine of "separate, but equal" was the law of the land — though black children attended schools that were largely "separate," but hardly "equal."

Chambers' plan comes 52 years after the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed school segregation and at a time when many of Omaha's schools are heavily divided along racial lines as a result of housing patterns and a reluctance to use busing to achieve integration. Chambers said his law will give black and Hispanic parents more control over the schools their children attend. More control, he believes, will translate into greater academic achievement.

"I took this step because nothing else has worked," he explains.

Of course, it's unclear whether Chambers' law will produce the desired results — or even whether it will be implemented. The NAACP and the NAACP Legal Defense Fund have filed a federal lawsuit to block it. But Chambers' legislation produced no great sense of outrage among the academics and civil rights activists who attended the caucus workshop. That's because many of them think it will have little effect on racial integration in Omaha or anywhere else.

"Is there a rebirth of segregation?" panelist Charles Ogletree, a Harvard Law School professor, asked. "The answer," he said, "is emphatically no. It never died. … The reality is that far too many of us never moved an inch away from the segregation that we were born into in this nation."

To a large extent, the facts support that harsh assessment. Blacks and Hispanics continue to live largely in racially isolated neighborhoods. These segregated housing patterns and the continuing migration of whites to the suburbs ensure that minorities dominate the student bodies of many urban public school systems. Conversely, suburban whites attend schools that are overwhelmingly white. The panelists heaped the most blame for this situation on the Supreme Court — not white flight.

"The Supreme Court basically rewarded whites who fled to the suburbs, whites who have practiced decades of residential segregation, with a pass from having to be bothered with implementing" school desegregation, said Albert Samuels, assistant professor of political science at Southern University.

What he's talking about is the high court's Milliken v. Bradley decision. In that case, it ruled that a suburban school district can't be forced to become part of a multidistrict school integration plan if it cannot be shown that it was guilty of operating a segregated school system in violation of federal law.

In essence, this 1974 ruling gave whites who flee to the suburbs the cover they needed to perpetuate the school segregation that the high court outlawed 20 years earlier, many of the panelists argued.

In 1935, W.E.B. DuBois, the black sociologist and civil rights activist, wrote that "the Negro needs neither segregated schools nor mixed schools. What he needs is (a good) Education."

Parties Battle Over New Voter ID Laws (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

PHOENIX — Little noticed by voters, a nationwide melee has broken out pitting liberal and conservative groups in a duel over new laws that could determine who wins close elections in November and beyond.

The dispute, which is being fought in disparate and often half-empty courtrooms in as many as nine states, concerns new state laws and rules backed primarily by Republicans that require people to show photo identification in order to vote and, in some cases, proof of citizenship and identification when registering to vote.

One measure prompted the League of Women Voters to halt its voter registration drives in Florida out of fear of facing criminal penalties. That law, and a similar provision in Ohio that threatened voter registration drives by other groups, was blocked in recent weeks by federal courts.

The legal battle reflects a deep partisan divide, with Republicans arguing that the new requirements are needed to prevent voting fraud and boost confidence in election results, and Democrats charging that they disenfranchise seniors, minorities, students and others who tend to vote Democratic.

Hundreds of thousands of votes are potentially at stake in some of the most contested congressional races this year and the 2008 race for the White House, making the court cases the latest battle in a broader war over election policies that has been raging since the 2000 Florida recount.

One example of the skirmishing came late last month in a federal courtroom in Phoenix, where a Navajo leader, occasionally speaking in his tribal language, testified that thousands of his people would lose their right to cast ballots under a new Arizona law that requires voters to present a photo ID or other proof of identity at the polls.

The leader, Leonard Gorman, testified that many Navajo who spend their lives herding sheep in remote areas cannot fulfill the new requirements because they do not drive, nor do they have mailboxes or even the utility bills that are accepted as alternative forms of identification under the new law.

"This is very burdensome to the elders," Gorman told U.S. District Judge Roslyn Silver.

The provision had been approved by Republican lawmakers and vetoed by Arizona's Democratic governor before conservative activists included it as part of a broad anti-immigration initiative passed by voters in 2004.

Gorman was describing a highly localized, narrow slice of the electorate — about 60,000 voting-age adults living on the reservation. But Native Americans tend to vote for Democrats.

And in a closely fought state, the votes of a handful of Navajo could be decisive.

In 2004, President Bush won a neighboring state, New Mexico, by just 6,000 ballots, and his 537-vote margin in Florida four years earlier prompted both parties to develop finely tuned get-out-the-vote procedures designed to enlist every voter they could.

DOJ_NMG_0061840

Republicans had great success enacting new laws after 2004, winning voter identification requirements in Georgia, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri and the city of Albuquerque as well as the Arizona law, while adding the voter registration restrictions in Ohio and Florida.

In some states, the legal wrangling has prompted creative efforts to guard against constitutional challenges.

Missouri has deployed mobile units in vans to issue identification to the elderly, responding to complaints that photo ID is costly or hard to obtain for some voters.

Wisconsin's Democratic governor has vetoed voter identification legislation approved by the Republican-led Legislature, and the Michigan Supreme Court is expected to rule soon on the constitutionality of a 1996 state law that has never been enforced but would require photo ID at the polls.

Pennsylvania's Republican-led Legislature approved a voter identification requirement, but it was vetoed by Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell.

Across the country, the strategy on each side is being engineered by national groups that say they are nonpartisan but that are ideologically aligned with either the Republican or Democratic parties.

The leading conservative group is the American Center for Voting Rights, an organization created last year that lobbied for many of the new laws and now coordinates the legal strategy to defend them from challenges. The group's primary lawyer is Mark "Thor" Hearne, a St. Louis-based veteran of the Florida recount in the 2000 presidential race who served as national election law counsel for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign.

The opposing side is somewhat less centralized, with cases being brought by several groups, among them People for the American Way, the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Assn. of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN). These groups share strategy and have formed a coalition called the National Network on State Election Reform.

The Democratic National Committee has supported lawsuits in some states, and officials say the party is intensifying its efforts to combat the new laws. The party's national chairman, Howard Dean, last month announced a drive to recruit 7,500 pro bono lawyers and law students to assist in an "election protection program."

In court so far, challenges to the voter identification laws have met with mixed results. Judges have halted two versions of the Georgia law, but a law has been upheld in Indiana.

Challenges are pending elsewhere.

"With voter ID and registration, this is where the current battles over election practices are now being fought," said Dan Tokaji, an Ohio State University law professor who publishes the election-law blog Equal Vote.

Late last month, Hearne, the lawyer for the conservative American Center for Voting Rights, scrambled to prepare after a Missouri judge scheduled hearings on that state's voter identification law.

He lined up a disabled voter who backs the ID law, a supportive state legislator, and a study by two University of Missouri professors with which he intends to counter his opponents' claims that the law would disenfranchise more than 170,000 voters.

The study, for which Hearne said he paid the professors a "minimal amount," concludes that fewer than 20,000 registered voters lack a photo ID, and of those, about 6,000 would probably turn out to vote.

Hearne said he was inspired to delve into the details of election law after 2000, when on election day he found himself in court arguing against a move by Democrats to delay the closing of some St. Louis polling sites.

"They were arguing for a plaintiff who wound up to be dead. It was a fiction," he said. "I thought I had walked into a John Grisham novel."

Weeks later, Hearne joined GOP lawyers in Broward County, Fla., examining dimpled chads and other disputed ballots in the presidential contest.

Hearne said he did not coordinate with the Republican Party, and he vigorously denied that his goal was to suppress Democratic votes.

A spokesman for the Republican National Committee, Danny Diaz, said the party was closely monitoring the cases across the country but was not directly involved in coordinating strategy.

Still, the party has advised at least one state on election law. In a March e-mail obtained by The Times, the Republican National Committee's deputy counsel advised an Arizona official that the state was free to require proof of U.S. citizenship for newly registered voters, as the new state law mandates.

The lawyer wrote that the state did not have to follow an opinion to the contrary written by the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, the panel created by the 2002 Help America Vote Act to guide the administration of federal elections.

The Republican National Committee lawyer, Sean Cairncross, wrote to Kevin Tyne, the top deputy to Arizona's Republican secretary of state, advising that the commission ruling was "simply wrong on the facts and the law."

DOJ_NMG_0061841

"Good to talk to you," Cairncross wrote atop a list of bulleted arguments against the commission finding. "Here are a few thoughts — please let me know however else I [can] help."

Tyne forwarded the e-mail to state Election Director Joe Kanefield, writing simply, "fyi."

Kanefield said in an interview that the e-mail came because the Republican National Committee had called offering advice, and that Arizona officials had not solicited it.

A party official said the advice was offered to "provide clarity" in an "unprecedented" situation.

In the Phoenix courtroom, opponents of the state law argued that thousands could be disenfranchised by the new identification rules. The state's lawyers said those estimates were inflated.

A lawyer for the state argued that the voting system was vulnerable to fraud by impersonators and noncitizens; lawyers fighting the new law said there was little to no evidence of past fraud.

One of the lawyers for groups challenging the law, David Rosenbaum, pointed out that the law required no identification from people casting absentee ballots by mail, and that whites were over three times more likely to vote that way than were minorities — a clear case of discrimination, he said.

Silver on Monday refused to halt the law before today's Arizona primary, but she asked for more evidence regarding claims that the new registration requirements might violate voters' civil rights.

Lawyers on both sides expect that whatever she rules will be reviewed by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. Ultimately, the Supreme Court is likely to have the final say on that case and others.

Poll pattern

Republican state lawmakers across the country have sought election-law changes they argue would reduce fraud. Democrats and their allies say the measures are designed to suppress the votes of traditional Democratic constituencies such as blacks, the poor and seniors. Here is a sampling:

State: Arizona

Action: Proposition 200, approved by voters in 2004, requires proof of U.S. citizenship when registering and identification when casting ballots.

Result: Voting provisions are being challenged in federal court.

State: Missouri

Action: A new law requires voters to present photo ID. Voters without an ID can use a provisional ballot until 2008, when only seniors, the disabled or those with religious objections to obtaining a photo ID will be allowed to cast provisional ballots.

Result: The law is being challenged in state and federal courts.

State: Georgia

Action: Republicans have tried to require photo IDs at the polls. A 2005 law was ruled unconstitutional becaue of the difficulty and cost of obtaining an ID. A new law passed this year makes free IDs available, with some restrictions.

Result: A judge temporarily halted the law before elections in July. Litigation is pending.

State: Ohio

Action: A new rule set criminal penalties for violating voter registration policies. Critics said this placed a punitive burden on organizations that register voters.

Result: Struck down by a federal judge.

State: Florida

Action: GOP-dominated Legislature passed a law imposing steep fines on voter registration organizations that violate guidelines.

Result: A federal judge blocked enforcement.

State: Indiana

Action: A law passed last year requires most voters to present a state-issued photo ID at the polls. The law was challenged by the Democratic Party and other interest groups.

Result: A federal judge ruled in April that opponents failed to prove it was too burdensome.

*

DOJ_NMG_0061842

State: New Mexico

Action: Last year Albuquerque voters approved an amendment to the city's election law requiring a photo ID when voting in person.

Result: Challenged by the ACLU in federal court.

State: Wisconsin

Action: The GOP-led Legislature has repeatedly approved laws requiring a photo ID to vote, but the bills have been vetoed by Democratic Gov. James Doyle.

Result: Republicans are seeking a state constitutional amendment.

New Help For Overseas Voters (WP)

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The Pentagon is counting on an improved Web site to help an estimated 6.5 million Americans -- including U.S. troops at war and others living overseas -- vote in the November elections, and to avoid the problems of the 2000 presidential election.

Officials said this month that the site, for the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program, now includes information on how voters can request and get ballots by fax and e-mail rather than rely on slower postal service. The Defense Department is responsible for the balloting process not only for troops but for all expatriate voters.

The potential voters include all 1.4 million active-duty service members in the United States and abroad, about 1.4 million of their family members, and 3.7 million other Americans living outside the country, said Polli Brunelli, director of the voting assistance program. The total includes about 225,000 troops deployed in Iraq, in Afghanistan and elsewhere around the world.

Michael L. Dominguez, principal deputy undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness, noted the "special challenge of reaching the deployed warrior on the battlefield."

Officials have been working on voting methods, particularly after some troops said they did not vote in the 2000 presidential election because they never received ballots, got them too late or did not know how to request them.

Military voting problems created an uproar in that election when some ballots were rejected in Florida, where George W. Bush's razor-thin margin of victory gave him the presidency after an extended legal battle. Several hundred absentee ballots from troops abroad were thrown out in the state for lack of postmarks, as required by state law, or other flaws such as missing signatures.

The Pentagon had been hoping to do away with some problems by starting Internet voting. But a 2003 pilot program that would have allowed up to 100,000 military personnel and overseas civilians from seven states to vote online was canceled after outside security experts reported that hackers or terrorists could penetrate the system.

In a conference call with reporters, Dominguez mentioned that Sen. Conrad Burns (Mont.), one of the most endangered Republican incumbents, sponsored legislation in which Congress appropriated $2.5 million to help apply Web technologies to the process in which voters request and receive ballots.

ANTITRUST:

Board Members At Bristol-Myers Told To Fire CEO (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou And Barbara Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Directors at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. head into a board meeting today facing heavy pressure to fire Chief Executive Officer Peter R. Dolan and the drug maker's general counsel after a federal monitor overseeing the New York company urged their dismissal last night.

The board, which already was expected to discuss Mr. Dolan's fate at its meeting today after the latest in a long string of missteps, has little choice but to accept the monitor's recommendation. Bristol-Myers is operating under the terms of a deferred-prosecution agreement reached with the U.S. Attorney in New Jersey last year following a three-year investigation into a $2.5 billion scandal at the company involving "channel stuffing," or overloading wholesalers with inventory to meet quarterly sales targets. If the board refuses to fire Mr. Dolan, the company could face charges in connection with the probe.

The Bristol-Myers monitor, former federal Judge Frederick B. Lacey, recommended to a special session of the company's board late yesterday that it terminate Mr. Dolan and Bristol-Myers General Counsel Richard Willard, according to a person familiar with the matter. The meeting was attended by the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey, Christopher Christie, who appointed Mr. Lacey last year in the settlement agreement.

Mr. Lacey made his recommendation after finding Bristol-Myers's actions in pursuing a pact to delay generic competition to the company's best-selling drug, the blockbuster blood-thinner Plavix, violated the terms of the deferred-prosecution agreement, the person said. It wasn't clear what specific actions Mr. Lacey was concerned about, but companies under such agreements are broadly expected to be on their best behavior. The Plavix deal unraveled after the Justice Department's antitrust unit opened a criminal probe into it and the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided Mr. Dolan's office in July.

A spokesman for Bristol-Myers declined to comment last night. Messrs. Dolan and Willard weren't available to comment, the spokesman said.

Mr. Dolan's removal would mark the third ouster of a chief executive of a big U.S. drug company in the past 16 months, underscoring the difficulties facing an industry reeling from an unprecedented number of patent expirations, increasing litigation costs and heightened competition from nimble generic-drug makers. Though still highly profitable, branded-drug makers also face financial pressure from pharmacy-benefit managers, who use their negotiating power and quick access to new generic pills to leverage lower drug prices.

Merck & Co., Whitehouse Station, N.J., last year pushed then-CEO Raymond Gilmartin into early retirement after withdrawing the painkiller Vioxx from the market in 2004. Pfizer Inc., the world's biggest drug maker, ousted Henry McKinnell in late July, replacing him with a former lawyer. As at Bristol-Myers, the stocks of both companies have been battered in the past two years.

Under the terms of its deferred-prosecution agreement, by which it avoided charges of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, Bristol-Myers was supposed to stay out of trouble for two years to avoid an indictment. The agreement, which gave Mr. Lacey unusually broad oversight powers, also forced Mr. Dolan to surrender his chairman title to a senior member of the Bristol-Myers board, James B. Robinson III.

Mr. Lacey, who was appointed to monitor the drug maker for two years through next April, has been attending all the company's board meetings and filing regular reports to Mr. Christie. As part of the agreement, he was given free reign to recommend changes at the company to keep it within bounds.

The board's only recourse if it disagrees with Mr. Lacey's recommendations is an appeal to Mr. Christie. Mr. Lacey briefed Mr. Christie and obtained his backing before speaking to the board about Mr. Dolan, said the person familiar with the situation.

Mr. Dolan's handling of Plavix already had put him on shaky ground with the board. After learning that the company's Plavix cash-cow was under threat from generic competition, he negotiated a deal that would have paid Canada's Apotex Inc. tens of millions of dollars to delay its introduction of a copycat drug. That pact, aimed at settling Apotex's legal challenge of the Plavix patent, unraveled in late July when the Department of Justice's antitrust division opened an investigation into it and state attorneys general rejected it.

In filings to the federal court in New York overseeing the patent litigation, Apotex has alleged that Bristol-Myers struck a verbal side agreement with it during the settlement negotiations that it then hid from regulators. A lawyer for Bristol-Myers has denied this to the court and has suggested that Apotex fabricated the allegation to torpedo the settlement.

In the meantime, Apotex used binding concessions it obtained during the negotiations to launch a knockoff version on Aug. 8, after the deal was rejected by regulators. The generic version quickly conquered 75% of the market, costing Bristol-Myers as much as $600 million in lost sales. The court overseeing the patent case ordered Apotex to stop selling the generic version on Aug. 31, but didn't force it to recall the product already in the distribution channel.

Bristol-Myers pursued the deal with Apotex even though U.S. regulators have been hostile to such agreements on the grounds that they hurt consumers by keeping lower cost versions of life-saving drugs off the market. The Federal Trade Commission has criticized similar deals and has fought one of them all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Bristol-Myers board already planned to discuss Mr. Dolan's future at its regularly scheduled meeting today, even before Mr. Lacey convened a special session yesterday. The board had become worried that the Plavix debacle, coming on top of a series of other controversies during Mr. Dolan's five-year tenure, had so angered shareholders that it was impairing his ability to lead the company effectively. Bristol-Myers shares have fallen nearly 60% since Mr. Dolan became CEO in May 2001.

Nine board members attended last night's special session, according to a person familiar with the matter. No one from management was there, though two lawyers, Mary Jo White and Kenneth Conboy, were on hand to advise the board. After Mr. Lacey briefed board members and issued his recommendation, Mr. Christie spoke to the board and signaled he supported Mr. Lacey's recommendation. The recommendation to fire the two executives "was made from a corporate-governance perspective in the handling of the patent issue over Plavix," the person familiar with the matter said, declining to provide further details.

If Mr. Dolan does go, the board is unlikely to name a permanent successor to Mr. Dolan immediately because it doesn't have a succession plan in place and no executive inside the company is thought to be experienced enough to be CEO, say people familiar with the board's thinking.

Instead, directors might name one of Mr. Dolan's lieutenants to lead the company on an interim basis while they search for a permanent successor. Among the executives the board could appoint to handle the transition are: Andrew Bonfield, the chief financial officer; research chief Elliott Sigal; Anthony Hooper, head of U.S. pharmaceuticals; and Lamberto Andreotti, head of world-wide pharmaceuticals.

Among the potential candidates to succeed Mr. Dolan is Karen Katen, Pfizer's former co-vice chairman and head of human health who lost out in a horse race to succeed Mr. McKinnell, say people familiar with the matter.

Dismissal Recommended For Bristol Chief (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

A court-appointed overseer has recommended that the embattled head of Bristol-Myers Squibb be fired for his recent handling of a patent dispute that led to a criminal investigation, according to a participant in a meeting last evening where the recommendation was made.

If the board takes the action at a meeting today, it would end a troubled five-year tenure for the executive, Peter R. Dolan.

The board appears bound to abide by the recommendation from Frederick B. Lacey, a former federal judge. Mr. Lacey is monitoring the company's behavior under the terms of an agreement the company reached with the federal government last year in hopes of avoiding criminal prosecution for an accounting scandal.

The only reprieve for Mr. Dolan could be granted by Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in New Jersey who is the prosecutor in that case. He has the power to overturn Mr. Lacey's recommendation. But it appeared that Mr. Christie, who was present for Mr. Lacey's meeting last night with most of the company's 11 directors, supported the recommendation to remove Mr. Dolan, according to the participant.

Mr. Dolan, who serves on the board, was not present at the meeting, which was held at corporate headquarters on Park Avenue in Manhattan.

Neither Mr. Dolan nor James D. Robinson III, the chairman of Bristol-Myers's board, could immediately be reached for comment. Tony Plorohos, a spokesman for the Bristol-Myers, said the company would not comment last night.

Mr. Dolan, 50, would become the third chief executive of a major pharmaceutical company to leave ahead of schedule in the last 18 months.

In July, Pfizer's board abruptly replaced Hank McKinnell as chief executive amid shareholder disappointment and questions about Mr. McKinnell's management style.

In May 2005, Merck forced Raymond V. Gilmartin, its chairman and chief executive, to resign. Mr. Gilmartin was forced out in part because of Merck's problems with Vioxx, a painkiller that Merck stopped selling in 2004 after it was linked to heart attacks and strokes.

Mr. Lacey's recommendation about Mr. Dolan stems from Bristol-Myers's conduct this year in a patent dispute involving its blockbuster anti-clotting agent Plavix, according to the person who attended the meeting.

Under the terms of the federal agreement in the accounting scandal, the company was obliged to demonstrate good conduct and improve its corporate governance and remain under supervision by Mr. Lacey at least through the end of this year. In the overseer's view, Bristol-Myers has evidently breached a portion of the agreement by its handling of efforts, along with its marketing partner Sanofi-Aventis, to settle the Plavix dispute with a Canadian generic drug maker.

The Justice Department is thought to be investigating claims that Bristol-Myers tried to conceal portions of a proposed agreement to settle its patent dispute with the Canadian company, Apotex, hiding those details from the Federal Trade Commission and state attorneys general who were reviewing its antitrust implications.

Mr. Lacey also recommended that the board fire Richard K. Willard, who was hired as general counsel last October. Mr. Williard's role in the Plavix case is not publicly known, but it would have been his job to approve the Apotex agreement.

Even before last evening's recommendation, Mr. Dolan's employment status was uncertain before a regularly scheduled board meeting to be held today.

DOJ_NMG_0061845

Whatever the merits of the wrongdoing allegations, the court record in the patent case has shown that Bristol-Myers did make significant concessions during the settlement negotiations that paved the way last month for Apotex to flood the market with millions of dollars worth of a cheaper, generic version of Plavix.

Under those concessions, Bristol-Myers and Sanofi waived their right under federal law to seek triple financial damages if Apotex began selling its generic drug. And they agreed to give Apotex a five-day head start once it started selling the generic, before they would try to block those sales in court.

Those concessions were made as the parties negotiated a settlement under which the Canadian company would agree not to introduce its Plavix competitor until 2011, shortly before the patent is set to expire. Only if regulators refused to accept that agreement were the concessions to take effect.

People involved in Bristol-Myers's negotiations in the patent settlement have since said that the company made the concessions only as an inducement to Apotex to reach an agreement, which they had expected regulators to approve.

But Mr. Sherman of Apotex has said he entered the negotiations only to win those concessions, because he did not think the government would approve the settlement deal. When regulators did reject the deal, Apotex almost immediately began shipping its generic Plavix competitor.

Federal District Judge Sidney H. Stein, who is overseeing the patent dispute, ordered Apotex to suspend the shipments on Aug. 31. But the volume of the generic drug already on the market has forced Mr. Dolan's company to reduce its earnings forecast for the year by as much as 25 percent. Plavix is Bristol-Myers's top-selling drug, with sales last year of $3.5 billion.

Financial analysts had been speculating that the Bristol-Myers directors were under pressure to act.

Earlier yesterday, a Morgan Stanley analyst, Jami Rubin, said that she believed there was a significant chance Mr. Dolan's tenure at Bristol-Myers would be over.

"The decision to settle with Apotex backfired on the company," Ms. Rubin said. "Just given the pressure on most boards of directors today, they've got to act. And I think that the credibility of management has been put into question. I think that means the board of directors will consider whether they want to keep him. I think there is clearly a risk."

Some individual investors had also complained. Dundas I. Flaherty of Malibu, Calif., has seen his 152,000 shares shrink to a third of their peak value. And he blamed Mr. Dolan for many of the company's problems.

The company's stock, which closed yesterday at $23.67, is off more than 10 percent from the period before Apotex began shipping its generic drug and nearly 60 percent since Mr. Dolan became chief executive in 2001.

Mr. Flaherty wrote Mr. Robinson a letter Aug. 9, the day after Apotex announced it would begin shipping its generic version of Plavix.

"I think the right thing to do is show him the door," Mr. Flaherty said yesterday, referring to Mr. Dolan.

Responding to the Justice Department investigation, which included a search on July 26 of Mr. Dolan's Park Avenue office, Bristol-Myers has been saying that neither Mr. Dolan nor any other company official did anything illegal. In court, a lawyer for Sanofi-Aventis and Bristol-Myers argued that the allegations were contrived by Bernard C. Sherman, Apotex's chief executive, in pursuit of his goal to get the generic Plavix on the market.

Bristol-Myers's reduced earnings estimate of 95 cents a share is now below the company's dividend of $1.12, meaning that the company would pay out more to investors in dividends than it makes. Still, Mr. Dolan and other company executives have recently been assuring investors that the dividend is safe for now.

While no clear candidate emerged yesterday for Mr. Dolan's job, the board's options if he left would include installing an interim chief from among current executives or name a caretaker chief from the board.

Mr. Dolan was named chief executive on May 1, 2001, after having served in managerial roles with the company since 1988. His tenure has been marked by a series of difficulties, some that Mr. Dolan said he inherited and others that appeared to be of his own making.

During his tenure, Bristol-Myers has faced the failure of two major experimental products: the blood pressure medication Vanlev and the diabetes drug Pargluva, both abandoned after it became clear they would not be approved by the Food and Drug Administration.

And investors raised questions about other decisions by Mr. Dolan, like his purchase for $2 billion of a 19 percent stake in ImClone, the company that makes the cancer drug Erbitux. Although Erbitux is on the market and considered successful, there have been complaints that Bristol-Myers paid too much for its share.

Yet Mr. Dolan claimed he inherited the major stain on his legacy — the $2.5 billion accounting scandal involving accusations that Bristol-Myers was providing incentives to wholesalers to buy excess inventory. The practice, called channel stuffing, was the subject of a Justice Department investigation that ended last year with the deferred-prosecution agreement.

Under that agreement, Mr. Dolan was forced to relinquish his title as chairman but was allowed to retain his chief executive's job, subject to the discretion of Mr. Lacey.

While some analysts, citing the company's intriguing pipeline of new products, had recently said they believed that Mr. Dolan was turning the company around, the Plavix debacle led many of them to conclude that Bristol-Myers had been outmaneuvered by Apotex.

Bristol Board Urged To Fire CEO, Company Lawyer (MRKTWTCH)

By Marketwatch

Market Watch, September 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co.'s embattled chief executive has one more strike against him Monday night after a federal monitor reportedly urged his board to fire him following a series of lapses, including his failure to delay generic competition for a blood-thinning drug.

Frederick Lacey, a former federal judge, has urged the board of Bristol-Myers to dismiss CEO Peter Dolan along with Richard Willard, the general counsel, The Wall Street Journal reported in its online edition, citing an unnamed person familiar with the matter.

The board scheduled a meeting for Tuesday to consider Lacey's report.

According to the Journal, Lacey reached his recommendation after concluding that the company violated the terms of a deferred-prosecution agreement in pursuing a deal to delay generic competition to the blood-thinner, Plavix.

Calls to officials at the New York-based company weren't immediately returned.

Earlier this month, Bristol-Myers, which co-markets Plavix with Sanofi-Aventis, lowered its expected 2006 earnings, citing sales of a generic version of Plavix. At that time, the company said it expected annual earnings from continuing operations of no less than 95 cents per share, down from its July view of $1.15 to $1.25 a share. See full story.

In June 2005, Bristol-Myers reached a settlement with the Justice Department for $300 million to end a long-running government investigation into its accounting. At that time, the company conceded that it had engaged in questionable practices, inflating sales by $2.5 billion and net earnings by $900 million between 1999 and 2001.

Part of the investigation dealt with allegations of "channel stuffing," or offering financial incentives to wholesalers to stockpile the company's products.

After that agreement, Dolan relinquished his additional title of chairman but remained on the board.

Bristol-Myers shares closed Monday at $23.39, up 0.9%.

Commission Takes Over Germany's Intel Probe (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

European regulators have expanded their antitrust probe against Intel to include charges that the world's largest chipmaker tried to prevent retailers from offering computers powered by rival microprocessors.

The European Commission, which has been investigating Intel's business practices for more than five years, said yesterday it had taken over a probe that was started by Germany's Federal Cartel Office this year.

The investigation centres on allegations that Intel attempted to hurt Advanced Micro Devices, its rival, by cutting off the company's access to the Media Markt and Saturn retail outlets. Owned by Metro, the German retail group, the chains are Europe's biggest computer retailers.

A spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, said the Commission and the German regulator had agreed that it would make more sense for Brussels to take on this probe.

The Commission, he added, was already "looking into a range of tactics used by Intel to limit marketpenetration of AMD".

A spokesman for AMD said: "We are pleased to learn that DG Competition [the Commission's antitrust arm] is examining Intel's exclusive relationship with Media Saturn Holding. We are confident that DG Competition will conclude what the industry has known for years; that Intel has entered into an exclusivity agreement with Europe's largest computer retailer."

Intel is the dominant force in the global market for microchips, with a market share of about 80 per cent. AMD, its only rival, has said for years that its business has suffered because of Intel's allegedly illegal businesses practices, and has complained to antitrust watchdogs globally. It has also launched a private litigation case against Intel in the US.

As part of its investigation, the Commission raided the offices of Intel and several computer manufacturers last year. The next step would be for Brussels to issue formal antitrust charges against the US chipmaker, a move that could ultimately lead to painful financial penalties for Intel.

A spokesman for Intel said: "We plan to co-operate with the staff of the European Commission. We believe our business practices are lawful."

EU Takes Over German Antitrust Inquiry Into Intel (CNET)

By Dawn Kawamoto, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 12, 2006

Regulators take over a German antitrust investigation of allegations that Intel persuaded a retailer to forgo AMD processors.

European Commission regulators have taken over a German antitrust investigation into allegations that Intel put pressure on a major electronics retailer to forgo using processors from competitor Advanced Micro Devices.

Germany's antitrust agency, Bundeskartellamt, received a complaint from AMD alleging that Intel had abused its dominant market position by putting pressure on major electronics retailer Media Markt to not sell AMD's chips. Because the Commission found similarities with its existing probe into Intel, it took over the German investigation in late August, Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said.

"We have liaised with the Bundeskartellamt...and come to a common understanding that it would make more sense if these charges could be dealt with by the European Commission," Todd said. "Bearing in mind that (the suspected actions) seem to belong to a set of practices that is already under scrutiny by the Commission...a range of tactics used by Intel to limit the market share of AMD."

Intel will cooperate with the EU investigation, as it has done over the past five years, said Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy, who added that the company believes its actions are "fair and lawful."

Last year, the Commission raided several European Intel offices as well as offices of companies that manufacture or sell computers.

Other countries have weighed in with their own investigations into Intel's business practices. Earlier this year, the Korean Fair Trade Commission sought more documents from Intel relating to its antitrust investigation into the chip giant.

And last year, Intel agreed to abide by recommendations from the Japan Fair Trade Commission, which had launched its own probe. The recommendations called for Intel to halt its practice of requiring PC makers to restrict the use of competitors' chips in exchange for monetary rebates. Intel accepted the recommendations but disagreed with the facts underlying the allegations.

EU To Investigate AMD Complaint Against Intel (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby, William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

BRUSSELS -- European regulators expanded a long-running antitrust probe of Intel Corp., agreeing to review allegations the chip maker pressured a unit of German retailer Metro AG not to sell computers powered by Advanced Micro Devices Inc. chips.

AMD, based in Sunnyvale, Calif., filed a complaint over the summer to the German antitrust office, the Bundeskartellamt, alleging Metro's Media Markt unit signed exclusive agreements with Intel to sell personal computers using only Intel chips. After an investigation, German antitrust authorities handed the matter over to the European Union regulators, who will decide whether to pursue it.

"The commission is concerned that Intel has been putting pressure on Media Markt not to stock computers that include AMD chips," European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said.

Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy said the Media Markt complaint isn't new and was included in U.S. litigation AMD filed against Intel in 2005. "We have been cooperating with regulators and intend to continue to do that," Mr. Mulloy said. "We believe our business practices are both fair and lawful."

A spokesman for Metro's consumer-electronics unit declined to comment.

Since 2001, EU regulators have been investigating whether Intel uses its dominant market position to discourage retailers from buying computers and other products powered by AMD chips. Last year, the commission searched Intel's offices in Europe for evidence of alleged illegal anticompetitive behavior, such as offering loyalty rebates to customers.

If regulators decide Intel broke European antitrust rules, the commission would issue a "statement of objections" outlining its specific concerns. Recent success in the marketplace by AMD prompted the commission's top antitrust civil servant, Philip Lowe to suggest the case had lost some urgency.

Yesterday, commission spokesman Mr. Todd said AMD's recent increased sales didn't augur an end to the probe. AMD spokesman Jens Drews said he believed regulators would disregard AMD's recent market gains and focus on whether Intel had used illegal anticompetitive practices.

How Hartmut Pilch, Avid Computer Geek, Bested Microsoft (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

BRUSSELS -- A proposal here to create a new European patents court has the support of Microsoft Corp., Siemens AG and many other giants of Western industry. But can it survive an attack from Hartmut Pilch?

A 43-year-old linguist from Munich, Mr. Pilch speaks Chinese, Japanese and an artificial language called Lojban intended to eliminate ambiguity and promoted by some programmers. He is the unlikely leader of a movement of self-styled computer geeks out to sink a patents plan they say would stifle software programmers.

"Patents on software mean any programmer can be sued at any time," says Mr. Pilch, a simultaneous translator who writes computer programs for his own use in his leisure time.

In July last year, heeding appeals posted on the Web site of Mr. Pilch's lobbying group, about 200 programmers descended on the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France, waving signs demanding the right to freely exchange computer code. "U.S. Software Patents Go Out," read a banner, in English, held aloft by two young Frenchmen.

The Parliament was poised to approve a law extending American-style software patents to Europe, the most lucrative consumer market outside the U.S. A technology industry group had hired a boat to cruise the river outside Parliament with a banner urging the lawmakers on. The programmers rented canoes and paddled out to the boat to unfurl their own banner: "Software Patents Kill Innovation." The president of the Parliament later called the incident a "naval battle."

The unhappy result for the big technology companies: A panicky Parliament suddenly backed off a law the industry giants had spent several years and millions of euros lobbying to enact. "It was the sheer volume and number of people," said Parliament member Sharon Bowles of Britain, a patent attorney and industry ally. The surprise winners: U.S. software companies Red Hat Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc., the only large companies that had taken public stands against the software patents law.

Today, the battle has shifted to an effort to create a special patents court that would handle appeals cases from all over Europe. Companies like Microsoft support the idea in large part because many national courts currently reject software patents, bucking rulings by the European-wide patent office.

Mr. Pilch wants to maintain the antisoftware patent status quo, and so do the European programmers and students who belong to his group, the Foundation for a Free Information Infrastructure. Known as FFII, the organization is committed to the idea that basic computer language should be as free as human speech.

Mr. Pilch calls his mission vital to keeping Europe free from the lawsuits over digital rights that he claims increasingly hamper innovation in the U.S. Software around the world already is adequately protected from theft by copyright laws, he says.

Mr. Pilch's opponents liken FFII to a bunch of communists who don't want companies to profit from what they create. "They do sound closer to Karl Marx than Adam Smith," said Mark MacGann, executive director of the European Information & Communications Technology Industry Association, which represents Philips Electronics NV, SAP AG, Microsoft and more than 70 other companies backing software patents.

Mr. Pilch counters: "That's not true. I want to make money, too." He admits, however, that he became so absorbed in lobbying last year that he forgot to bill clients in the small translation business he operates out of a run-down office in Munich.

Mr. Pilch began FFII in 1998, as little more than a Web site. As news spread, he began getting small donations from like-minded programmers and small businesses. His growing cadre of volunteers, however, struggled to remember the Lojban words, such as "Cnino" ("news") and "Penmi" ("events"), that Mr. Pilch used to name FFII email lists.

"It would have been easier just to call them 'news' and 'events,' " says German university student Andre Rebentisch, who helps administer the lists. Still, more than 200 people eventually registered to help maintain FFII's member-edited site.

In 2002, the European Commission, the executive arm of the European Union, proposed the law that drew FFII's ire. It aimed to elevate the European Patent Office and its pro-software patent policies over the national courts. The EU's argument: A simpler, more unified patent system would make Europe's economy more competitive. Mr. Pilch's FFII put out a statement saying the proposal "paves the way to a global control of the information society by multinational -- mostly U.S." technology companies.

In April 2004, as the debate heated up, several hundred FFII demonstrators marched around European Union offices in Brussels in yellow "No Software Patents" T-shirts. They hoisted banners slamming Microsoft. Some demonstrators wore Che Guevara-style berets meant to symbolize a revolution against the Redmond, Wash., company's dominance of software markets. A Microsoft spokesman declined to comment.

Buoyed by $61,000 in grants from the Open Society Institute, the philanthropy of billionaire George Soros, FFII sent an army of students to lobby EU lawmakers. "Sometimes they would just burst in the door and demand to see you," says Ms. Bowles, the pro-patent member of Parliament. "Some of them didn't seem to understand the concept of making an appointment."

DOJ_NMG_0061849

Mr. Pilch spent so much time lobbying that he began showing up exhausted for his day job in Munich. Japanese and Chinese clients were furious, says his Chinese-born wife, Wang Tao. Because he was forgetting to bill for his work, money was tight. The couple's two small children hardly ever saw him. "The marriage almost broke up," Ms. Wang says.

The grass-roots show of force worked. At the 2005 meeting in Strasbourg, pro-industry members of Parliament abandoned the proposed software law. "They produced a whole movement," said German Parliament member Klaus-Heiner Lehne, who led the unsuccessful push for the law. "Industry was sleeping."

FFII has reorganized to fight the proposal for a patent court. Prodded by his wife, Mr. Pilch has ceded day-to-day control of the group to Pieter Hintjens, owner of a small software business. Mr. Hintjens, a Belgian, was elected president at an FFII board meeting and keg party in Brussels last November, which, he says, "lasted until the beer ran out."

In July, the EU held a hearing in Brussels on the new patent court and related proposals. FFII activists packed the room, applauding loudly when speakers criticized the court. His group still is short of cash, Mr. Hintjens says. But he believes the movement has an asset even more vital than money: "a burning, true, almost religious conviction that we are right."

Hot Seat To Protect Its Box-Office Turf, Ticketmaster Plays Rivals' Tune (WSJ)

By Ethan Smith And Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Reselling sports and concert tickets online has become a multibillion-dollar business for eBay Inc., StubHub Inc. and other middlemen. Now the concert and sports industry -- and Ticketmaster, which sells the majority of seats -- are fighting to take back some of that money.

A division of Barry Diller's IAC/InterActiveCorp, Ticketmaster is overhauling the way it sells tickets, embracing new methods that it long shunned. It is now running auctions to sell seats for roughly 30% of this year's major music tours -- including Pink Floyd's Roger Waters, Barbra Streisand, Madonna, B.B. King and Melissa Etheridge. Ticketmaster also is letting customers resell some seats at its Web site. Since that lets fans sell tickets far above face value, Ticketmaster has joined the fight against state antiscalping laws, reversing its earlier position.

Journal reporter Ethan Smith talks about how Ticketmaster is defending itself against the rise of online ticket-reselling services.2

Concert promoters, performers and sports teams stand to win if the new methods at Ticketmaster reduce scalper sales -- and return some of the proceeds to their own coffers.

Ticketmaster, which for 15 years has held a near-monopoly over the market for ticketing major live events, is battling competition from online rivals that can easily resell tickets at whatever price the market will bear. The result is a marketplace in the throes of upheaval, confronting a pricing system that everyone agrees is dysfunctional.

Tickets for live events are frequently either overpriced -- leading to potentially disastrous sales shortfalls -- or underpriced, opening the door for scalpers. "We're in an industry that prices its product worse than anybody else," says Ticketmaster Chairman Terry Barnes. People in the concert industry estimate that only 45% of tickets made available to the public end up being sold.

Last year, the number of concert tickets sold in the U.S. fell, although prices and overall ticket revenue continued to rise. The average price of a ticket to the 100 top-grossing shows hit a record $57 in 2005, according to Pollstar, a trade magazine, up nearly 9% from 2004's average of $52.39. In 2005, the number of tickets sold fell to 67.4 million, down nearly 7% from 72.2 million in 2004.

Prices for Barbra Streisand's coming tour, for example, are setting records, with top-tier seats carrying face values of $750 through Ticketmaster. Sales have been slow, with excellent seats going unsold in Atlanta, Columbus, Ohio, and other cities. That, in turn, has undercut Ticketmaster and Ms. Streisand's efforts to sell some of those seats at auction for even higher prices.

At the same time, sales of seats by resellers has thrived, thanks to the Internet. By some estimates, the U.S. secondary market reached $5 billion in 2005 -- nearly equal to the face value of all the tickets sold by Ticketmaster that year.

"The Internet has opened up the world of reselling tickets to anybody," says Arthur Fogel, chairman of concert-promotion giant Live Nation Inc.'s music division. That rankles Ticketmaster, concert promoters and musicians, who generally haven't benefited financially from this extra revenue. "That secondary-market money, we think belongs in the industry," says Ticketmaster's Mr. Barnes.

Ticketmaster began exploring auctions and other sales methods in 2003 as a way to address the disequilibrium. "On one hand, there is a small percentage of tickets, say 5% to 10%, that are priced well below their market value, and end up being resold on the secondary market for huge profits," says President and Chief Operating Officer Sean Moriarty. "And on the other hand, over 50% of tickets go unsold."

Ticketmaster now makes auctions available as an option to concert promoters, venues, performers and sports teams. For any given show, clients decide how many seats to put up for auction -- and set the opening bid prices. The bidding process is similar to that of Web auctioneer eBay. A fan enters the maximum he or she is willing to pay, along with a credit-card number, and can follow competing bids online.

When country stars Tim McGraw and Faith Hill played a concert last month at Phoenix's U.S. Airways Center arena, ticket prices ranged from $49 to $125. Marcus Ridgway, a 36-year-old real-estate developer from Mesa, Ariz., paid $700 on a Ticketmaster auction for a pair of seats close enough to touch the country stars as they strutted on a catwalk.

Performers also argue that they -- not brokers -- should participate in any windfall from resold tickets. Mr. McGraw spent the summer on the road with his wife and fellow star, Ms. Hill. The duo largely financed the tour, which required a staff of 122 traveling with 22 trucks and 13 buses. After watching scalpers resell $125 seats online for $1,000 or more, manager Scott Siman declares: "We would like to tap into that profit instead of somebody else."

Ticketmaster's early efforts suggest even limited auctions can help offset scalping activity. Jim Guerinot, a manager, says his client Nine Inch Nails auctioned fewer than 10% of the tickets on a tour last summer but saw a significant decrease in online reselling. "We watched eBay and [scalping activity] was way down," he says.

Ticketmaster also is pushing its own resale program. Launched in 2002, "TicketExchange" has proven most popular for sporting events, letting season-ticket holders unload seats they won't use.

In 2005, Ticketmaster customers resold 329,000 tickets this way, up from 83,000 the year before. Ticketmaster and the promoter, venue or team share an undisclosed percentage of the sale price, while the seller keeps the rest. Ticketmaster allows reselling on TicketExchange only when its clients agree.

Ticketmaster's revenue jumped to $950 million in 2005, up almost 24% from 2004, partly as a result of strong sales in Canada and higher sales from recent acquisitions in Sweden, Finland and Australia. The bulk of Ticketmaster's revenue comes from fees it adds on top of the face value of tickets, accounting for 30% or more of the final cost. It is the cash cow for parent company IAC. For the quarter ending June 30, the company's ticketing division had $295 million in sales and produced $69 million in operating income, the bulk of IAC's total operating income of $81 million.

Fighting Back

Ticketmaster's online rivals are fighting back, boasting that they offer a wider range of tickets in the resale market. A leading combatant is StubHub, founded in 2000 amid the tech crash by two students at Stanford University's Graduate School of Business who began devising a business plan as part of a school competition. The company expects ticket sales to hit $400 million this year -- double that of 2005 -- and to take in fees of 25% of sales, or about $100 million.

StubHub says it can maintain its edge by letting fans buy and sell any ticket for any event through its site. It pockets a fee from both buyer and seller. Ticketmaster only resells tickets when it has a resale contract with the artists, teams or venues. "In the secondary market, success is driven by relationships with the fans, whereas Ticketmaster's focus is about locking up deals with venues," says Chief Executive Jeff Fluhr.

Branching out, StubHub recently staged an auction for every seat in the house for an INXS concert at the 650-seat Lobero Theater in Santa Barbara, Calif., with the band's cooperation. Seats went for an average $50, with one pair fetching more than $500 each (a price that included an opportunity to meet the band) and a few going for just $3.

The National Hockey League's Web site has a link to StubHub for people seeking tickets to league games -- despite the fact that most NHL teams are Ticketmaster clients.

Susan Cohig, the NHL's group vice president for club services, says the StubHub link is just a paid advertisement. She adds that the league is in talks with StubHub, Ticketmaster and others about establishing an official secondary market for NHL tickets. "We have to look at how to better service our fans," she says.

Legal Barriers

The legal barriers to reselling tickets are starting to erode. Florida in June overturned a law against reselling a ticket for more than $1 above face value. Eleven states still have strong antiscalping laws, like the one Florida did away with, and nine others have weaker ones. Even in states and municipalities where such laws remain on the books, they are enforced inconsistently at best and have done little to slow the growth of the online secondary market.

Now that Ticketmaster is slugging it out in the secondary market, it has joined in lobbying for the repeal of states' antiscalping laws -- a 180-degree change from its earlier efforts to make such laws stiffer. StubHub says it also is lobbying to repeal "antiquated" state laws.

Still, StubHub ran afoul of such a law at June's NHL Stanley Cup finals in Raleigh, N.C. Police found two company employees distributing tickets from a hotel near the stadium and charged them with violating a law prohibiting the resale of tickets for more than $3 above the face value. The charges are pending. StubHub contends that its employees didn't break the law, since the company was merely allowing buyers to pick up tickets they previously had purchased online. StubHub, like eBay, says it places the burden of legal compliance with its users.

Ticketmaster executives acknowledge that the complex new marketplace has its perils for the culture of concert-going. Artists, Mr. Barnes says, still want their fans to feel that they can wake up the morning a concert goes on sale, and log on -- or line up -- to luck into a great seat: "They want to be careful not to kill the Saturday-morning dream."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Was Manure-to-Power Venture Just Bull? (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire And William Heisel

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

As he sold investors on an improbable plan for turning Inland Empire cow manure into electricity, W. Patrick Moriarty had an answer for everything.

With a folksy delivery, the Orange County businessman promised cutting-edge technology, a respected engineering firm and tax-exempt financing to extract methane gas from mountains of manure and use it to generate enough power to light a small city.

"He told me categorically that we would get our money back with interest and that the project was as good as gold," said Shmuel Erde, a Beverly Hills lender.

What Moriarty and his business partner, Wayne Stephens, didn't tell Erde and numerous others who altogether invested more than $10 million was that their company, Chino Organic Power Inc., had no licensed technology, no equipment, no permits — not even a guaranteed supply of manure.

Although manure-to-electricity plants have been used on a small scale to turn water-polluting cow waste into power, they are not particularly cost-effective and have never produced close to the amount of electricity Moriarty envisioned, documents and interviews show.

Another thing Moriarty didn't tell Erde and the others was that he had gone to prison in the 1980s in what then-U.S. Atty. Robert C. Bonner called "the most significant corruption case in recent California history."

Not surprisingly, the lofty energy plan has come crashing down, followed by a bankruptcy and accusations from angry investors, a number of whom have filed lawsuits alleging fraud by Moriarty and Stephens, a San Bernardino County businessman.

In interviews with 20 investors, many said they now believe the entire operation was a ruse to enrich the two.

A Times review of permit applications, court records and corporate documents shows that the Chino Organic Power plant never progressed much further than the sales pitch.

Both Moriarty and Stephens have acknowledged in recent interviews that their plan never got off the drawing board. But they said they didn't defraud anyone, and they insisted that the electric plant would have worked if it hadn't been hampered by an uncertain energy market and litigious investors.

"I am absolutely very sorry if anyone, including me and Wayne, lost money — especially me," said Moriarty, 75.

Moriarty grew up in Washington state and moved to Orange County in the 1950s to expand a fireworks business he had started as a teenager. By the 1980s, Moriarty and his associates contributed nearly $600,000 to California politicians, about half of it illegally laundered to mask the source of the funds.

He used money, free vacation housing, special investment deals and patronage jobs to buy support from politicians for legislation to benefit his fireworks firm, Anaheim-based Pyrotronics Inc., and to gain support for the Commerce Casino, which he helped found.

In a scandal that ultimately produced 10 convictions, Moriarty pleaded guilty to seven mail fraud counts in 1985.

He was sentenced to seven years in prison but served 29 months after the U.S. Supreme Court limited prosecutors' use of mail fraud charges as a means of fighting corruption.

That led to a deal in 1988 in which five of the original counts against Moriarty were dropped; the two remaining counts related to kickbacks Moriarty paid to a bank official.

The roots of Chino Organic go back to 1989, when Stephens and a group of friends founded Chino Resource Recovery Inc. and set out to build a power plant fueled by cow manure. They, too, soon ran into legal troubles.

Moriarty entered the picture in 1996, introduced to Stephens by a mutual acquaintance. Soon, Moriarty became Stephens' partner in a new firm, Chino Organic Power, with a far more ambitious business plan that called for more than $150 million in tax-exempt financing and a strategy for taking the company public, according to records and interviews.

DOJ_NMG_0061852

An experimental, alternative energy source was now touted as an electric utility projected to generate 85 megawatts, enough for all the homes in Chino and Chino Hills, with power to spare.

Industry and academic experts cannot cite any manure-to-electricity plant in the country that is producing more than 2 megawatts. "It's a huge, almost unbelievable plan," said Norm Scott, an agricultural engineering professor at Cornell University who has worked on such projects.

Moriarty and Stephens told investors they needed short-term loans for engineering and other development work that would be repaid once government agencies issued the bonds, the investors said in interviews.

They allege that Moriarty was a master at creating the appearance of a can't-miss project, gathering documents, letters and newspaper articles touting relationships he had with engineers, agencies and two officials who would go on to help sell the project.

The first was Bob Feenstra, head of the area's dairy industry lobbying group, the Milk Producers Council. He was Moriarty's link to the raw material: wet cow manure.

In a 2003 lawsuit filed by Erde in Los Angeles, the Beverly Hills lender alleged that Moriarty never told investors that Feenstra was a handsomely paid consultant.

A February 1999 letter from Stephens to Feenstra, now part of the court record, describes the $10,000-a-month consulting arrangement, and company checks obtained by Erde's attorneys show that Feenstra was paid more than $200,000 from 1999 to 2002. Chino Organic also bought a $4-million "key man" life insurance policy for Feenstra that shows he was poised to become its general manager.

Feenstra responded in a court declaration that he was never paid to attract investors and said he never misled anyone. He resigned from the Milk Producers Council in October.

Moriarty's other important relationship was with Richard Atwater, the chief executive of the Inland Empire Utilities Agency, which runs water and sewer lines and had an obvious interest in keeping manure from polluting the groundwater.

"Atwater became extremely important to the deal," Moriarty said. "It was an absolute home run for them and for us."

In 2001, Atwater signed an agreement supporting Chino Organic's purchase of property near the agency's headquarters for $8.8 million. If Chino Organic defaulted on its loan to buy the property, the agency would buy the property instead.

But the purchase guarantee was never approved by the agency's board and was meaningless, Jean Cihigoyenetche, the utility's attorney, told The Times.

"Atwater didn't have the authority to sign that agreement and bind the board to that," he said.

Atwater responded that he got approval from the board in a closed meeting, but he could not produce documents to show that such approval was granted. He said he had done nothing improper through his involvement with Moriarty.

"All I said was that renewable energy is a good idea with merit," he said. "I don't provide investment advice."

Investors suing Moriarty and Stephens allege that they used the document to entice investors, saying it showed they had support from an important agency. Moriarty also told investors he was in escrow on the land, an old dairy farm, they said.

But a $10,000 check Moriarty wrote to Inland Empire Escrow in December 2000 securing the land bounced, meaning he never controlled the site, according to Linda Cooper, the president at Inland Empire Escrow.

"It looks really good once you have a property in escrow, and you have receipts saying you deposited this much money, whether the checks bounce or not," she said.

Despite his criminal record, Moriarty continued gathering investors from Southern California to Michigan.

Moriarty persuaded Erde to raise money by arranging a meeting with Feenstra and Atwater, who vouched for the project, Erde said. He ultimately brought in more than a dozen other investors who together sank more than $1 million in Chino Organic.

Reaching back to his troubled past, Moriarty also tapped Newport Beach lender Edgar Pankey for $3 million. Pankey had been involved in a number of projects with Moriarty in the 1980s, including the Commerce Casino and the Bank of Irvine.

Moriarty and Stephens also pitched Chino Organic to several contractors and engineers who invested funds and expertise.

Dave Olson, a La Jolla consulting engineer whom Chino Organic hired to help launch the project, became an early believer. He made a $45,000 personal loan and wound up contributing more than $400,000 in consulting services from 2000 to 2002. Olson said he decided he didn't like the way the business was being run and quit.

"When you're in the industry long enough, you smell the real credible guys and the not-so-credible guys from a mile away," Olson said. "These guys weren't credible. They were greedy."

Absent from Chino Organic's ledgers were expenditures that could have brought the project closer to fruition, records and interviews show.

In January 2000, the company compiled a list of more than a dozen permits it might need. But no applications were filed for air quality, water quality or even basic building permits, according to officials at those agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0061853

The licensing agreement Chino Organic said it had secured from a British engineer for methane gas extraction technology was never executed. Beyond the absence of land, technology, engineering or a purchase agreement for any electricity produced, the project lacked something even more basic: manure.

Even with Feenstra's ties to the dairy industry, it's not clear that dairy farmers in the area would have paid to haul wet manure to Chino Organic's electric plant. Geoffrey Vanden Heuvel, a veteran dairy farmer and Milk Producers Council board member, was among several major dairy farmers who told The Times they were never approached by Feenstra to contribute manure.

The first sign many investors had that something was seriously amiss with the project, they said, came when checks Moriarty sent them as partial repayment of their loans bounced. More than 60 creditors received bounced checks from Moriarty or one of his companies, according to financial records reviewed by The Times.

From 1999 to 2004, Moriarty bounced at least 150 checks, many to Chino Organic investors, those records show.

As he raised money from investors, Moriarty moved money freely from Chino Organic's account to other accounts he controlled, including one from his old fireworks company, Pyrotronics, according to checks now in court records.

The checks drawn on those accounts show he mingled personal and business expenses, which he acknowledged in the interview.

For example, Erde gave Chino Organic a check for $200,000 in November 1999. A day later, subpoenaed bank records show, $100,000 from Chino Organic was deposited into the Pyrotronics account. Moriarty then wrote a check for $832 to his wife and a check for $2,000 to himself.

Overall, while Moriarty wrote nearly $1 million in checks to others that bounced, he wrote just as much in checks to himself, his family members and for cash that cleared.

Responding to allegations by investors who lost money on Chino Organic, Moriarty told The Times that he covered most of the bounced checks, but he did not provide bank statements as confirmation. As for the checks to himself and his family, he said he was drawing the money out of the company accounts as if it were his salary.

"All the money that I put into that company is far more than any money that I took out to pay my rent or to make a car payment or anything else," Moriarty said.

To boost investors' spirits, Chino Organic would occasionally send out newsletters rife with misinformation. In March 2001, a newsletter said, "Ten Million dollars has been made available to Chino Organic Power, Inc. by the State of California, for this project."

The state agency in question? "The California Green Energy Department." There is no such department, and state officials said no state funding was ever guaranteed for the project, a fact Moriarty and Stephens acknowledged in the interview.

In 2002, anger among lenders reached a boiling point. They began filing lawsuits against Moriarty and Chino Organic — lawsuits that Stephens and Moriarty blame for the company's failure.

The estate of Moriarty's late associate, Edgar Pankey, alleged that Moriarty had covered "unauthorized, improper and excessive business and personal expenses" using Chino Organic funds. Moriarty responded in court that Pankey stalled the project. A judge agreed with Pankey's claim and awarded the family $3.8 million in 2004. The judgment has not been paid.

Erde, who had invested about $600,000, filed suit in 2003, saying he had been defrauded. The case is pending. Moriarty says Erde has been paid back everything he was owed.

A third group of lenders filed suit in March in Santa Monica. They, too, say they were defrauded and are asking for $5 million in a pending case. Moriarty has not responded, and the court is expected to enter a default judgment against him this week, a court official said.

William Sandors, a Los Angeles chauffeur among the Santa Monica plaintiffs, lent Chino Organic $74,000 at a time when his mother needed at-home nursing care. When the promised payoff never came, he sold stocks, cashed in his 401(k) and borrowed against his house.

"When it finally started crashing down, I couldn't sleep at night," Sandors said. "I would end up just sleeping on the floor because, for some reason, it felt good to be on solid ground."

The Chino project, in any event, is dead.

Stephens filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection in 2005. But Moriarty, ever the optimist, said last week that he intended to keep fighting to build some version of a manure-based power plant in California.

"It's still a good project," said Moriarty, sipping a screwdriver at a Laguna Beach bar. "There are a lot of people who I got into this deal who I am responsible for, and I want to make sure they get their money back. Maybe we won't be able to build it in Chino, but there are still dairies in other places and there's still manure that needs a place to go."

Tribes Opposed To Michigan Federal Court Nominee (AP)

Mob Figure Sentenced In Racketeering Case (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

Hai Waknine gets a 10-year term after admitting to extortion in helping an Israeli crime group launder embezzled funds.

An Israeli-born mob figure known for holding court at the hippest of Westside clubs — with wads of cash, magnums of Cristal and an array of high-end strippers and Russian blonds — was sentenced Monday to more than 10 years in prison for racketeering.

Hai Waknine, 34, abruptly pleaded guilty during his trial in June to using extortion and threats of violence to help an Israeli crime group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds.

The case against Waknine stemmed from ongoing federal probes into Israeli rings that traffic the club drug Ecstasy and launder the proceeds. Several of Waknine's associates have been convicted of Ecstasy trafficking.

Waknine and his older brother Assaf, who grew up in Van Nuys, have been on the Los Angeles Police Department's radar since they were teenagers.

Detectives questioned Hai Waknine for six hours in the killing of a teacher at Grant High School in the San Fernando Valley in 1989 and have been watching him ever since. The slaying of Hal Arthur remains unsolved.

Waknine was convicted of "second-degree coercion" in New York as part of a kidnapping attempt connected to collection of a debt owed to an L.A. jeweler.

Prosecutors had planned to introduce evidence and testimony that Waknine was widely involved in extortion, particularly within the Israeli community. He kidnapped his targets, aimed handguns at them and threatened their families, according to court documents filed by the U.S. attorney's office. One witness, convicted Ecstasy trafficker Alex Maimon, was expected to testify that "individuals in the jewelry district to whom money was owed, hired Waknine to collect the money using any means necessary."

"That was Waknine's role, a shakedown collections guy," said Assistant U.S. Atty. Thomas P. Sleisenger, who prosecuted the racketeering case. "There are a lot of people in the Israeli community who will sleep better tonight because he is behind bars."

During his sentencing Monday afternoon, Waknine asked for leniency. But citing his extensive criminal history, U.S. District Judge Manuel Real gave him 13 months in prison beyond the 108 months that prosecutors were recommending.

Waknine, standing slump-shouldered at the lectern in chains and a green T-shirt, twitched and shook his head as Real detailed his sentence. His mother sniffled. Behind her, the courtroom was standing-room only with Waknine's friends and family as well as FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents and undercover officers.

The racketeering charge that Waknine pleaded guilty to involved money embezzled from an Israeli bank that members of the Jerusalem Network, an organized crime group, wanted to hide in the United States. Waknine helped them by setting up loans to Eli Hadad, a Miami real estate developer; Yosef Atia, a Miami Ecstasy trafficker; and Viken Keuylian, a Beverly Hills Lamborghini dealer, prosecutors said.

When the debtors could not immediately repay the loans, Waknine extorted them and assessed penalties. Keuylian, for instance, was lent $950,000. Waknine demanded as repayment $2 million even after Keuylian bought him a $175,000 Ferrari 360.

The federal investigation into Ecstasy trafficking and Israeli organized crime in Los Angeles is ongoing.

A regular visitor during Waknine's trial in June was former Ohio State football star Maurice Clarett. When Clarett was arrested on weapons charges in August — allegedly wearing a bulletproof vest and carrying three loaded handguns and an AK-47-style assault rifle in his car — he told his attorney he was scared of Waknine.

DOJ_NMG_0061855

Law enforcement sources say Waknine had let Clarett live in his beachfront condo in Marina del Rey and drive his choice of luxury cars in return for a cut from the player's professional football contract. When the football contract fell through, the sources say, Waknine began demanding payment.

Waknine's attorney did not return calls seeking comment.

Cocaine Ring Busted, Feds Say (NOTP)

New Orleans Times Picayune, September 8, 2006

Nine men -- including four from Metairie, two from LaPlace and one each from Kenner and Destrehan -- have been indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine powder and crack cocaine, the U.S. attorney's office said Thursday.

Among those charged in the Aug. 31 federal grand jury indictment, which was unsealed this week, was Henry Gloston, 25, of Houston, who is accused of running kilogram-size shipments of the drugs from Houston to William Lang, 32, also known as "Tussy" or "Hood," of Metairie, one of the local defendants, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

Lang would sell the cocaine powder and crack to other defendants for distribution in Metairie and nearby, Letten said in a press release.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration's regional top agent, William Renton, the investigation has dismantled "a significant cocaine distribution organization, from wholesale and street level distributors operating in Metairie and Kenner to the Houston, Texas, source of supply."

As part of the investigation, Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies made undercover drug purchases from an additional 24 people, resulting in state warrants for related drug-trafficking crimes, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Twenty-two of the 33 defendants were arrested in a roundup early Thursday morning, the U.S. attorney's office said.

It is unclear how many of the 22 were among the nine indicted on federal charges. Those nine face a minimum federal prison term of 10 years and a maximum of life imprisonment, Letten said. Each also faces a fine of up to $1 million, and forfeiture of any proceeds the government can prove they made from the drug distribution conspiracy, the U.S. attorney's office said. Several of those indicted also face additional federal drug charges, including possession with intent to distribute cocaine powder and/or crack cocaine, the prosecutors' office said.

The investigation was the work of the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, composed of the DEA, the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and State Police narcotics agents.

The roundup was the work of the Gulf Coast High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area Task Force, assisted by the sheriff's offices from Jefferson and St. John the Baptist parishes.

Besides Lang and Gloston, those indicted were Allen Hunter, 25, of Metairie; Ricky Bozeman, 32, also known as "Slick," of Kenner; Timothy Ivey, 34, also known as "Tee," of Destrehan; Lendell Wallace, 23, also known as "Pop," and "Papa Smurf," 23, of Metairie; Darrius Brooks, 20, also known as "White," of Metairie; Lamont Williams, 31, of LaPlace; and James Wallace, 39, of LaPlace.

Each was charged with conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute cocaine powder and crack cocaine, Letten said.

Wests Enter Guilty Pleas, Face Years In Prison (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel, September 12, 2006

A Market Square businessman-turned-convicted pot peddler faces as much as nine years behind bars when sentenced later this year.

Scott West, 41, pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court to charges he conspired with his older brother, James Michael West, and others to push more than a ton of marijuana along a pipeline that ran from Arizona to Tennessee, Georgia and North Carolina.

He also admitted pumping millions of his brother's drug money into his Market Square ventures, using the dirty cash to buy several buildings on Market Square and launch businesses such as the Preservation Pub, Oodles Uncorked and World Grotto.

In a plea deal negotiated between his attorney, Donald A. Bosch, and federal prosecutors David Jennings and Hugh Ward, the entrepreneur faces a penalty range of 87 to 108 months - if he qualifies for something known as the "safety valve."

That is a provision in federal law designed to give first-time offenders a break from minimum mandatory sentences in drug cases.

"Whether or not he qualifies for the safety valve" is yet to be determined, Jennings told U.S. District Judge Thomas Phillips.

DOJ_NMG_0061856

Also pleading guilty Monday was West's wife, Bernadette Trent West, 47. She entered a guilty plea to conspiring to launder drug money. As a result of a plea negotiated by her defense attorney, David Eldridge, she faces a penalty range of 46 to 57 months.

Scott West was ordered jailed Monday. His wife remains free on bond.

Phillips has set a Dec. 1 sentencing date for Scott West and his wife. His brother and sister-in-law pleaded guilty a few weeks ago and also face sentencing later this year.

Jennings told Phillips that the U.S. Attorney's Office has agreed to allow the Market Square businesses operating in the buildings owned by the Wests to continue to operate pending a sale of the properties.

"The U.S. Attorney's Office will take no action that will negatively impact the businesses to try to accomplish a seamless transfer to a new owner," Jennings said.

The Wests were subdued at Monday's hearing, answering rote questions about their educational levels - Bernadette West has a master's degree in art education and her husband a bachelor's degree in English - and their mental states.

They listened as Jennings detailed a marijuana pipeline headed up by Mike West for a decade that funneled tons of the illegal drug from Mexico through Arizona and, ultimately, Tennessee and other Southeastern states. Scott West knew about his brother's drug trade and occasionally peddled some of the drug, Jennings said.

But it was his brother's dirty money that Scott West was most interested in, according to the prosecutor.

"Scott West knew his brother was obtaining multiple kilograms of marijuana from his source of supply in Arizona," Jennings told Phillips. "Both of these defendants knew that the proceeds Mike West was investing in Market Square were derived from drug trafficking."

Although Scott West dabbled in the drug-dealing market, his wife did not, Jennings said.

"Do you agree that's what you did?" Phillips asked Scott West.

"Yes, Your Honor," he responded. "I plead guilty, Your Honor."

"Are you pleading guilty because you are, in fact, guilty?" the judge queried.

"Yes," Scott West answered.

Eldridge issued a statement after the hearing on behalf of Bernadette West, writing, "This is a terribly sad day for Bernadette West, but she readily acknowledges that it is her own conduct that has resulted in this day coming and deeply regrets her actions."

Her husband, through Bosch, wrote that he accepts "all responsibility for my own illegal actions."

"My enthusiasm and ambition for projects clouded my judgment in a devastating way," he wrote. "I sincerely apologize to my friends and supporters for breaching their trust and confidence by allowing my ends to justify the means."

Long known for his waist-long ponytail, Scott West appeared in court Monday with his hair shorn. He explained he donated his locks to a charity group that weaves wigs for cancer patients.

Scott West said his sister, Paula West McAnally, plans to buy Earth to Old City and Preservation Pub. Although he did not identify her by name, Jennings said in court that authorities have "absolutely no evidence" that McAnally was involved in her brothers' crimes.

Scott West said his parents will continue to operate Oodles restaurant, while Suzie Dew will run World Grotto. The plea agreement makes clear, however, that the federal government will sell the buildings in which those businesses are operating. The new building owner can decide what will become of those businesses.

The West brothers and their wives came under the scrutiny of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Internal Revenue Service when a courier for Mike West was nabbed in January as he delivered more than $300,000 to alleged supplier Phillip A. Apodaca in Arizona.

DEA Agents Dave Lewis and Michael Davis and IRS Agent Brian Grove led the probe against the Wests.

Pot Growers Sentenced To Federal Prison (AP)

AP, September 11, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- Prison terms were handed down for two defendants convicted in unrelated cases involving marijuana cultivation, federal prosecutors announced Monday.

Daniel Barton, 31, of Carlsbad, who managed a substantial marijuana "grow" operation at a residence in Valley Center, was sentenced to 37 months behind bars.

Barton pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge stemming from the cultivation of 532 marijuana plants. He admitted that the entire Valley Center residence was used to cultivate marijuana plants from August 2003 to July 21, 2005, when DEA agents executed a search warrant at the location.

DOJ_NMG_0061857

In the second case, Christopher DeMatteis, 29, was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison after pleading guilty to a conspiracy charge involving 555 marijuana plants. He admitted that he was the caretaker and operator of a substantial marijuana "grow" operation in Oceanside, which was owned by his brother and co-defendant, Eric DeMatteis, who also pleaded guilty.

2 Ex-Teammates Of Cycling Star Admit Drug Use (NYT)

By Juliet Macur

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Two of Lance Armstrong's eight teammates from the 1999 Tour de France have admitted for the first time that they used the banned endurance-boosting drug EPO in preparing for the race that year, when they helped Armstrong capture the first of his record seven titles.

Their disclosures, in interviews with The New York Times, are rare examples of candor in a sport protected by a powerful code of silence. The confessions come as cycling is reeling from doping scandals, including Floyd Landis's fall in July from Tour champion to suspected cheat.

One of the two teammates who admitted using EPO while on Armstrong's United States Postal Service team is Frankie Andreu, a 39-year-old retired team captain who had been part of Armstrong's inner circle for more than a decade. In an interview at his home in Dearborn, Mich., Andreu said that he took EPO for only a few races and that he was acknowledging his use now because he thought doping was damaging his sport. Continued doping and denial by riders may scare away fans and sponsors for good, he said.

"There are two levels of guys," Andreu said. "You got the guys that cheat and guys that are just trying to survive."

The other rider who said he used EPO spoke on condition of anonymity because he said he did not want to jeopardize his job in cycling.

"The environment was certainly one of, to be accepted, you had to use doping products," he said. "There was very high pressure to be one of the cool kids."

Neither rider ever tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs, but both said they felt as if they had to take EPO to make the Tour team in 1999. Andreu would not say specifically when he took the drug, and the second rider said he did not use EPO during the Tour. Anti-doping experts say the benefits of taking EPO, the synthetic hormone erythropoietin, which boosts stamina by bolstering the body's production of oxygen-rich red blood cells, can last several weeks or more.

Both of Armstrong's former teammates also said they never saw Armstrong take any banned substances.

Armstrong, who turns 35 next week, has long been dogged by accusations that he doped before and after his remarkable recovery from cancer, a comeback that made him a transcendent cultural figure and a symbol to cancer patients and survivors worldwide. He has repeatedly denied using performance-enhancing drugs and has aggressively defended himself in interviews and through lawsuits, even more than a year into his retirement.

Multiple attempts to interview Armstrong for this article — through his lawyers, his agent and a spokesman — were unsuccessful. His agent, Bill Stapleton, wrote in an e-mail message yesterday that Armstrong would not comment because he was attending a meeting of the President's Cancer Panel in Minneapolis.

Armstrong once said that cycling had no secrets and that hard work was the key to winning. Recent events and disclosures, however, demonstrate that cycling does, indeed, have secrets.

Dozens of interviews with people in the sport as well as court documents in a contract dispute between Armstrong and a company called SCA Promotions reveal the protective silence shared by those in professional cycling. A new picture of the sport emerges: a murky world of clandestine meetings, mysterious pills and thermoses that clink with the sound of drug vials rattling inside them.

This year's Tour began with a doping investigation that implicated nearly 60 riders and ended with Landis's testing positive for synthetic testosterone. He became the third of Armstrong's former lieutenants to fail a drug test after setting off on his own career as a lead rider.

"There's no doubt that cyclists have bought into the institutional culture of cheating, and that's a big, big problem for the sport," said Steven Ungerleider, a research psychologist, antidoping expert and consultant for college, Olympic and professional sports organizations. He described that culture as "a mob psychology."

A Widespread Problem

In his 12 years as a professional cyclist, Frankie Andreu was a domestique, a worker bee whose job was to help a top rider like Armstrong win.

He said his introduction to performance-enhancing drugs came in 1995, when he and Armstrong were with the Motorola team. He said some of the team's riders felt that they could no longer compete with some European teams that had rapidly improved and were rumored to be using EPO.

DOJ_NMG_0061858

Motorola's top riders asked their doctor, Massimo Testa, about the drug's safety because more than a dozen young riders in Europe had died mysteriously of heart attacks. Some cyclists had linked those deaths to rumored EPO use.

Dr. Testa, now a sports medicine specialist at the University of California at Davis, said in a telephone interview that he had given each rider literature about EPO, in case any of them decided to use it on their own.

Dr. Testa said he urged the riders not to take the drug, but he wanted them to be educated.

"If you want to use a gun, you had better use a manual, rather than to ask the guy on the street how to use it," he said. "I cannot rule out that someone did it."

One of Armstrong's teammates, Steve Swart, has admitted using EPO while riding for Motorola. He discussed his time with the team in the book "L.A. Confidential: The Secrets of Lance Armstrong," which was published in 2004, only in French.

The book's allegations that Armstrong doped prompted the lawsuit between Armstrong and SCA Promotions, which was settled out of court in February. Because of Armstrong's suspected drug use, SCA withheld a $5 million bonus after he won the 2004 Tour de France. Armstrong and Tailwind Sports, the company that owned his cycling team, sued SCA for the money.

Testimony in the case was never supposed to become public. A confidential settlement awarded Armstrong and Tailwind Sports the bonus, and $2.5 million in interest and lawyers' costs. The Times obtained the legal documents in July.

In testimony in the case, Swart, a retired rider from New Zealand, said top riders on Motorola discussed EPO in 1995. He testified that Armstrong told teammates that there was "only one road to take" to be competitive. In a sworn deposition, Swart said the meaning of Armstrong's comment was clear: "We needed to start a medical program of EPO."

EPO, cortisone and testosterone were common in European cycling, Swart said in a telephone interview. He said using cortisone, a steroid, was regarded as "sucking on a candy stick." Cyclists acquired the drugs from European pharmacies and took them in private, Swart said. "You basically became your own doctor," he said.

He said signs of drug use were widespread at the 1994 and 1995 Tours, when there was no testing for EPO.

"Everyone was walking around with their own thermos, and you could hear the sound — tinkle, tinkle, tinkle — coming from the thermoses because they were filled with ice and vials of EPO," Swart said. "You needed to keep the EPO cold, and every night at the hotel, the guys would be running around trying to find some ice to fill up their thermos."

'It Was for Lance'

In the weeks before the 1999 Tour, Andreu's wife, Betsy, found one of those thermoses in her refrigerator. She was furious.

"I remember Frankie saying: 'You don't understand. This is the only way I can even finish the Tour,' " she said. " 'After this, I promise you, I'll never do it again.' "

Betsy Andreu said she grudgingly watched her husband help Armstrong traverse the mountains at the Tour that year. Later, she said, she was angry when her husband said he had once allowed a team doctor to inject him with an unidentified substance.

To this day, she blames Armstrong for what she said was pressure on teammates to use drugs. Her husband, she said, "didn't use EPO for himself, because as a domestique, he was never going to win that race."

"It was for Lance," she said.

Three years earlier, she and Frankie, who were engaged at the time, visited Armstrong at an Indiana hospital after he received his cancer diagnosis. Last fall, under court order to testify in the SCA Promotions case, the Andreus said that they had overheard Armstrong tell doctors he had used steroids, testosterone, cortisone, growth hormone and EPO.

Armstrong testified that no one at the hospital had asked him if he had used performance-enhancing drugs. He testified that Betsy Andreu had lied because "she hates me," and that Frankie Andreu had lied because "he's trying to back up his old lady."

Frankie Andreu, once Armstrong's close friend and roommate, testified that he never knew if Armstrong was doping. But once, he testified, he saw Armstrong sorting "little round pills" on his bed before a race. "He talked about that he would take these at different parts during the race," Andreu said under oath, adding that he did not know what the pills were. Armstrong testified that they were caffeine.

Johan Bruyneel, the longtime director of Armstrong's team, did not respond to an interview request through a team spokesman.

In a news conference he held at this year's Tour, Armstrong said his opponents in the SCA case were "crushed — totally crushed" upon cross-examination.

Sean Breen, one of Armstrong's lawyers, said the opposing witnesses were not credible. In the case of Betsy Andreu, Breen said, "Like her testimony, I think her motives are completely unexplainable." He added that Frankie Andreu's dismissal as a rider on the United States Postal Service team after the 2000 season might have been one reason for their testimony. (Andreu returned to the team the next year as the team's American director.)

DOJ_NMG_0061859

Armstrong has said he never tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs. He tested positive for cortisone at the 1999 Tour, but he was not penalized after producing a doctor's prescription for a skin cream he said he used for saddle sores.

At this year's Tour, Armstrong said he was tired of dealing with doping accusations.

"Why keep fighting lawsuits when my time needs to be spent being a dad, being a philanthropist, being a fan of cycling, being a guy that just wants to have fun?" he said.

Pat McQuaid, president of the International Cycling Union, the sport's governing body, said the union's lawyers would review the SCA Promotions case after they prepared files on the riders implicated in the Spanish doping scandal that preceded this year's Tour. In May, the Spanish police raided several apartments in Madrid and seized steroids, hormones, EPO, nearly 100 bags of frozen blood and equipment for treating blood. The Tour began in July with nine riders being barred from the event after they were implicated in the investigation.

Cleaning Up the Sport

Armstrong has kept his distance from cycling's recent troubles.

He is training for the New York City Marathon in November. In a few weeks, Armstrong will celebrate the 10th anniversary of his cancer diagnosis, and he has a new line of apparel from Nike commemorating the date.

At the same time, some of his former teammates and rivals are struggling.

Ivan Basso of Italy, Jan Ullrich of Germany and Francisco Mancebo of Spain — who finished second, third and fourth when Armstrong won the 2005 Tour — were all implicated in the Spanish scandal. Government and sports authorities continue to investigate them.

One of Armstrong's former lieutenants, the 2004 Olympic champion Tyler Hamilton, was also named in the Spanish investigation. His two-year suspension for blood doping in 2004 ends this month, but his future remains uncertain. The cycling union said it would seek a lifetime ban for Hamilton if he were found guilty of wrongdoing in the Spanish case.

Another former lieutenant of Armstrong's, Roberto Heras of Spain, tested positive for EPO last year. He is serving a two-year suspension.

Landis, meanwhile, could be stripped of his Tour title. The United States Anti-Doping Agency is expected to decide whether to charge Landis with a doping violation sometime in the next week, according to Landis's lawyer, Howard Jacobs.

All of those cyclists have denied using performance-enhancing drugs, but antidoping officials hope that will change, if those athletes have, indeed, doped.

Travis Tygart, general counsel for the United States Anti-Doping Agency, says he encourages athletes to be honest. "Those who stand up will hopefully influence other competitors in the sport to be clean," he said.

Ultimately, Frankie Andreu said, only riders can clean up cycling.

"There's always going to be the guy who denies and denies that he's ever used something," he said. "Nobody really knows what that guy is really doing when he goes home and closes the door."

Weapons Come From Many Sources (MHCA)

By Julia Reynolds And George B. Sánchez

Monterey (CA) Herald, September 12, 2006

For years, Salinas police have said that most of the guns used in local crimes in the city were stolen individually during residential burglaries. Police reports indicate that there have been no significant robberies of local gun stores, and most firearms acquired in the city are bought legally.

But over the last 20 years, the city has also had several notable episodes of organized gun trafficking, as the following cases show.

One unexpected source of cheap handguns was the Santa Ana Police Department. In the 1990s, it was not uncommon for police departments to sell confiscated weapons to gun dealers. In 1993, an Assembly analysis found that most of the weapons sold were the type used for hunting or collection value and were not cheap "Saturday Night Specials."

But one exception was a sale by the Santa Ana Police Department through a Modesto broker of 25 small pistols to Justin Davis, proprietor of the now-defunct JKD Shooting Sports in Salinas for $30 each. Davis told a reporter he bought the .25-caliber pistols because a factory had temporarily stopped making them.

"The police are just partners in the recirculating of these weapons onto the streets of California after these weapons have been taken away," then-Sen. Tom Hayden, D-Santa Monica, complained at the time.

Salinas police Cmdr. Kelly McMillin said officers later learned that an employee of JKD was illegally selling firearms in Salinas.

"He was dealing guns out of a truck," McMillin said.

Also in 1993, a United Parcel Service supervisor used his position to funnel guns to a Salinas gang.

DOJ_NMG_0061860

Nelson Baligod, then 24, was a supervisor at a Salinas UPS facility who posed as an employee of local gun shops when he ordered 17 handguns from national distributors.

Some of the weapons were used in bank robberies, convenience store holdups and shootings, an agent at the San Jose office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told the San Jose Mercury News.

Surprise for dealer|

The investigation began when Salinas police detective Ken Wynne traced a crime weapon to a King City firearms dealer and learned the dealer never ordered the gun.

When Baligod ordered the guns, he provided the names and license numbers of local firearms dealers. He had the orders shipped COD but intercepted the shipments and paid for them, never delivering them to the unknowing gun sellers. Baligod pleaded guilty to federal firearms violations.

One source that has helped flood Salinas with firepower is the Nuestra Familia prison gang, which for decades has held a strong base in the city.

Paul Salcido, a Nuestra Familia member who was convicted of murder and attempted murder, testified before a federal grand jury in 2001 that NF members in Salinas were buying brand new guns in the manufacturer's packaging.

Salcido testified that there were "a lot of individuals coming from Arizona that were purchasing guns from drug dealers down there.... They would come to us and ask us, 'Do you want to buy any weapons?'"

"If it was fresh out of the box, it'd be $250. If it was just like a floater gun, not brand new or nothing like that, it'd go for maybe $100 or maybe $150."

Salcido added that he never threw out his own guns after using them in a crime.

"Me, personally, I never discarded. I always gave it to another individual."

Melted or buried|

Asked where the guns are now, Salcido said he believed they were later buried or melted down.

Brothers Michael and Jerry Esteban were the subjects of a joint investigation by the FBI, ATF and Salinas police.

An attorney for the Monterey County District Attorney's Office said Esteban was one of the largest single-source suppliers of guns to Norteños in Salinas for the last seven years.

In 2001, Nuestra Familia "regiment commander" Armando Santa Cruz was in charge of arming a crew of young gang members who sold heroin in the city's Chinatown district. According to FBI reports, Santa Cruz bought North China Industries SKS rifles from Esteban, also known as "Shackles," and described by federal agents as affiliated with the Sons of Samoa street gang.

To fulfill an order for his Nuestra Familia boss, Santa Cruz obtained two SKS rifles from Esteban, the FBI reported. The guns were delivered in the parking lot of a Rohnert Park restaurant in exchange for $1,000 cash.

Unfortunately for Santa Cruz, his Nuestra Familia boss was also working undercover for the government. The FBI had secretly videotaped the SKS delivery, and Santa Cruz was charged in state and federal courts for racketeering, gang activity, gun and drug trafficking, as well as a murder conspiracy case in Salinas.

Records show at least one of the rifles was first sold at a Texas gun shop seven years earlier.

Esteban worked delivering grocery items to stores in Monterey and San Benito counties. The court received more than a half dozen letters from friends and relatives characterizing him as a responsible community member.

Rifles and handguns|

In a 2003 indictment, federal prosecutors said Esteban was found in possession of a silencer, ammunition and 11 weapons, including an Israel Military Industries UZI 9 mm pistol, a North China Industries MAK-90 rifle, a Ruger Mini-14 .223-caliber rifle, a Smith & Wesson Highway Patrolman .357-caliber pistol, an Israel Military Industries Desert Eagle .44-caliber pistol, and other rifles and revolvers.

In 2004, after initially pleading not guilty in a San Jose federal court, Esteban agreed to a federal sentence of 10 years for selling the Smith & Wesson revolver and $4,400 worth of methamphetamine.

"The types of weapons -- silencers, machine guns, AK-47s, firearms with obliterated serial numbers -- as well as multiple pounds of narcotics purchased by an ATF undercover agent and confidential informant underscores the significance of removing this criminal from our community," ATF spokeswoman Marti McKee said.

A study by the bureau found that 53 percent of Salinas crime guns picked up by police were first purchased from legal firearms dealers in Monterey County, and a third were bought from licensed dealers within 10 miles of the city.

Arms change hands|

But a full 81 percent had changed hands at least once, the report said, "and could have been legally transferred, straw purchased, otherwise trafficked, stolen or a combination."

DOJ_NMG_0061861

When crime guns are bought legally, criminals sometimes use what's called a "straw buyer," someone without a criminal record, often a wife or girlfriend. That's the name that shows up on the required background check and dealer record of sale, or DRS.

"Straw purchases are still common," said Salinas police commander McMillin. "Salinas police review all DRSes. They go through them looking for names SPD recognizes, like women who are girlfriends of gang guys."

Although Salinas crime guns change hands often, ATF analysts were surprised at what they call a short "time to crime," the time elapsed between the original sale and the first criminal act. Nearly a quarter of the guns had a time to crime of less than three years, and 11 percent had a time to crime of less than a year from their retail sale.

McMillin said that report, though published in 2002, paints a picture that still holds for today's illegal gun market.

With the number of shootings holding above 300 year after year, Salinas will keep having illegal gun problems, McMillin said, "as long as guns are free in our society."

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Fails On Welfare Reform (HILL)

By Dick Morris And Eileen Mcgann

The Hill, September 12, 2006

The decision by the Republican leadership not even to try to pass immigration reform before the election smacks of punting when they should have gone for a touchdown. America is begging for tough immigration reform and looking to the Republican Party to exercise its traditional role of leadership in law and order issues. But even without a real threat of a Democratic filibuster, the Republican Party has tripped over its own feet and given up its attempt to meet the needs of the country and of its constituents.

The Republican failure to pass immigration reform despite controlling both houses and the presidency reminds one of Hillary's inability even to get healthcare reform reported out of committee despite enjoying a similar advantage in 1994.

Republican voters are not likely to forgive GOP ineptitude and failure. With a 30-vote margin in the House and 10 in the Senate, they will find the lack of action inexplicable.

The release this week of "Border War," a film produced by the conservative grassroots group Citizens United, brings the issue home in a way that voters in general and Republicans in particular will not forget. One can only hope that congressional Republicans who have failed the country will watch the movie and reflect on their missed opportunity. The film will have very wide distribution, by DVD and in at least 125 theaters throughout the country. (Disclosure: We are working with Citizens United on a film due out this spring on our old friend Hillary Rodham Clinton but we had no involvement in "Border War".)

With more than 10 million illegal immigrants in the U.S., the GOP failure to pass a bill is hard to understand.

A compromise was practically begging to be reached. Republican voters supported the Senate bill's earned path to citizenship and did not see it as amnesty. They know it is not feasible to return ten million people to their countries of origin, and they get it that a democracy cannot have a permanent lawless class living in its midst.

On the other hand, the Republican base and the rest of the country strongly support a border fence. And cracking down on employers who hire illegals is wildly popular on both sides of the political divide.

One cannot help but compare the cowardly refusal to work out a deal on immigration with the bravery on the part of President Clinton and Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss) in negotiating a welfare reform deal. In 1996, the two leaders got together to pass one of the most significant bills since World War II.

The Citizens United film documents how our porous border invited coyotes to exploit would-be immigrants and invites human trafficking. It emphasizes the risk to the immigrant and to the country of a border that can be breached, but only at great danger to those who try it.

But the Republican Party was scared by its talk radio acolytes into inaction. So fearful were they of aroused Hispanic-Americans on the one hand and angry white males — and females — on the other that they forgot their duty to lead and to compromise for progress.

Whether or not the Republicans keep control of Congress in the 2006 election, their numbers will be reduced. The chances of a good immigration reform bill will decline proportionally. A splendid opportunity will have passed, and will not soon return.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including Rewriting History, a rebuttal to Living History by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Keep The Immigration Debate Civil (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0061862

By Arnold Schwarzenegger

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

BY NOT FINISHING comprehensive immigration reform this year, Congress left behind a poisoned debate that will continue to fuel a growing anger in our country.

Latino leaders, meeting in Los Angeles last week, were already debating whether they should continue marching in the streets, disrupt the economy or register voters. At the same time, people who are angry about the federal government's failure to stop illegal immigration have introduced local measures to take away housing, jobs and even medical assistance from noncitizens in their communities. On both sides, people are demanding to be heard.

Now Congress has walked away from the debate, at least for this year. So it's up to the rest of us to tone down our rhetoric and listen to the voices on all sides. As both an immigrant to this country and a proud American citizen, I have a unique perspective on this debate. I also have some advice.

To the immigrant rights activists I say: Change your message. When I came to America, I wrapped myself in the flag because I wanted to be a part of the American dream. I worked hard, learned English and followed the laws. I learned the customs and culture of my new country. I spent time with English-speakers just so I could hear them talk and learn the language from them.

Being an immigrant is like being a guest in someone's house. Your hosts go about their daily routine. You can sit on the couch and do your own thing, or you can ask, "What can I do to help? How can I be a part of this household?"

What people see today when immigrant rights activists march in the streets carrying Mexican flags and angry signs is that you do not want to join America's house. The message that sends is that you do not want to learn our language or our culture. Unlike the message sent by the masses of Irish, Italian, German and Asian immigrants, whom Americans now proudly call our "melting pot," these images suggest that Mexican immigrants do not want to make that effort.

I do not believe that this is the message most Mexican immigrants — legal or illegal — wish to send. I believe that most Mexican immigrants are as proud to be part of America as I was. They are some of the hardest working and strongest believers in the American dream. So my message to you is: Carry your home country in your heart, but carry the American flag in our streets.

To those who believe illegal immigration is reaching a crisis level in this country I say: Tone down the rhetoric. I myself have said things that caused division even when that was not my intent. Words can be weapons. We must be careful to distinguish between legal and illegal immigration, between those who break our laws to do us harm and those who break our laws to find freedom and prosperity in the greatest nation on Earth. It is hypocritical for Congress to condemn people for coming here illegally when the federal government has been unwilling to do what it takes to stop them from coming in the first place.

Now that they are here, what do we do? Amnesty is not the answer. Congress granted amnesty in 1986 and promised it would end the problem. It didn't. Amnesty only made it worse. You don't reward people for breaking the law. And you don't grant someone the rights of citizenship simply by virtue of how long they have been in this country illegally — that makes a mockery of the law and penalizes those who waited years and followed the rules.

But it is not realistic either to round up 12 million people and send them home. Many have families here now, children and grandchildren who are citizens. Splitting them up would be inhumane. Some say it would cost as much as $250 billion to even try. Who would pay for that? It is simply not realistic.

The answer, as I have repeatedly said, is, first, to secure the border to stop the problem from getting worse. Second, we must create a temporary-worker program so people can come here legally to work. We should also lift the cap on work visas for industries such as technology, engineering and agriculture so immigrants can be hired when there are not enough U.S. workers. And we must create a path to legal status for those living in the shadows illegally. They must pay a fine for breaking our laws. They must learn English and become part of our culture. They must pay back taxes and pay for healthcare and education rather than expect American taxpayers to pay extra when some cannot even afford healthcare or college for their own children.

Unfortunately, we must wait for Congress to return next year to take up the critical issue of comprehensive immigration reform. Meanwhile, we must do all we can to stop the problem from getting worse and to maintain a civil debate about illegal immigration.

Arizona Primary Will Test GOP Immigration Strategy (HILL)

By Amy Sherman

The Hill, September 12, 2006

The House's final immigration field hearing planned today in Washington coincides with the Arizona primary, and political analysts are watching the elections closely to see how immigration resonates with voters.

DOJ_NMG_0061863

In Arizona's open 8th congressional district, conservative GOP candidate Randy Graf and moderate Steve Huffman are squaring off to replace outgoing Rep. Jim Kolbe.

Graf press secretary R.T. Gregg said House Republicans' immigration hearings over the August recess have helped focus attention on an important issue for the district.

"It was good that members of Congress came to this district that is most affected by illegal immigration to see first hand the effects of illegal immigration," he said, "particularly given the lack of attention our current Congressman from this district has given this most pressing problem."

Gregg also criticized the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) for pouring money into the district to benefit Huffman. Last week alone, the NRCC spent $122,000 on an ad campaign designed to benefit Huffman.

"[Immigration] is on the minds of voters...," he said. However, Gregg argued that "intervention by power brokers in Washington has tended to cloud the issue...[the question becomes] whether the seat is for sale."

Huffman's campaign did not return a call for comment by press time.

TAX:

Glaxo To Settle Tax Dispute With IRS Over U.S. Unit For $3.4 Billion (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews And Jeanne Whalen

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Pharmaceutical giant GlaxoSmithKline PLC will pay the U.S. government $3.4 billion to settle a nearly two-decade-long dispute over how to tax dealings between the British company and its American subsidiary, in a case that underscores the Internal Revenue Service's resolve to confront corporate tax avoidance.

The settlement, which the IRS said was the largest ever, covers taxes the agency said Glaxo owed for 1989 through 2005 because the company's American unit improperly overpaid its British parent for drugs, mainly the antiulcer blockbuster Zantac. It said those overpayments reduced the company's profit in the U.S., thus lowering its U.S. tax bill.

The Glaxo settlement could help bolster the IRS's crackdown on corporate taxpayers. It follows a string of tax-shelter victories the IRS has racked up in court in the past year against such companies as General Electric Co., Black & Decker Corp. and aerospace-products maker Coltec Industries Inc.

Glaxo's decision to settle the dispute, which was headed for a trial in U.S. Tax Court in February, was particularly sweet for the IRS because it has a poor track record of winning disputes involving the accounting practice at stake in the Glaxo case. That practice, called "transfer pricing," is the art of attaching a monetary value to trademarks, patents, research and other intangibles that one arm of a multinational company transfers to another.

Transfer pricing determines how costs are distributed between the far-flung arms of a multinational company, and thus what profit is booked in what country. Higher costs cut into profit, lowering a company's tax bill, while lower costs do the opposite.

"Over the past 10 to 20 years, the government has brought a good number of transfer-pricing cases and come away with clear victories in very few of them," said Philip R. West, a tax partner at law firm Steptoe & Johnson in Washington.

Disputes over transfer pricing tend to be among the biggest fights between the IRS and corporate taxpayers, and they are of growing importance since more than 60% of world trade occurs inside multinational companies. Every country wants to maximize the tax revenue on goods and services produced within its borders, and every company has an incentive to book profits where taxes are lowest. That has bred a slew of disputes between companies and tax authorities over the proper pricing.

Julian Heslop, Glaxo's chief financial officer, called transfer-pricing disputes among the toughest issues for corporations to resolve with tax authorities. "It's probably the most complicated area of taxation in the world. It's not like buying a TV, where there is a market price," he said. "There isn't a market price within a company. There's quite a range of what might be acceptable."

Symantec Corp., a Cupertino, Calif., software maker, is currently in a $1 billion transfer-pricing Tax Court dispute with the IRS involving an Irish subsidiary of Veritas Software Corp., a company it acquired in 2005. The IRS is arguing that licensing fees paid by the subsidiary to Veritas in the U.S. were too low and that Veritas credited the U.S. business with too much of the cost of developing some technology. That wound up increasing the income of the subsidiary in Ireland -- a lower-tax country -- at the expense of income in the U.S., lowering the company's overall tax bill. Symantec has sued the IRS in U.S. Tax Court.

Motorola Inc., the Schaumburg, Ill., cellphone and telecommunications-equipment maker, is in a dispute with the IRS that could result in additional taxes of roughly $800 million, largely related to transfer pricing, according to company disclosures.

"The settlement of this case," said IRS Commissioner Mark Everson of the Glaxo case "sends a strong message of our resolve to continue to deal with this issue going forward." Chief IRS counsel Donald Korb added that it showed that "our lawyers can go up against the best firms the private tax bar has to offer...and achieve quite successful results."

Glaxo said that, despite the settlement's massive size, it won't have any significant impact on the company's reported earnings. Glaxo had set aside £2.3 billion ($4.3 billion) to cover tax disputes. Mr. Heslop, the company's chief financial officer, said a significant amount of that sum related to the U.S. dispute. He said the company was confident it would prevail in the case but settled because of the time and cost of litigation, which had been expected to last two to three years, including the inevitable appeals.

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Glaxo's American depositary shares were up 17 cents at $55.25.

The majority of transfer-pricing cases are settled out of court. The trickiest involve, as the Glaxo case did, the value of intangibles, such as brand names. A Toyota automobile made in Japan, for instance, is worth more in the U.S. than the sum of its steel, rubber and electronics, because the Toyota brand name adds value. Attaching a price figure to that value can be a contentious affair.

In an attempt to simplify transfer-pricing guidelines, the IRS changed its rules in the 1990s. The Glaxo case, which dates to 1989, fell under old rules, which gave companies more leeway in determining prices.

Under the current rules, "I would be astonished that a company would take as far-out a position" as Glaxo did under the old ones, said H. David Rosenbloom, a Washington lawyer with Caplin & Drysdale. "Their auditors would be hanging off the ceiling."

Under the new rules, which came into widespread use in the late 1990s, a company must document a "reasonable" calculation for its transfer pricing; in the past, the burden was on the IRS to prove the calculation inaccurate. In addition, the IRS now has the power to levy a 40% penalty -- in addition to taxes owed -- if it wins a dispute, another reason for companies to avoid resisting the IRS as long as Glaxo did.

In addition, the IRS today often avoids levying penalties, beyond taxes owed, if companies can show they made a good-faith effort to come up with a meaningful price; in the past, the IRS had little option but to examine a company's books in detail and try to discern if an appropriate rationale was used to determine the internal pricing.

In the Glaxo case, the company contended the value of drugs it sold in the U.S. was in the research and development done in Britain, and that that justified the high price the British parent charged the American unit for the drugs. The biggest chunk of profit at issue stems from Zantac, which was the world's best-selling drug from the mid-1980s to the mid-1990s, at one point accounting for half of the company's total revenue. Glaxo paid taxes in Britain on the Zantac profit but less than it would have paid had the profit been assigned to the U.S.

The IRS argued that marketing efforts by Glaxo in the U.S. were critical to Zantac's success, and thus more of the income should have been attributed to the American unit -- and subject to U.S. tax. The IRS said the company has conceded more than 60% of the amount at issue in court. Glaxo said the net cash cost of the settlement would be $3.1 billion, including federal, state and local taxes; interest, and deductions for the taxes paid.

In its 2005 annual report, Glaxo said a transfer-pricing dispute it was discussing with British tax authorities for the years 1995 to date could also lead to litigation. A Glaxo spokeswoman yesterday said the British dispute wasn't related to the case settled in the U.S.

Internal Revenue Service, Glaxo Settle Biggest Tax Dispute In History (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mary Dalrymple, Ap Tax Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Drug giant GlaxoSmithKline agreed to pay $3.4 billion (â,¬2.67 billion) in the largest tax settlement in IRS history, resolving a dispute from the 1980s over the multinational company's U.S. profits.

The disagreement concerned how much of the profits from certain drugs, particularly the ulcer and heartburn medication Zantac, should be attributed to U.S. subsidiaries of GlaxoSmithKline PLC and, therefore, subject to tax.

GlaxoSmithKline Holdings (Americas) Inc. agreed to pay $3.4 billion (â,¬2.67 billion) to settle taxes owed from 1989 through 2005, the Internal Revenue Service said Monday. After deductions for state and local taxes, the company will pay $3.1 billion (â,¬2.44 billion) in cash. Glaxo said it had set money aside for the dispute, and the settlement will not have a significant effect on its reported earnings.

The company also said drug prices for customers will not be affected.

As part of the settlement, Glaxo abandoned its claim for a $1.8 billion (â,¬1.42 billion) tax refund. Glaxo spokeswoman Patty Seif said the IRS had rejected the company's refund claim and held that Glaxo owed $8.3 billion (â,¬6.53 billion) for taxes due from 1989 through 2000.

That case had been scheduled for trial at the U.S. Tax Court in February.

Seif said the company calculated it could have owed $14 billion (â,¬11.01 billion) to $15 billion (â,¬11.8 billion) in taxes through 2005 if the IRS had prevailed in court.

DOJ_NMG_0061865

The company said it was confident of its position but that "in view of the size of the potential financial exposure, as well as the continued level of resource being applied to the case, GSK concluded that it was in the best interests of its shareholders to reach this settlement, thereby removing the costs and uncertainty of future litigation."

The IRS has been looking more closely at multinational tax practices and the complex transactions that cross borders in the globalized economy. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson this summer told a Senate committee investigating offshore tax abuses that the complexities of globalization and cross-border transactions "create opportunities for aggressive tax planning."

IRS Chief Counsel Donald Korb said Monday that a "key focus" for tax collectors is transfer pricing, the issue involved in the Glaxo dispute, as one area where some multinational companies could take advantage of the global economy to move some profits to a country with lower or no taxes.

Transfer pricing describes the practice within companies for setting a price on goods, services and property when moving them among subsidiaries of a multinational company.

The questions in the Glaxo case concerned how much profits should be attributed to the U.S. based on sales and marketing done in the U.S. and intellectual property owned by the British parent corporation, as well as activities in other countries.

"We have consistently said that transfer pricing is one of the most significant challenges for us in the area of corporate tax administration," Everson said. "The settlement of this case is an important development and sends a strong message of our resolve to continue to deal with this issue going forward."

Former Tyco Tax Officer Is Charged With Filing A False IRS Return (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The former top tax official at Tyco International Ltd. was charged with filing a false tax return for the company that failed to report more than $170 million in income.

Raymond Scott Stevenson, who was vice president in charge of taxation at the manufacturing-and-services conglomerate until 2003, pleaded not guilty before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla., to a felony fraud charge. He was released on $100,000 bail.

According to the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, of Delray Beach, Fla., directed a "series of transactions" designed to reduce Tyco's state tax liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in capital gains under federal tax code. The capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the Internal Revenue Service's criminal division. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson "left off" the $170 million, Ms. Michaud said. Mr. Stevenson's attorney, Carl Schoeppl, was traveling and unavailable for comment.

The transaction may have been related to one of the company's acquisitions, Tyco spokeswoman Sheri Woodruff said. She declined to elaborate. Mr. Stevenson, who worked in the company's Boca Raton, Fla., office, was fired from Tyco in 2003 after five years with the company, Ms. Woodruff said.

She declined to say why he was dismissed. Tyco, which is registered in Bermuda but operates from West Windsor, N.J., has been cooperating with the IRS on an investigation into Mr. Stevenson for at least two years, she said. Ms. Michaud said the investigation is continuing.

Mr. Stevenson was hired under Tyco management led by former chief executive L. Dennis Kozlowski, who left Tyco in June of 2002 and last year was convicted along with former finance chief Mark Swartz of looting more than $150 million from the giant conglomerate. Both men are in prison and have said they plan to appeal.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP, Dems Take Contrasting Approaches To Ethics Reform (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

USA TODAY's view on government corruption rightly chastises Republicans for their failure to pass the reforms necessary to break the links between Congress and special interests. But by failing to draw a distinction between the policy positions of the two parties, the editorial unfairly implicates Democrats in the Republican ruse to block real reform. In fact, there are real differences between the two parties' plans ("Scandal? What scandal? Congress ducks ethics reform," Our view, Government corruption debate, Wednesday).

This past spring, Democrats voted in favor of a true reform bill, the Honest Leadership & Open Government Act, which would ban gifts and travel from lobbyists and the organizations that retain them; prohibit official travel on corporate jets; extend the ban on former members' lobbying to two years; require greater disclosure of lobbyist contacts; mandate fair and open debate in the Congress; and impose tough new standards to end waste, fraud and abuse.

House Republicans, in contrast, put forward only a sham of a proposal, which USA TODAY has rightly called an “anemic excuse” for reform. The Republican bill would not even put an end to the lobbyist financed gifts and travel that are at the heart of the Republican culture of corruption that has plagued Washington.

Democrats stand with the American people and public watchdog groups, such as Common Cause, in support of strong anti-corruption laws. Republicans side with former majority leader Tom DeLay, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the special interests such as Big Oil and the prescription-drug companies that line their pockets and fund their congressional campaigns.

Unfortunately, Republicans have turned this Congress into the most corrupt and closed in history. Democrats want to take Congress in a new direction, to make it the most open and honest in history.

Navy Officials Tried To Fire Chaplain Prior To Charges (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

Internal e-mails indicate that the Navy was moving to fire an outspoken chaplain even before he was charged with disobeying an order.

Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, whose court-martial is scheduled to begin today in Norfolk, yesterday said the e-mails given to his defense team prove that the Navy was plotting to fire him after he had complained publicly about a commander censoring his sermons.

"They were firing me not because I wore my uniform in front of the White House," said Lt. Klingenschmitt, who, despite being ordered not to, participated in a protest of a Navy policy limiting chaplains to "nonsectarian" expressions outside worship services.

"They were firing me eight days before that, because I was a whistleblower to Congress. I was not only punished for quoting the Bible in the chapel, I was punished for exposing that to Congress and the newspapers. It's reprisal, and I'm asking Congress to investigate."

A week before the event, in a March 22 e-mail, Vice Adm. John Harvey, the Navy's top personnel officer, sent an e-mail to Adm. Michael Mullen, the chief of naval operations. In it, Adm. Harvey endorsed a recommendation from Lt. Klingenschmitt's command at the Norfolk Naval Station that the chaplain be "involuntarily" released -- in other words, fired.

"Today, I positively endorsed and forwarded ... the request from [Naval Station, Norfolk, to] involuntarily release chaplain Klingenschmitt from active duty due to lack of career potential," Adm. Harvey wrote to Adm. Mullen.

"This officer is the individual who conducted a hunger strike in front of the White House several months ago and has engaged in other actions concerning [Department of Defense] and Navy religious ministry policies. Klingenschmitt's [commanding officer] has documented a compelling case that this officer has little career potential."

Lt. Karl Lettow, a Navy spokesman at the Pentagon, said the recommendation to fire the chaplain was never acted on by Navy civilian leaders. He said the Navy does not typically comment on correspondence between senior officers.

The Navy charged the chaplain after his March 30 public appearance with former Alabama Chief Justice Roy Moore, who led the protest. He will appear at a special court-martial, facing a jury of three to five officers.

Part of his defense is a Jan. 6 memo from his commanding officer on his request to wear his uniform during public worship. The commander cited Navy regulations that permit the wearing of uniforms when "attending or participating in a bona fide religious service or observance."

Lt. Klingenschmitt said he considers the Moore press conference as an "observance" because he was there to pray.

Lt. Klingenschmitt, a member of a small breakaway evangelical Episcopal denomination, began butting heads with his superiors after he delivered a memorial sermon aboard the cruiser USS Anzio in 2004. He says he was abiding by his faith when he preached the Gospels, including John's admonition that eternal life goes only to those who believe in the son of God.

The ship's captain did not think the sermon was inclusive and counseled Lt. Klingenschmitt, who deemed the move harassment and censorship.

"They want to take a black Magic Marker to my Bible and tell me I can't read the Scripture in the chapel," he said this summer. But a Navy investigation found his complaint "without merit."

Digging Us Out Of The Deficit With Holey Math (WP)

By Allan Sloan

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061867

Next month, the White House and its congressional allies will be taking victory laps when the deficit for fiscal 2006 is announced. The stated deficit for the year, which ends Sept. 30, will be $260 billion or so. That will be down $58 billion from 2005 and a whopping $77 billion below what the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted in January. The White House says this is happening largely because tax revenues have surged, which they have. It sure sounds great.

But let me share a dirty little secret with you: The real federal deficit isn't $260 billion. It's more than double that. And when you calculate what I consider the real deficit -- hold on to your hats, it's $558 billion -- you come out with slightly more than last year's real deficit, which I put at $551 billion. Revenue surge, shmevenue surge. Things are getting worse, not better.

That $558 billion is better than the $635 billion implied in January's CBO numbers. But it's nothing to crow about, considering that not long from now, baby boomers will begin to retire en masse and put huge pressure on the budget.

We know that numbers in Washington tend to be big and are sometimes murky. But how can the official deficit be only $260 billion while my calculation is $558 billion? Am I taking strange pills? Drinking funny water? Nope. It's the difference between Washington Math -- the unique way the federal government accounts for itself -- and real-world math.

Here's the deal. The stated deficit is the difference between the cash the government takes in and the cash it spends. That's $260 billion, the number most analysts use to measure the deficit. But Uncle Sam will also borrow almost $300 billion from federal trust funds: $177 billion from Social Security and $121 billion more from "other government accounts," such as federal-employee pension funds. About $78 billion of this total comes from the Treasury taking Social Security's cash surplus this year and spending it. Most of the rest comes from the government paying what it owes the trust funds -- primarily for interest on their $3.6 trillion of Treasury securities -- with IOUs, not cash. (All my numbers, by the way, are based on public budget documents.)

If a company tried to keep books this way, its accountants would scream faster than you can say Sarbanes-Oxley. But we're playing by the rules of Washington Math.

I readily concede that if you want to measure the deficit's effect on financial markets, using $260 billion makes sense. After all, that's how much the government is borrowing from "public investors" such as banks, foreign governments and you and me. But if you want to see how much deeper the fiscal hole is getting for taxpayers present and future, which is how I think we should measure the deficit, you have to include the almost $300 billion of trust-fund IOUs. Unless, of course, you expect Uncle Sam to default on his promises.

I've written about the differences between Washington Math and real-world math since the Clinton administration. The budget situation was improving then and got to be pretty good -- though not as good as the Clintonistas wanted us to believe -- thanks to fiscal responsibility, a surge in revenue and partisan gridlock that reined in spending.

Now things are heading the wrong way. Not enough people seem to care that we're hocking ourselves to the eyeballs and borrowing heavily from foreign lenders, such as Asian central banks, whose future national interests may differ from ours. "There's a disconnect from reality," says Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), a longtime deficit hawk who is one of the few people who calculates the budget shortfall the way I do. "It's utterly reckless," Conrad told me. "The debt load and our growing obligations to foreign creditors are weakening us. We're running risks we shouldn't run."

I agree. So when the budget victory song is sung in Washington next month, I'll curb my enthusiasm. If you're worried about our country's financial future, you'll curb yours, too.

A note about my Johnson & Johnson column ("J&J's Advantage in Pfizer Purchase: Taxes," Aug. 8): I can tell from readers' responses that I didn't make my point about J&J's purchase of Pfizer's consumer-products business as clearly as I should have. So let me try again. My problem isn't with J&J's tax savings on the deal -- it's with J&J's lack of disclosure. The tax savings are perfectly fine. But J&J hasn't disclosed anything about the savings, which by my math reduce the effective cost of the $16.6 billion deal by more than $4 billion. J&J hasn't told Wall Street about this and wouldn't discuss it with me for that column. Even for an enormous company such as J&J, $4 billion-plus is bigger than a Band-Aid. 'Nuf said.

The Milberg Effect (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Cornerstone Research released a study this summer showing a huge drop in securities class-action suits, and a common explanation has been that this is a result of new rules designed to keep the corporate community on the straight and narrow: No wrongdoing, no need for lawyers.

Well, not exactly. Lawsuits are certainly down, but a closer inspection of the numbers shows that the drop-off directly correlates with the decline in filing by one law firm: Milberg Weiss. Long the nation's premier class-action generator, the entire firm and two partners were indicted in May of paying off their class-action plaintiffs.

According to Cornerstone, a research firm that tracks litigation, law firms filed 179 class actions last year. The first six months of this year saw only 61, a rate that would result in about 123 class actions for the year -- or a decrease from 2005 of 56 suits. Meanwhile, according to publicly available press releases, Milberg Weiss filed 91 of last year's suits. Yet in the first six months of this year, having come under prosecutorial scrutiny and lost many lawyers, the firm has filed only 17. At this rate, Milberg would tally about 34 suits for the year -- or 57 fewer than 2005.

These numbers are more than a coincidence, and should put to rest the assumption that Sarbanes-Oxley or better corporate governance standards are producing fewer causes of legal action. Securities lawyers have long understood that most class actions have little or no substance but are manufactured by the plaintiffs bar to pad their own pocketbooks.

Milberg Weiss has been a master of "strike" suits, which involve suing companies for the crime of a falling stock price in the hope of forcing a settlement. In the Justice Department's indictment, Milberg plaintiffs are said to have bought certain stocks in anticipation of suing when the share price fell on some negative news. Milberg is accused of funneling millions of dollars of kickbacks to these individuals in return for their serving as a lead plaintiffs in class-action suits.

The numbers should also provide all the evidence Congress needs to conclude that the only real way to rein in America's runaway legal system is with tort reform that allows redress of genuine wrongs but limits the ability of lawyers to game the system. Milberg Weiss may be in the dock, but it's only a matter of time before other firms take up the slack.

OTHER NEWS:

Economists' Inflation Estimates Up (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, September 12, 2006

BOSTON — Inflation will rise faster than previously thought through the end of the year while economic growth will be slower, a group of prominent economists said Monday, painting an especially hazy outlook.

The National Association for Business Economics said inflation expectations rose significantly in its survey of 50 members conducted in August from its last poll released four months ago. Instead of expecting so-called core inflation, which excludes often-volatile food and energy costs, to rise 2.3% in the second half of 2006, the economists' median forecast is for the index to rise 2.9% in the third quarter and 2.7% in the fourth quarter.

At the same time, the group lowered its forecast for economic growth and job creation through the middle of next year.

“There's a lot of uncertainty out there,” Wachovia economist John Silvia says.

The inflation projections from the NABE members were far above the range of what most Federal Reserve officials, including Chairman Ben Bernanke, have said is their informal inflation comfort zone, of between 1% and 2%.

But 60% of the NABE respondents said they believed the Fed would leave interest rates — its inflation-fighting weapon — unchanged through the end of the year as they watch previous rate increases filter through the economy.

Rajeev Dhawan, director of the economic forecasting center at Georgia State University, says while inflation may be above 2%, what is important is that it is projected to slowly decline. That allows the Fed to stay on the sidelines, he says.

After raising interest rates 17 times in two years, Fed policymakers last month left their target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs economywide, at 5.25%. That is the highest level in almost six years.

Fed officials are widely expected to leave rates untouched when they meet Sept. 20. But a number of policymakers have stressed they may need to raise rates again to halt inflation.

Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan on Monday noted the “breadth and persistence” of gains in inflation in recent months and called higher inflation a “key risk” to the economy. But in a speech to NABE members, she said she expected inflation to ease in coming quarters as growth slows.

St. Louis Fed President William Poole, meanwhile, stressed the importance of the Fed being pre-emptive in fighting inflation.

“We have to have a policy that is as tight as it needs to be, but not more so … that will work these inflation rates down over a period of time,” he told reporters here.

NABE Economists Expect Slowdown But No Recession (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The U.S. economy will post below-trend growth the rest of 2006 and into 2007, but an outright recession is unlikely, according to a survey of economists released Monday by the National Association for Business Economics.

DOJ_NMG_0061869

Meanwhile, productivity should slow and inflation rise, according to NABE, but the Federal Reserve is nevertheless expected to keep interest rates steady through the end of the year and cut rates in 2007.

Speaking to the NABE Monday, Federal Reserve Bank of Boston President Cathy Minehan cautioned that inflation remains a risk, and that the Fed should remain "quite vigilant" in containing that risk even as the U.S. economy slows. (See the full text of Minehan's remarks1.)

Ms. Minehan's forecast suggests that the central bank can continue to keep rates unchanged while it surveys the economic scene. The Fed last month kept the federal funds rate at 5.25%, the first pause since the Fed began its credit-tightening campaign in mid-2004.

Regarding inflation, St. Louis Fed President William Poole said the Fed's credibility is "essential" to stable long-term inflation expectations, and "the cost of restoring credibility makes clear the reason for not losing it."

In prepared remarks, Mr. Poole repeated his support of an inflation target. He noted that he has in the past offered a "personal" objective of "zero inflation, properly measured." (Read the full text of Poole's remarks2.)

But Mr. Poole also added that Fed agreement "on an inflation objective, which some might express as a "comfort zone of 1-2% inflation" is more important than which precise specification is selected." Mr. Poole also urged greater transparency in order to reduce "asymmetries of knowledge."

"Because a full rational expectations equilibrium requires complete knowledge on the part of the private sector of central bank thinking and analysis, Federal Reserve research findings should be distributed widely," Mr. Poole said.

The U.S. economy grew at a 5.6% rate in the first quarter and 2.9% in the second. Economists generally think the U.S. economy can expand in the 3.25% range without putting pressure on inflation.

But recession is unlikely, with the NABE panel pegging just 10% odds of a recession beginning this year and a 25% chance in 2007. The biggest threat, cited by 46% of survey respondents, is higher energy prices, followed by rising interest rates and declining home prices.

Gross domestic product is projected by the 50 forecasters surveyed by NABE to expand 2.6% in the second half of 2006. For 2007, the NABE panel cut its forecast to 2.8% from the 3% rate it expected when last surveyed in May. The latest survey was conducted between Aug. 9 and 24.

Subtrend growth should lead to less hiring, with NABE cutting its payroll growth forecast through the end of 2007 by 0.3 percentage point to 1.1%. That should push the jobless rate up to 4.9% next year from its current 4.7% level.

"Given the importance of high employment, a period of sustained excessive unemployment may create doubts about future policy and this uncertainty is a manifestation of impaired credibility," Mr. Poole said.

"There is a fine balance here," Mr. Poole added, noting that when joblessness rises, "policy makers need to be able to explain in credible fashion why the problem is not a consequence of a monetary policy mistake."

Productivity will be less of a factor in limiting price pressures than it has been in the past, according to NABE. Survey respondents cut their 2006 productivity growth forecast to 2.2% from the 2.5% forecast in the May survey. Productivity next year is expected to rise just 2.1%.

Meanwhile, unit labor costs are expected to climb 2.7% this year and 2.3% next year, up from the 1.9% rate expected for both years in the May NABE survey.

But the Fed won't respond to higher inflation and labor costs by raising interest rates, according to NABE, with the median forecast for fed funds at 5.25% through the end of 2006.

One "obvious concern" to the economic outlook, Ms. Minehan said, is housing. While she's "comfortable" with forecasts for a "moderate downturn" in residential building, Ms. Minehan cautioned that recent data, including "gloomy assessments' by home builders, "remind me that this assessment could well be optimistic."

"There are clear risks to the baseline housing outlook," she said, citing the effect of higher mortgage rates on borrowers, particularly subprime borrowers.

Trade Picture Brightens (WSJ)

By Justin Lahart

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Today's trade report will probably show a whopper of a deficit for July, something that always gives investors a fright about holding U.S. dollar assets. But dig a little deeper, and it looks like a shift in the nation's trade is happening.

Economists polled by Dow Jones Newswires are looking for a July trade deficit of $65.5 billion, up from June's $64.8 billion and prospectively the third largest monthly deficit ever.

DOJ_NMG_0061870

Oil prices were ticking to new highs in July. That meant upward pressure on the value of imports and the deficit. The U.S. shortfall in oil accounts for 30% of the total trade deficit. According to the Labor Department, prices for imported petroleum products were 4.7% higher in July than they were in June.

But oil prices have dropped sharply since July, which could bring the import figure back down. Meanwhile, away from oil, imports were already looking subdued in July. Belle Morales, vice president of sales and marketing for Inglewood, Calif., logistics company Dynalink Systems, says her firm saw a 10% decrease in inbound cargo volume for July and August from a year earlier.

July is usually the beginning of the peak shipping season, when holiday orders start streaming through ports to retailers. It may be the peak season was merely delayed. Rising European demand has some Asian suppliers racing to keep up, making it harder to fill U.S. orders. It might also be that supply-chain improvements made U.S. retailers comfortable placing holiday orders later in the year, Ms. Morales says.

But maybe retailers are pushing back orders because they're afraid consumers aren't going to spend much this holiday season -- a real worry with the values of homes softening.

Even as imports slow, continued growth in Asia should keep U.S. exports strong, says Investment Technology Group economist Robert Barbera. Those exports will help boost economic growth, a plus at a time when other engines of growth seem to be slowing.

Taken together, it spells a better trade picture in the months ahead, a silver lining for investors who worry about financing the mammoth trade shortfall. The dark cloud is that weary U.S. consumers might be behind much of it.

Rising Inventory Of Unsold Homes Is Likely To Put Pressure On Prices (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

A continued rise in inventories of unsold homes in August is likely to put more downward pressure on home prices in parts of the U.S.

Inventories of homes in 18 large metropolitan areas across the country expanded by 4.7% in August from a month earlier, according to data compiled by ZipRealty Inc., a real-estate brokerage firm based in Emeryville, Calif. The data are based on single-family homes and condos included in local multiple-listing services of homes for sale.

The biggest increases -- 16% in the Dallas area and 13% in Seattle -- came in markets that have been relatively strong recently. A sharp rise in inventories in those areas is likely to help restrain price increases. Other sizable increases came in Orlando, Fla. (8%), San Francisco (6.1%) and Miami (5.6%).

Of the 18 metro areas, only two showed lower inventories. Boston was down 1.5% and Washington, D.C., 1.6%. Prices have declined modestly in both areas over the past year. For instance, the median home price in the northern Virginia suburbs of Washington was $459,000 in August, down 8% from a year earlier, according to Metropolitan Regional Information Systems Inc., a data-tracking firm in Rockville, Md. Such price declines are likely causing some people who can't get the price they want to take their homes off the market and wait for a recovery.

Home sales have plunged over the past year in many areas where prices had soared over the preceding five years, notably in California, Florida, Arizona, Massachusetts and the Washington, D.C., area. Many potential buyers are waiting for prices to come down further. The persistent weakness in these markets has prompted many housing experts to say prices will have to decline more to revive sales.

Sellers gradually seem to be realizing that they will have to lower prices, says Patrick Lashinsky, a senior vice president at ZipRealty. "There's finally some realism getting into the picture."

Ivy Zelman, a housing analyst at Credit Suisse Group in Cleveland, estimates that prices of newly built homes in San Diego, Sacramento, Calif., Phoenix, northern Virginia and southwest Florida already are down as much as 10% to 15% from a year ago. That estimate includes "concessions" from builders, such as upgraded kitchens or help with closing costs, which are disguised price cuts. But Ms. Zelman still sees more price declines ahead. "We believe that the housing market is still in the early innings of a hard landing that will likely take several years to develop," she says.

Even the National Association of Realtors, normally very bullish on home prices, now predicts a drop in median prices for the nation as a whole. David Lereah, chief economist for the Realtors, forecasts that prices will decline modestly in the next few months. After that dip, he says, prices are likely to resume rising, but at a slower-than-normal rate.

Dow Ekes Out Gain After Early Slide As Oil, Gold Retreat From Lofty Heights (WSJ)

By Shefali Anand

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061871

With positive news about oil and gold, investors pushed a seesaw trading session upward enough for stocks to close slightly higher.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 4.73 points, or 0.04%, to close at 11396.84. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.1%, or 0.62 point, to 1299.54. The technology-stock-laden Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.3%, or 7.46 points, to 2173.25.

Oil fell for a sixth straight day, to the lowest close in more than five months. Crude-oil futures contracts guaranteeing October delivery slid 64 cents, or 1%, to $65.61 a barrel, at the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gold declined on the Comex division of Nymex, by $19.60 a troy ounce, or 3.2%, to $590 -- its lowest close since June 29. (More on the oil and gold slides.1)

Despite the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' decision to leave its production quota unchanged, and signs that oil-rich Iran may continue diplomatic talks with the West, some traders say that may not be enough for the oil-price decline to continue.

"The market could work its way higher in the next week or so," said Jeff Grossman, president of commodities trading firm BRG Brokerage. He said traders will be watching crude-oil inventory figures, due tomorrow.

Stocks began the day with a decline -- the Dow industrials were down almost 50 points at one point, but recovered on hopes that inflation may be under control. St. Louis Federal Reserve President William Poole's comments about a "robust" economy and controlled inflation "seemed to really put a spring in the market," said Jon Brorson, head of growth equities at Lehman Brothers Asset Management.

Stocks of energy and material companies slumped. Dow components Alcoa, Exxon Mobil and Caterpillar slipped 5.3%, 2.8% and 2.7%, respectively.

Dell fell 2.1% on news that it would delay filing some financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission, as a previously announced SEC probe and its own investigation of its financial accounting could affect results.

Other technology stocks were among the gainers. Dow component Hewlett-Packard rose less than 1%, as its board continued to try to resolve issues raised by the company's investigation into leaks to the media. Shares of Freescale Semiconductor rose about 21% on news that it may be purchased by a private-equity consortium.

Traders at the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq observed a minute of silence, at 9.29 a.m. and 10:29 a.m. EDT respectively, to mark the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. On the Big Board, where 2.55 billion shares traded, 1,459 stocks rose and 1,775 fell.

Bonds declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.803%. The 30-year bond fell 11/32, to yield 4.945%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.59 yen, up from 116.90 yen, while the euro rose slightly against the dollar to $1.2702 from $1.2671.

Average Gas Price Falls 11 Cents A Gallon In A Week (USAT)

By James R. Healey, Usa Today

USA Today, September 12, 2006

$2 gas could be possible

Gasoline prices continue to tumble, almost free-falling toward levels not seen in five months.

The nationwide average for regular was $2.618 a gallon, the Energy Information Administration reported Monday. That was 10.9 cents lower than a week earlier.

“The reason prices are going down so far so fast is that they shouldn't have been that high in the first place. Two reasons they were: fear and speculation,” says Mike O'Connor, president of the Virginia Petroleum, Convenience and Grocery Association. It represents gasoline distributors who operate about 4,000 stations.

O'Connor says $2 gasoline “is more likely than unlikely” if the Gulf of Mexico isn't hit by hurricanes and if there isn't a flare-up of tensions in oil-producing regions.

In many metro areas, prices averaged less than $2.30 Monday, according to AAA. And only in Hawaii was the statewide average more than $3.

AAA reported a U.S. average Monday of $2.624 per gallon for unleaded regular, down 1.6 cents over the weekend. Hawaii, burdened by high shipping and distribution costs, averaged $3.284, down 1.1 cents.

High prices of spring and summer attracted more imported gasoline than usual, contributing to the above-average supplies that now are keeping prices down. “We had record levels of gasoline imports for a while, more than 1 million barrels a day just of gasoline,” says Neil Gamson, analyst at the EIA.

Falling prices are cheering gasoline retailers as much as motorists.

"When it was $3, I was paying 9 cents a gallon in credit card fees. It's a percentage (of the price). The retailer pays that; the customer never sees that. There were many times I was close to breaking even or even losing money," says Jinger Duryea, president of C.N. Brown in South Paris, Maine, which operates 90 convenience stores that sell fuel. "The first part of the year has been abysmal. We're all breathing a sigh of relief."

EIA plans to issue a short-term energy forecast today that will predict gasoline prices. That will suggest how low prices will go and how long they will stay there. EIA's previous short-term forecast was for an average $2.72 per gallon for all of this year, and $2.67 next year.

Although motorists worried that once the $3 barrier was pierced, prices never would fall much, the current drop-offs are logical, Gamson says: "The driving season is over. There's plenty of gasoline in inventory and crude oil prices have been dropping a lot. It's mainly market fundamentals."

OPEC Sets Stage To Cut Output Should Oil Prices Keep Falling (WSJ)

By Steve Levine, Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

VIENNA -- The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries decided to let its production fluctuate rather than adhere to its formal quotas, allowing the cartel to curb output quietly should oil prices continue their recent swoon.

As expected, the cartel didn't change its official oil-production target of 28 million barrels a day. More important, though, OPEC has effectively agreed to ignore those quotas for now.

Senior OPEC officials said oil marketers from member countries would base their sales of crude on demand from customers. The cartel will seek to avoid pushing more oil than needed by markets -- implying it would seek to avoid discounting, a necessary step to shore up prices should demand weaken.

"It's up to our marketing people now to decide how much will be produced and sold," the head of one delegation said. "We have agreed to neither push oil in the market nor hold back" needed supply, this official said.

The move comes amid slowing demand for crude and concerns that weakening world economic growth might further undercut it. The Energy Department said yesterday that the average U.S. price for regular gasoline has fallen about 42 cents a gallon since the beginning of August and stands at about $2.62 a gallon. (See related article.1)

The cartel has been selling about 500,000 barrels a day less oil than the 28 million barrel upper limit. Some OPEC members are unable to produce up to their quotas, while others are exceeding theirs to meet demand.

The cartel may pursue the oil-output model followed by Saudi Arabia in recent years. As OPEC's largest exporter, the kingdom has produced more than its quota when buyers needed extra oil and has eased off as demand has weakened. The new understanding would pave the way for others to act similarly.

OPEC officials have grown anxious about crude prices, which have fallen about 15% since hitting a nominal record in July. It is too soon to know whether the three-year boom is about to go bust. Analysts say the margin of spare pumping capacity remains so thin that a sizable supply outage could send prices surging. But OPEC, at least, is preparing the groundwork to halt a collapse.

OPEC has backed away from quotas in times of crisis, such as the aftermath of Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait. During the recent boom, its quotas sometimes were rendered irrelevant as members pumped flat out. But those efforts were intended to bring down prices.

Some analysts have been forecasting that crude prices could fall toward the $50-a-barrel level, though those estimates were made before the OPEC meeting. OPEC's latest decision "could, over time, halt the slide in prices," said Antoine Halff, an analyst at Fimat USA, the brokerage arm of Société Générale.

The communiqué the cartel issued yesterday didn't mention quotas. It said, in part, "Member Countries would take the necessary steps to ensure that supply and demand remained in balance, with prices at reasonable levels, supplying to the market the needed volumes."

Roger Diwan, an analyst at PFC Energy, said OPEC output is likely to decline by about 400,000 barrels a day in coming months because of weak demand and the need to shore up prices.

OPEC ministers will now watch for signs the fall may be turning into a rout. The cartel's next gathering is scheduled for December, but the new understanding would allow members to trim output without a formal meeting.

OPEC is refraining from curbing output formally in part for fear of provoking a backlash in the U.S., Europe and other big importing regions. Crude prices remain more than double their level of three years ago. On the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday, oil futures for October delivery fell 64 cents, or 1%, to settle at $65.61 a barrel.

OPEC Leaves Oil Output Quotas In Place As Price Keeps Falling (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0061873

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Crude oil prices continued their downward march yesterday as the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries left its production targets unchanged and as Europe's foreign policy chief raised hopes of a peaceful resolution to the standoff over Iran's nuclear program.

Signs of slower world economic growth and relatively high worldwide inventories of petroleum also helped knock the price of a barrel of crude oil to $65.61 on the New York Mercantile Exchange, down 64 cents yesterday and a slide of 17 percent from its all-time peak in July.

Oil markets are beset by "the perfect calm," said Edward Morse, a managing director and chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers Inc. He noted that anticipated hurricanes had not emerged, tightness in gasoline markets dissipated and political disruptions in supplies had not materialized.

Though prices are still very high by historical standards, the decline in the past month has eased some of the pressure on U.S. motorists. Prices at the pump fell for a fifth week, plunging 10.9 cents to a nationwide average of about $2.62 a gallon, the Energy Information Administration said yesterday. According to the government's weekly survey of about 800 filling stations, costs at the pump have declined 42 cents since Aug. 7.

Weakening oil prices were mixed news in Vienna, where OPEC oil ministers met yesterday and decided to leave their production target at 28 million barrels a day. The group often says that it fears high prices will drive consumers to alternative energy sources or non-OPEC oil, and its president, Nigerian oil minister Edmund Maduabebe Daukoru, said yesterday that OPEC was pleased to see prices drop from their peak levels.

But the ministers talked mostly of "downside risks" to prices and asserted that they might move to trim output later in the year if prices continued to slump. Chakib Helil, Algeria's oil minister, said that OPEC would "watch the market very closely," and Daukoru said that the group was concerned about the speed of the price decline, Bloomberg News reported.

"They like high prices, but they're relatively uncertain about the future because there's no way to be certain," Morse said. "They don't like the rate at which oil prices are falling. They are poised to jump in at some point . . . if the price continues falling at the rate it's been falling."

OPEC's 11 members, who produce nearly 40 percent of the world's oil, have kept their combined oil production target unchanged since July 2005, a level they said was high enough to ease record prices. In an opening speech to the group, Daukoru tried to deflect blame for soaring summer prices away from OPEC, pointing instead to the war in Lebanon, market "speculators" and BP's Alaska pipeline problems. World crude oil inventories, he noted, stand "comfortably above" their five year average.

As a practical matter, OPEC has limited ability to increase or decrease production. With political disputes or violence curtailing production in Iraq, Nigeria and Venezuela, Saudi Arabia remains the main swing producer, with the ability to trim or boost output from its current level of a little more than 9 million barrels a day.

Daukuro also confirmed reports that the amount of Nigerian output curtailed by militant attacks on facilities has risen to 872,000 barrels a day, about 40 percent of the country's production capacity. The militants have attacked pipelines and an export terminal in the Niger Delta as well as boats carrying workers to offshore production platforms.

One key factor in the price drop over the past month has been the diminishing prospect of conflict over Iran's nuclear program. A U.N. deadline for Iranian action has passed without consequences, Germany's chancellor has publicly opposed military action, Iran's former president has urged talks and Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief, described a meeting yesterday with Iran's top negotiator in the dispute over the country's nuclear program as "productive."

"The window of opportunity is not very long," Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said in Vienna. He said he hoped Iranian and E.U. negotiators would reach an agreement when they meet next week.

In oil markets, concerns also mounted over a slowdown in the world economy. The prices for other commodities also declined yesterday.

But Adam E. Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank AG, warned against the expectation that a slowdown would bring much lower oil prices.

"All this talk about the oil and commodities boom being over would make a lot more sense if we were in midst of global recession, but we're not," he said. "No one is talking about a huge U.S. recession. The question is whether we will grow at 2 percent or 3 percent." That means, he said, that oil markets will remain tight at least for the rest of this year and next, leaving consumers vulnerable to a single disruption in supplies.

Opec Move Sparks Slide In Oil Price (FT)

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Oil prices fell on Monday to their lowest level since the end of March after the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries agreed to keep production quotas unchanged.

But members of the cartel signalled they might reduce output later this year to limit any further fall in world oil prices.

The European benchmark, Brent, dropped $1.09 to $64.24 a barrel in late afternoon London trade, and near its lowest level in more than five months. It is now more than 18 per cent down on its record high of $78.65, touched just over a month ago.

Falling crude prices sparked sharp declines in other commodity markets. Gold traded below the key $600-an-ounce threshold for the first time since late June, while copper fell 4.5 per cent to $7,460.50 a tonne.

Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers, said oil prices were unlikely to carry on falling. "We have had the perfect lull, but it is not a turning point when prices will continue to decline," he said.

Mr Morse said the fall reflected the easing of tension between the west and Iran over its nuclear ambitions, the end of the Israel-Lebanon conflict, lack of hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico region and an end to the US summer driving season.

Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's energy minister, shrugged off the fall in prices, calling it "a blip".

Opec ministers agreed to keep the cartel's official production at 28m barrels a day, even though the 10 members that abide by quotas are producing 500,000 b/d less. With the cartel producing below official limits, analysts said Opec may cut at its next meeting in Nigeria in December.

"The process is starting now. It's been several years since they've had to cut back," said Carl Calabro, analyst at PFC energy, the Washington based consulting firm. Mr Calabro said there was already a surplus of fuel oil in the market, in particular in Singapore, but also in the US, where inventories are 25 per cent higher than normal.

Mr Morse said the focus on inventories was overdone, as global inventories in absolute terms will have to continue to grow in order to maintain the "comfort level" of between 50 and 55 days of forward demand cover.

He said oil demand had risen by about 10m b/d in the past six years, which translates to another 500m barrels of oil needed in storage.

Oil traders expect prices to rise by the end of the year.

The US benchmark oil price, the West Texas Intermediate, is quoted at more than $67 a barrel for December, compared with the current spot price of $65.50.

Oil traders said concern about the fall in oil prices may be overdone, given that US benchmark oil prices are 7 per cent lower than the record peak of $70.85 reached in August last year in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

'Blogosphere' Spurs Government Oversight (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — When watchdog groups that monitor federal spending wanted more information on 1,800 "pork barrel" projects buried in a House appropriations bill, they listed them on the Internet and asked readers to dig deeper. Within days, details began pouring in.

The same thing happened when Porkbusters.org enlisted readers of its website to find out which senator had blocked legislation that would create an online database of federal grants and contracts. One by one, senators were eliminated until Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., were uncovered.

The two episodes illustrate the latest trend in government oversight: More light is being thrown on Congress, not just by the media and public interest groups, but in the "blogosphere" where Internet users meet.

"It's probably the biggest expansion of government oversight that we'll ever have," says Thomas Schatz of Citizens Against Government Waste, one of the groups pioneering the effort. "It will turn every American into a watchdog."

Their involvement is getting action: House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has promised a vote this week on a rules change that would ensure the sponsors of individual projects are identified. And Republicans in the House and Senate say they will approve the national database this year.

The amateur investigators are people such as Jamie Peppard, an accountant from Long Island, N.Y., and serial blogger who writes under the name "Mrs. Panstreppon." She researched groups such as the Congressional Glaucoma Caucus Foundation, which stands to receive nearly $1.2 million to screen patients in New York, Texas and the Virgin Islands. She unearthed tax forms showing the foundation pays several six-figure salaries.

They're people like Mario Delgado, the publisher of Porkopolis, a Cincinnati-based blog that determined Ohio stands to gain nearly $34 million from 135 projects in the pending House appropriations bill that funds health, education and labor programs.

And they're people nationwide who called their senators to ask if they were blocking action on the database — an obscure bill that has become controversial because of senators' anonymous objections. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., credited the passion of the "blogosphere" for winning Senate passage last week.

"There are citizens in every community who either take this as their responsibility or as their joy — or maybe a little bit of both," says Zephyr Teachout, national director of the Sunlight Foundation, which seeks greater transparency in government. "Reporters and good-government groups can't do it on their own. There's a real need."

Advances in technology and communication now make it easier for average citizens to be researchers, reporters and muckrakers.

The model for many watchdog groups is the Center for Responsive Politics, whose website, opensecrets.org, puts information about lobbying and campaign finance into accessible formats for Internet users. "Citizens have been doing some really good work on their own," says Ellen Miller, who left the center to take charge of the Sunlight Foundation.

Citizens got involved last year when blogger Josh Marshall, publisher of TPM Muckraker, urged readers to find out which House Republicans voted in closed caucus to let indicted lawmakers keep their leadership posts. After a public outcry, Republicans reversed the vote. As a result, Texas' Tom DeLay had to step down as majority leader last year after being indicted on campaign finance charges.

Such citizen involvement peaked again this summer when watchdog groups ranging from the conservative Citizens Against Government Waste to the more liberal Sunlight Foundation sought to shed new light on congressional "earmarks," the individual projects lawmakers insert into spending bills.

Nearly 10,000 projects costing $29 billion were funded in the current fiscal year. It was another project, however — the so-called bridge to nowhere in Alaska, originally included in last year's highway bill for $223 million — that made the issue politically volatile.

"The bridge to nowhere certainly got some traction," says Sen. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., who supported it as part of the highway bill. His challenger in next week's primary, Steve Laffey, opposes all earmarks.

When word filtered out last month that a senator was refusing to let the database bill come to a vote, Porkbusters urged its online faithful to find out who it was. Nearly every senator denied involvement. Ultimately, Stevens and Byrd acknowledged objections.

Around the same time, a loose coalition of groups published a complete list of earmarks in the House version of Congress' biggest spending bill, each adding unique technological tools. Porkbusters breaks them down by state and keyword. Sunlight uses Google Maps to show where each project is located.

Bloggers such as Jamie Peppard took it from there. She dug into groups such as the glaucoma foundation, discovering that it paid $340,000 to its CEO and more than $100,000 each to a consultant and part-time treasurer.

"I'm an ordinary citizen who does not have to answer to shareholders or anyone else," Peppard says. "I also have the luxury of spending as much time on a particular project as I want to."

Government watchdogs say the new effort to reach and empower average citizens is a two-way street: It provides Americans with needed information and enables them to give some back.

"Maybe it really will be an empowering tool — the Internet leveling the playing field," says Gary Bass, executive director of OMB Watch, which seeks greater government accountability and citizen participation. "If that's true, this is very, very exciting."

Plans To Honor L.A. Muslim Leader Bring Out Animosity (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

In a public hearing spiced with accusations of Jew-hating and Muslim-bashing, nearly four dozen religious, ethnic and civil rights activists spoke out Monday on whether a prominent Los Angeles Muslim should be disqualified from receiving a prestigious humanitarian award because he has expressed some views critical of Israel.

Maher Hathout, chairman of the Islamic Center of Southern California, is the first Muslim chosen for the award from the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission. But some Jewish groups have vehemently objected to the selection, calling Hathout an extremist masquerading as a moderate, and are urging the commission to rescind the award before it is presented next month.

At Monday's commission hearing, the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles, an umbrella organization of 22 groups representing 40,000 donors, stepped forward as the latest and most influential opponent to Hathout.

Federation President John R. Fischel told commissioners that Hathout's "false and controversial" statements about Israel — that it is an apartheid state, for instance — had offended and angered many Jews.

"Dr. Hathout takes partisan positions which do not foster harmonious and equitable intergroup relations…. His words regrettably create the very fissures and divides that the [commission] is seeking to repair," Fischel told commissioners.

But Hathout's supporters Monday were more diverse and outnumbered opponents 2 to 1. Christians, Muslims and Jews, blacks, Latinos and Asian Americans, and such civil rights leaders as Connie Rice, who received the 2002 award, spoke forcefully in support of Hathout, describing him as a tireless proponent of interfaith and interethnic harmony.

Rice said it was difficult for her to break with her longtime Jewish friends on the issue, but that Hathout had taken "extraordinarily difficult" actions in promoting tolerance and moderation.

The furor over the award, she said, had turned the issue into a "seminal struggle" over whether Los Angeles would be seen as embracing or rejecting a man who preached tolerant Islamism.

"If we send a message to Muslims in Southern California that someone who has tried so hard to bridge … all of our communities cannot be acknowledged, we would have done extreme damage," Rice said.

Hathout also won support from the man that the 14-member commission originally chose for the award — the Rev. James M. Lawson Jr., a civil rights leader and president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference of Greater Los Angeles, who was unavailable to accept the award because he is teaching in Nashville.

In a letter read to commissioners Monday, Lawson urged them to reject what he called "extremism which seeks to vilify Dr. Hathout's name and character." He praised the Muslim leader as "a person of immeasurable integrity and honesty" who "reflects the best not only of the Muslim faith, but the finest of any faith."

In addition, several rabbis and the Progressive Jewish Alliance spoke in support of Hathout, saying that criticism of Israel should not be equated with backing terrorism or the destruction of the Jewish state.

Despite the deeply felt views and occasional outbursts of name-calling, the hearing remained largely calm and controlled. Commissioners will meet again Monday to vote on a final resolution.

The award was established more than a decade ago to honor outstanding contributions toward fostering better relations among diverse communities.

Last year's winner was Zara Buggs Taylor, who was honored for her work in fighting discriminatory hiring practices and biased portrayals in the media.

In 2002, the award was given to Rice, a director and co-founder of the Advancement Project, which is dedicated to building a racially just democracy and breaking down barriers to real opportunity.

Hathout has said — and repeated again Monday — that he supports a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In introductory remarks to commissioners, the Egyptian native and retired cardiologist said he came to the U.S. 35 years ago with his family seeking freedom.

In 1989, Hathout said, he was an early Muslim voice to condemn the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's fatwa against Indian-born British novelist Salman Rushdie.

Two years later, he said, he barred from speaking at his mosque the extremist Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, who was convicted in 1995 of seditious conspiracy in connection with a plot to blow up several New York-area landmarks.

Hathout also said he wrote two books undermining any Islamic justification for suicide bombings and other terrorism, and initiated the city's first dialogues among Muslims, Christians and Jews.

"I am very proud of my record," he said. "I believe in human dignity."

Hathout added that his harsh words about Israeli state policies were spoken from "immense pain" he felt over Palestinian suffering, but that he meant no offense to citizens of Israel or Jews.

But Marcie Polier Swartz, a Brentwood businesswoman who was a co-founder of the first Los Angeles Muslim-Jewish dialogue, said she and most other Jews eventually dropped out.

She and others said Monday that they were particularly upset that the Muslim leader was recorded at a Washington, D.C., rally in 2000 condemning as traitors Arab governments that entered into dialogues with Israel.

Hathout, however, said he was not opposing Arab governments' talks with Israel but their oppressive regimes.

Hathout's opponents reaffirmed the Muslim leader's right to voice his sentiments — but argued that they were too divisive to merit giving him a human relations award.

At least one commissioner, the Rev. Zedar E. Broadous, said he had heard "nothing new" to change his original vote in July to support Hathout.

But others said they wanted time to review the voluminous material — including hundreds of e-mails — submitted from around the nation over the selection.

Mehlman: GOP Will Hold (RC)

By Paul Kane

DOJ_NMG_0061877

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman predicted Monday that the GOP would maintain its control of both Congressional chambers, using a $47 million across-the-board financial edge and a finely honed voter turnout program to overcome historical trends and public resistance to the Iraq War.

Mehlman refuted pundits' suggestions that this year's midterms would be a purely nationalized campaign on issues breaking against Republicans, arguing instead that the elections would be characterized by larger national issues transposed onto a localized, race-by-race battlefield.

"I think we're in uncharted political territories," Mehlman said in an interview with Roll Call editors and reporters.

Mehlman said it would be "a dereliction of your duty" for his committee not to run a television air war attacking Democratic candidates for the votes taken by their party leaders, indicating his intention to highlight how a Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her ranking-members-turned-chairmen would run the House.

"There will be a clear contrast," he said, declining, however, to indicate in which states and districts the RNC would focus its resources.

In addition, Mehlman said:

· he no longer considered Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.) the most endangered GOP incumbent, calling him the "greatest closer in politics";

· that the electoral battlefield was largely set and that no races would materialize to shock the GOP down the stretch: "I don't think we will be surprised at all";

· it was wrong to ever assume Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), who polls show faces a tightening re-election fight, would win his race by more than 5 points: "Virginia's changing";

· he would leave it up to Rhode Island GOP officials to recommend whether Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey should receive any RNC financial support if he were to unseat Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) in today's GOP primary.

Democrats consider Mehlman's prognostications wishful thinking, with Bush being an unpopular drag on too many GOP candidates to save his Congressional majorities for his final two years in office.

"As much as Ken Mehlman would like to deny it, the writing is on the wall about the 2006 elections. The country is sick and tired of this rubber-stamp, stay-the-course, out-of-touch Republican Congress," said Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Overwhelmingly, the American people want a change in the direction of the country, and a change in their representation in Washington."

Mehlman acknowledged that Republicans were fighting against two issues that political operatives can't control: history and Iraq. This being the sixth year of Bush's presidency, history holds that Bush should face big losses in Congressional seats, although then-President Bill Clinton bucked that trend in 1998 when the GOP committees unsuccessfully tried to nationalize those midterms on the impeachment scandal.

Mehlman noted that Iraq has been a political albatross for many candidates because voters have found it "hard to get their heads around and hard to measure progress on."

Despite those thematic battles, Mehlman said Republicans hold tactical advantages, particularly in House races, that will prevent the political tidal-wave environment that swamped Democrats in 1994. For example, 17 of the 20 GOP-held open seats are being fought in districts won by President Bush in 2004, while in 1994 Democrats were defending 19 open seats won by Bush's father in 1988, Mehlman said.

In addition, of the 35 top races in GOP-held seats, Republican candidates had a cash-on-hand edge in 28 of those battles as of June 30.

Overall, Mehlman said the Republican Party enjoys a $47 million edge over the Democrats when adding up the most recent cash-on-hand totals of the national party campaign committees, state party committees and the candidates in House and Senate battleground races.

The lion's share of that financial edge comes from Mehlman's committee versus the Democratic National Committee — as of July 31, the RNC held a more than $32 million cash edge over the DNC, $43.6 million to $11.3 million.

The RNC already is advertising in Ohio in defense of Sen. Mike DeWine (R) and has done polling in Tennessee, where Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R) is retiring.

Republican operatives have deemed the RNC financial edge critical because, unlike in past election cycles, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has opened up a massive cash edge over its GOP counterpart and the DCCC is at a rough cash parity with the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Mehlman pointed to DeWine's race against Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) as an example of how he expects many races to play down the stretch. The national issues of Iraq and the war on terror will be the predominant focus in the Buckeye State, he said, but the GOP will put all its might into turning the race into a specific choice between DeWine and Brown rather than a national referendum.

DeWine, along with the NRSC and the RNC, will spend millions of dollars targeting Brown with ads highlighting his votes against the USA PATRIOT Act and other tools that the Bush administration considers critical in its overseas fights.

This is a slight, but important, variation on campaign themes promoted by NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), who repeatedly has said these elections will be based only on local candidates and issues. Instead, Mehlman said Republican candidates can't avoid the "national conversation" and will instead have to use that as a cudgel against Democrats.In House races where Democratic challengers haven't voted on key issues, they can expect to be hit with attacks on their allegiance to liberal leaders such as Pelosi and DNC Chairman Howard Dean.

Mehlman said he expects Election Day to last deep into the night and early morning hours, that the Democrats will not swamp the GOP enough in Eastern states to reclaim the House majority.

Mehlman singled out a half-dozen Eastern GOP incumbents — Connecticut Reps. Nancy Johnson, Christopher Shays, Rob Simmons, and Reps. Jim Gerlach (Pa.), Geoff Davis (Ky.) and Clay Shaw (Fla.) — as "battle-tested. ... They have independent brand equity."

The vaunted GOP turnout machine will face its toughest test to date, something Mehlman has personally worked on since his days as field director in Bush's 2000 campaign, then as White House political director and again as Bush-Cheney '04 campaign manager.

He said he believes it will be even more scientific than in years past, noting that the RNC began monitoring special elections in local races in early 2005 as test-runs for the 72-hour program. The RNC even used a May 2005 City Council race in Lincoln, Neb., to judge turnout efforts there.

On a personal note, Mehlman strongly hinted that, after completing an eight-year run of nonstop campaigning, he may just step down as RNC chairman following Election Day and go into the private sector. Noting that he's logged 260,000 miles as chairman, Mehlman said he might want to use those frequent-flyer miles for "personal" use as opposed to another term as chairman.

"I'm a lawyer," he said. "Someday I'll be a lawyer again."

House GOP Going For Broke To Hold Seats (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence And Ray Locker

USA Today, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Top House Republicans are using almost all their campaign contributions to hold on to their 15-seat majority, federal records show, while Democratic House leaders are pouring money into campaigns to capture Republican seats.

USA TODAY examined contributions by leadership committees run by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, House Majority Leader John Boehner and House campaign chief Tom Reynolds, all Republicans, and their Democratic counterparts: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer and House campaign chief Rahm Emanuel.

The three Republicans sent 85% of their donations — $1.9 million — to at least 70 Republican incumbents and candidates trying to hold GOP seats. The three Democrats gave $963,000, or 64% of their money, to at least 50 Democrats seeking Republican seats.

The contrasting contribution patterns underscore the extent to which Republicans are on the defensive this year. Democrats, in hot pursuit of a House majority, are finding expanding opportunities across the electoral map.

"Democrats have very few of their own vulnerable seats to worry about. They get to play almost exclusively on the offense," says Amy Walter, a House analyst for the non-partisan Cook Political Report.

Republicans hold 231 House seats while Democrats have 201. There are two vacant seats, one in each party, and one independent who votes with Democrats. The website CQpolitics.com currently rates as safe 184 Democratic seats and 174 Republican seats.

Leadership committees are political action committees used by politicians to finance travel and donations to candidates. In the cases of key party leaders, such as the campaign committee chairmen, contributions from these PACs often influence other givers.

People often give to the PACs "to curry favor," says the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics. The three GOP leaders have raised more than $6 million — more than twice as much as their counterparts in the Democratic minority.

In one spending indicator, the three Democratic leadership PACs each gave $10,000 to candidates in 13 districts now held by Republicans. The PACs run by Hastert, Boehner and Reynolds each gave the legal maximum of $10,000 each to only three contenders for seats held by Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0061879

Leadership PAC contributions often make up more than 10% of the overall donations in competitive races. For example, in the race between Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., and Ken Lucas, his Democratic opponent, Davis received 15% of his overall $2.4 million in donations from such PACs. Lucas, a former House member, received 21% of his $730,000 in contributions from leadership PACs.

Two years ago, Hastert's PAC gave 32% of its money to Republicans trying to win Democratic seats, twice the share they're getting this year. Boehner appeared at campaign events for 26 candidates last month — 23 of them trying to hold Republican seats.

"There is no question that we are in a very difficult political environment," Boehner said last week, but he predicted his party would keep its majority.

Anti-Incumbent Sentiment (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

NEW CASTLE, Ky. (AP) - Dissatisfied with Congress, voters would probably hang a "Help Wanted" sign on the U.S. Capitol if given the chance.

"They're not doing their job," says Scott Newland, 39, an independent voter who backed President Bush in 2004.

The factory worker had harsh words for congressional Republicans and Democrats as he helped close his sister's New Castle deli one recent evening. "You need people that care. They don't care."

Such angry sentiments echo up and down the Ohio River Valley as it cuts through Republican-held congressional districts in Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio - politically pivotal House seats in an election year in which Democrats hope to end 12 years in the minority.

At lunch counters, post offices, city parks and downtown streets, voters in this region and nationally are quick to voice their frustration with the GOP-controlled Congress, and their desire for more responsive replacements for the current crop of lawmakers.

It's a general disgust that may lead to firings of some politicians on Nov. 7. People already have hinted as much in Republican and Democratic primaries.

Kenny Brown, an independent, knows precisely what he's looking for in a congressman. "Somebody who cares for the working man," the supermarket employee, 66, says before picking up his mail at the Pewee Valley, Ky., post office.

Judging by the past few years, Brown said, Bush and Republicans don't care. "Maybe the Democrats do, or maybe they don't."

With congressional elections less two months away, the public is consistently giving the GOP-run Congress dismal marks. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll in August found that only 29 percent of the public approve of the job Congress is doing.

A CNN poll earlier this month found that 55 percent of Americans are more likely to vote for the challenger in any election this fall. And an ABC News/Washington Post poll in August found that 53 percent of Americans call themselves "anti-incumbent," a figure as high as it was in the summer 1994 shortly before Republicans seized control from Democrats.

The party in power typically loses congressional seats in the sixth year of a presidency, and both Republican and Democratic strategists say this fall is on track to follow suit. GOP losses are expected in the House and, perhaps, the Senate.

But it's also possible that such voter angst won't translate into a sweeping throw-the-bumbs-out election year.

"Typically, Americans have a really negative view of Congress but love their congressman," said Marybeth Beller, a political science professor at Marshall University in Huntington, W.Va.

That explains why House and Senate members rarely lose their re-election bids.

Nevertheless, four incumbents - including a governor and a senator - have lost primaries so far this year, providing some evidence that voters want fresh blood in positions of power. Neither political party may be immune.

Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski, a Republican, was the most recent casualty of what may end up being an anti-incumbent wave of the 2006 elections. He finished last in a three-way GOP primary in August, getting just 19 percent of the vote.

A fifth upset could occur Tuesday.

Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a moderate Republican in Rhode Island, is facing a fierce primary against Stephen Laffey, the mayor of Cranston. Polls show a tight race.

National Republicans are backing Chafee even though he often departs from the party line, including opposing the Iraq war. GOP operatives believe he is their best shot of keeping the seat in Republican hands. The National Republican Senatorial Committee has attacked Laffey on television and in mass mailings.

Laffey has the support of the conservative, pro-business Club for Growth, which also contributed to the defeat of freshman Rep. Joe Schwarz, a moderate Republican in Michigan.

DOJ_NMG_0061880

Democrats have fared about the same.

In the biggest upset yet this year, voters in Connecticut sent a message to Sen. Joe Lieberman, a moderate Democrat, by giving the Democratic nomination to newcomer Ned Lamont.

The Iraq war played heavily in the race. Lieberman supports it. Lamont does not and his anti-war stance attracted enough votes from liberals and others to secure the nomination. Lieberman promptly signed up as an independent candidate for the November balloting.

Down south, another Democrat, Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney, also lost her primary.

Despite the Democratic losses, Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., the head of the Senate Democrat's campaign effort, declared: "This is not an anti-incumbent election. This is an anti-Republican incumbent election."

"I don't see an anti-incumbent wave," countered Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., chairman of the House Republicans' campaign committee, dismissing the notion as Democratic propaganda.

Voters outside the capital clearly aren't happy with their elected officials of either political party.

Paula Waltz, 31 and a self-described political "fence rider," is among the people who said they are considering voting against their sitting congressmen to make that point.

Many lawmakers have "been there a little too long" and have "lost touch with the problems we're facing now," said Waltz, a surgical assistant who talked politics after finishing a hospital shift in Madison, Ind.

"They're out of reality," said Loyd Candler, 61 and a Republican who supervises autoparts stores, after a meal in Scottsburg, Ind. "I don't think you can just keep voting the same people in because they've been there."

In Crestwood, Ky., Glenn Proctor, 47, a construction worker and a Republican, said lawmakers in Washington never come through.

"They all promise you the world and then when they get in there, they're all the same," he complained, climbing into his car after buying a few supplies at a Dollar General.

Upriver near Cincinnati, Sari Thoman, 55, a Democrat, wants term limits for members of Congress.

"These people make it their life jobs" and because of that "Congress is so out of touch," said the Cincinnati symphony violist as she stretched after a brisk walk around a park in Springfield Township.

Across the park, Curtis Kelley, 62 and "mostly a Democrat," was down on the president and his opinion of lawmakers on Capitol Hill was almost as negative.

"I don't have any confidence in them either," Kelley said, as he worked at the dock on the park's 188-acre lake. But, he said, voters share some of the blame. "We don't hold them accountable."

EDITOR'S NOTE: Liz Sidoti's previous Ohio River Valley story, BC-Election Uncertainty, moved for Monday AMs, Sept. 5. The story focused on the anxiety among voters and the doubts about whether Democrats could capitalize in November.

Vermont Races Could Shape House's Future (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. — The Senate race in this small state looks to be less an election than an ascension.

Bernie Sanders — Vermont's only U.S. representative and the lone independent in the House — boasts a commanding lead over a Republican challenger who has blanketed the state with venomous advertising. Richard Tarrant, a software magnate who has never held elective office, has poured millions of dollars into a campaign that has brought him scant 34% support, according to the state's most recent polls.

"He's been in everyone's face. Vermont has never experienced this kind of never-ending barrage," said Peter Freyne, political columnist for an alternative weekly here called Seven Days. "It's the most expensive fight by fivefold we have ever seen in Vermont."

Yet as Vermont voters cast primary ballots today — one of nine states plus the District of Columbia voting today — Sanders appears hard to beat.

As an independent, Sanders would not help Democrats or Republicans in the tight struggle for Senate control. By contrast, the contest for Sanders' congressional seat is important to both major parties.

State Sen. Peter Welch is running unopposed in the Democratic primary; Maj. Gen. Martha Rainville, the former adjutant general of the Vermont National Guard, is the leading Republican candidate.

"This seat absolutely matters, in that control of the House is up for grabs," said Amy Walter, senior editor at the Cook Political Report in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0061881

Democrats must win 15 seats to gain a House majority.

Rainville "has a great profile, and name recognition that transcends partisanship," Walter said. "The problem is, she is running in an awful year. She is running into gale-force headwinds of presidential low approval, low approval for Congress and opposition to the war. She can't control any of those things. So the job of Peter Welch and the Democrats is to take that shine off her, and I think that will be a lot easier to do in this election year than it might be some other time."

With the steady deployment of Vermont Guard members to Iraq and Afghanistan, Rainville, 48, became a familiar face around the state.

In an interview in her campaign headquarters in South Burlington, she said, "I think Vermonters knew me as the adjutant general who cared about the soldiers and the families."

Still, she acknowledged that her military affiliation unsettled some voters.

"There is such a sensitivity in this state to the war," Rainville said.

"People bring it up, regardless of whether they are Republican, Democrat or independent. No one has been confrontational, but there is a curiosity to hear my perspective."

Although Rainville has vowed to run a clean campaign, Welch said he was braced for nasty ads from national Republican groups.

"You know what, I was married to the same woman for 28 years," said Welch, a 59-year-old widower whose campaign companion is his dog. "I've had the same law partner for over 30 years, with no written agreement, just a handshake. I'm pretty boring. But they will find stuff, and if they don't find it, they will make it up."

Vermonters do not register by political party. On primary day, voters are offered ballots from the Progressive, Liberty Union, Republican and Democratic parties. A voter chooses one and discards the three unused ballots.

Exit polls from 2004 showed the state with 27% self-identified Republicans, 41% independents and 32% self-identified Democrats and liberals, said University of Vermont political science professor Garrison Nelson.

Voters in the Green Mountain State regularly split their tickets — voting overwhelmingly, for example, for Republican Gov. Jim Douglas in 2004 while Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) was virtually burying President Bush in the state's presidential count.

This time around, "Vermont is quirky enough to send a socialist to the Senate and a general to the House," Nelson said.

Sanders, 65, a former Burlington mayor, caucuses with Democrats but votes "however he pleases," according to campaign media director Paul Hortenstine.

Tarrant's televised assaults on Sanders have backfired, Nelson said. "It's as ugly a campaign as we have ever seen in Vermont. His campaign people are non-Vermonters, and they don't get it. Bernie Sanders has run 10 consecutive statewide elections. Bernie has shaken every hand in the state at least 10 times. We all know Bernie. No one believes Bernie is in favor of child molesters or terrorists, and that's what Rich Tarrant is saying."

With Sanders' trademark shock of white hair and a booming voice that betrays its Brooklyn origins, he has been a Vermont political fixture since he won his first mayor's race by a handful of votes in 1981. He is known throughout the state by his first name only: Even his red-and-white campaign signs declare "BERNIE for U.S. Senate."

Famous for engaging in debate with anyone, Sanders also is legendary for taking on underdog causes, such as his early support for U.S. consumers who traveled to Canada to purchase prescription drugs. He has been fervently antiwar, but has steadily championed the rights of veterans.

Sanders has clung to the Progressive mantle, espousing the belief that the more privileged members of society should take care of the less fortunate. Sanders also has called himself a socialist — the political theory supporting collective or government control of production and distribution of wealth.

Nelson calls Sanders "the only socialist I ever knew who wanted to win an election. Most socialists don't want to win. They want to lose, because that proves how corrupt America is." Whatever label Sanders wears seems not to matter to his constituents.

"So he's a socialist — who cares?" said 82-year-old Victor Acebo, a retired dry cleaner.

Phil Dymant, 61, who retired from the Navy, said: "I don't care what he is. Bernie takes care of fellows like me.

"He's got gumption. If more politicians would do more of what Bernie does, we'd all be a lot better off."

Among Governor Races, Iowa Lead Shifts Again (WSJ)

WSJ Online's "Washington Wire", September 11, 2006

Democrats remain poised for big gains in gubernatorial races nationwide even as Republican candidates took the lead in a few tight contests, according to the latest Zogby Interactive poll, conducted in cooperation with The Wall Street Journal Online. Of 19 states tracked in the poll, conducted Aug. 29-Sept. 5, Democratic candidates were ahead in 12 races, while Republicans led in six and one race yielded mixed results. In Zogby's August poll, Democrats led 14 of the states polled, Republicans four and one race was mixed. The Republican pickups came in Iowa, where Republican Jim Nussle recaptured his slim lead over Chet Culver, and in Nevada, where Republican nominee Jim Gibbons climbed back into the lead over Dina Tutus.

Among high-profile states, Arnold Schwarzenegger held onto his come-from-behind lead in California over Democratic challenger Phil Angelides. Meanwhile, in Pennsylvania, Democratic incumbent Ed Rendell pulled to his widest lead this year over Republican Lynn Swann, a former Pittsburgh Steeler wide receiver and TV commentator.

September 10, 2006, 8:54 pm Zogby Poll Shows Slide for Allen, Lieberman

Republicans made some headway on Democrats in hotly contested Senate races, according to the latest Zogby Battlegrounds poll. Democratic challengers remain narrowly ahead in the run for several seats now held by Republicans, but the GOP is still on track to retain control of the chamber.

The polls, conducted Aug. 29-Sept. 5 by Zogby Interactive in cooperation with The Wall Street Journal Online, show Democrats ahead in 11 of the 18 states polled, while Republicans lead in five. In a Zogby poll conducted in August, Democrats were ahead in 12 and Republicans in five. Joe Lieberman, running as an independent, maintains a lead in Connecticut, though his advantage over Democrat Ned Lamont has weakened considerably — to four points from 10 in the previous Zogby poll.

Republican incumbents picked up ground in Ohio and Pennsylvania, two of the seats Democrats had led solidly. Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine and Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum each pulled to four percentage points from their respective opponents Sherrod Brown and Bob Casey. In Virginia, however, Republican incumbent Sen. George Allen's Aug. 11 "macaca" remarks continued to hurt support. In the mid-August Zogby poll, challenger James Webb took a one-percentage-point lead; the latest poll shows Webb now ahead by a seven-point margin.

September 10, 2006, 4:10 pm Sen. Allen's Lead Shrivels in Virginia

Republican Sen. George Allen of Virginia sees the lead in his re-election race cut to just four percentage points–46% to 42%–over Democratic challenger James Webb, in a Mason Dixon Polling & Research Inc. poll. It was the first since Aug. 11, when Sen. Allen, at a rally of mostly white supporters in the southwestern part of the state, referred to a Webb campaign aide of Indian descent as "macaca," considered an ethnic slur in some countries. (Update: A Zogby Interactive/WSJ.com poll out late Sunday also shows Webb leading, by 7.5 percentage points.)

Polls have tightened all year in the hotly contested race. As recently as April, Allen had a 20 point lead over Webb, a decorated former U.S. marine and a Reagan administration Navy secretary who resigned, refusing to cut the Navy's size.

Allen, long a Bush supporter with presidential aspirations in 2008, has seen his popularity, along with that of the current president, decline. He now appears to be struggling to hold onto his Senate seat. But the poll, with an error margin of four percentage points, might not be as tight as the numbers suggest –or it might be worse. – Bernard Wysocki Jr.

September 10, 2006, 3:29 pm Cheney Makes Fall Predictions

On NBC's "Meet the Press" this morning, Tim Russert asked Vice President Dick Cheney if he thinks the Democrats will take the House in the midterm elections.

According to the transcript, Cheney responded: "I don't think it'll happen. I don't expect that Nancy Pelosi will be speaker. I think we're doing very well out there. I feel better about the election now than I did three months ago." Asked if he thinks Republicans will keep both the House and the Senate, Cheney says: "I think we will, I really do. … I've seen our candidates. I've seen how they're handling the issues. We've generated the resources we need to be able to have a good, hard-fought competition. I—if I had to bet today, I'd bet that—well, I can bet you a dinner that we hold both houses."

Russert said he doesn't bet, then asked whether Cheney has gone hunting since the accidental shooting earlier this year of Harry Whittington. After Cheney replied no, Russert asked: "Should I be relieved you didn't bring your shotgun in today?" Cheney answered: "I wouldn't worry about it. You're not in season." – Tim Hanrahan

September 9, 2006, 10:50 am Bush 9/11 Tour Aims to Bolster Republicans

President Bush will visit the sites of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks Sunday and Monday for a series of events that the administration hopes can once more lift Republicans to victory. Bush sees the attacks as the defining moment of his presidency, and made his muscular response a centerpiece of his re-election campaign in 2004. With the Republican majorities in Congress endangered by economic uncertainty and public fury over the war in Iraq, the White House is striving to remind voters of its response to Sept. 11 — part of a broader assertion that Republicans take the terrorist threat more seriously than Democrats do and are better prepared to defend against it.

Although Bush and other aides have long made terrorism a central part of their argument that Democrats are soft on national defense, administration officials say the president will make the Sept. 11 commemorations as apolitical as possible by not giving prepared remarks at any of the three sites. White House spokesman Tony Snow says Bush's only formal speech either day will be an Oval Office address to the nation Monday night on "what he thought Sept. 11th has meant to the country, what it taught us, and how Americans have demonstrated their toughness, compassion, courage and optimism in the many days since." September 8, 2006, 5:43 pm Here's a Clue for Ben Bernanke

Bernanke Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke wants to the markets to stop looking to him for cryptic clues about interest rates. Some say he'll be disappointed.

"As a well-respected economist, [Bernanke's] opinions mean something and are worth listening to," said James Bianco, president of Bianco Research, a Chicago research firm that closely watches the Fed and has a large trader clientele. "Unfortunately as Fed chairman, all we care about is, 'Are you raising rates, or aren't you?'"

The problem then becomes that traders and reporters may see clues that don't exist — or overreact because they ignored important points made elsewhere in the speech or testimony. As described in Friday's Wall Street Journal, Bernanke wants to wean the markets and the public off looking for clues for interest rates in his speeches and testimony, and instead wants them to focus on the Fed's objectives and forecasts, extrapolating from them the likely path of rates. But traders and reporters may try to read interest rates hints into what he says, anyway.

"The problem wasn't just Greenspan's tendency for sound bites, it's also the mutually reinforcing need for news services to deliver instant headlines and market participants' short attention spans," noted Tom Gallagher, the Fed watcher for brokerage firm ISI Group, referring to former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan. "I really think there's a risk that those who read the whole speech can miss the market's read on the Fed for sustained periods of time. Think of Bernanke's early June speech in which he talked about the three and six month annualized inflation rates… If you read the whole speech you got the 'medium-term outlook' and 'take full account of lags' messages, but everyone focused on his use of the recent inflation trends. News services can't put the full speech in their headlines, and I'm not sure how many of us would read them anyway." –Greg Ip

A coalition of independent lumber companies is pressing to reopen a key part of the agreement that settled the long-drawn-out dispute between the U.S. and Canada over trade in softwood lumber.

The settlement provides for tens of millions of dollars to be distributed among some top U.S. lumber producers. The Lumber Manufacturers for Ethics and Equity, a group of about 30 independent producers from around the country, complains the payments will be spread unevenly, benefiting big companies that were party to the original trade dispute and putting smaller producers at a competitive disadvantage.

Next week, coalition members plan to visit lawmakers on Capitol Hill as well as officials at the Commerce Department and the U.S. Trade Representative's office. "What we hope to do is to highlight the issue so Congress might take action," said Edward Lebow, a lawyer representing the group. Lebow said the coalition doesn't want to kill the overall deal, but suggests putting the planned industry payments to different use, perhaps benefiting Habitat for Humanity, the non-profit housing group. –Greg Hitt

With Defense Secretary Rumsfeld making "appeasement" the big buzzword of the month, the George Washington University's National Security Archive notes that its single most-downloaded file is now the once-classified batch of documents, photos and video documenting Rumsfeld's handshake and meeting with Saddam Hussein in December 1983. President Reagan had sent Rumsfeld to Baghdad to help restore diplomatic ties with Iraq and aid Baghdad in its fight against Iran.

Saddam Hussein greets Rumsfeld in Baghdad, 1983 "Rumsfeld meeting Saddam has now far outpaced the previous winner, which was Elvis meeting Nixon," says Thomas Blanton, director of the archive, which collects and posts significant declassified documents under the Freedom of Information Act.

Rumsfeld last week warned of a rise of Islamic fascism and said that people should not fall into the trap of appeasement as did those who tried to accommodate the Nazis in the 1930s. The remarks led many pundits to compare Rumsfeld's 1983 meeting with Hussein to British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain's meeting with Adolf Hitler in 1938. September 8, 2006, 10:42 am Schwarzenegger Wades into Hot Water

Want to lay odds on how long it takes the Internet crowd to make a techno-mix using a leaked audio tape of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger? Think Stevens' "Tubes!"

The Los Angeles Times obtained a copy of the tape, in which the governor, who is running for re-election this year, allegedly describes Cubans and Puerto Ricans as "very hot" personalities because of their combo of "black blood" and "Latino blood." The tape, which makes it clear that the governor and other participants knew they were being recorded, comes from a spring meeting of Schwarzenegger and close advisers over Republican lawmakers' resistance to a huge state borrowing effort. If this gets leaked two months before Election Day, imagine what sort of October surprise the governor's opponents may have in mind. –Amy Schatz

September 8, 2006, 10:26 am If It Quacks…

Congress's lame-duck session emerges as potential venue for action on legislation important to business. Majority Leader Bill Frist rules out action on comprehensive immigration legislation before the midterm elections but says a deal remains possible during post-election session as the White House hopes.

Frist The lame-duck session will largely be consumed with completion of annual spending bills that Congress won't finish before recessing in October to hit the campaign trail. But lawmakers may take up other issues as well.

Another possibility aside from immigration: extension of the research and development tax credit, a top priority for high technology businesses and a key element of President Bush's competitiveness initiative. So far, the tax credit has been stalled as part of the so-called trifecta bill encompassing cuts in the estate tax and an increase in the minimum wage.

Frist says he intends to keep that controversial package intact through the election and not permit separate action on the R&D credit, which has bipartisan support. But a top Republican aide predicts it may be passed individually in the lame-duck session if Republicans keep control of Capitol Hill.

If Democrats take over, the aide says, Republicans would likely hold back on the extension so that it could "became an opportunity" for the party in the next Congress. –John Harwood

September 8, 2006, 5:55 am AIDS Bill Faces Serious Hurdles

Senate aides say they're close to a bipartisan deal on the contentious reworking of the Ryan White CARE Act, which funds AIDS treatment in the states. Unless Congress passes a bill by Oct. 1, several states risk a drop in federal funding under the program.

DOJ_NMG_0061885

Even with the deadline looming, negotiations between the House and Senate committees and the Bush administration have been difficult. One aide likened the infighting between cities and rural areas, northern states and those in the South, to a "civil war."

Draft legislation circulated this week strikes a compromise on several of the most controversial issues in the protracted talks, which are meant to update the program, named for a young hemophiliac who died of AIDS. To satisfy calls for greater HIV testing without cutting into funds for treatment, the bill would set up a $30 million grant program at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention that states could tap for testing. Overall, states would be able to use 25% of the funds for services other than care and treatment, such as nutrition and transportation, or they could use all the money for treatment if they already provide those services through programs such as Medicaid.

States that use codes to track HIV and AIDS patients would get more time to switch to systems using patients' names, and patients identified by codes would still be counted in the formula that determines funding—a boon to states such as California, Massachusetts and Washington. Still, states would have to switch to a name-based AIDS tracking system by 2011.

It remains to be seen whether state governors, HIV patient-advocacy groups and other members of Congress will back the deal. For the states, much depends on their funding level. –Sarah Lueck

September 8, 2006, 12:02 am Maneuvering Starts for Post-Election House Leadership

Republican insiders say Speaker Hastert would likely become backbencher, not minority leader, if Democrats take over. Stronger Democratic gains would lift odds that Reps. Pence and Shadegg challenge incumbents Boehner and Blunt for leader and whip posts.

"Anyone who is even contemplating losing our majority or personal ambitions" should focus on election campaign, a top Boehner aide counters. While Pryce fights for her Ohio House seat, fellow Republicans warn she could lose leadership post over handling of party message. Pelosi looks set as Democrats' choice for speaker, but moderate Hoyer and war critic Murtha may face off for majority leader.

Still unclear: leadership aspirations of Democrats' campaign chief Emanuel.

PRE-ELECTION INDICATORS may show economy slowing further.

Economists expect employment reports and third-quarter GDP to show increasing sluggishness. But workers' purchasing power may get help from falling oil prices. Declining housing sector represents wild card.

Economists surveyed by WSJ.com put odds of recession within a year at 1 in 4, up from 1 in 5 a year ago. But they divide on how November results would affect long-term deficits; 14 say Republican rule would reduce them most, 14 say Democrats, while 10 say split control. "Democrats = tax increases," says Allen Sinai of Decision Economics, but S&P's David Wyss argues, "Republicans have turned into the spenders."

TRADE TENSIONS flavor midterm elections.

Steel executives and unions jointly seek votes for candidates "willing to stand up for American workers and enforce the trade laws." Their ads in eight states blame China, India and Brazil for "stealing American jobs." Separately, Citizens Trade PAC targets pro-trade Republican incumbents Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Hayes of North Carolina.

U.S. auto makers, still waiting for Bush to meet with Big Three executives, have major stake in administration negotiations on South Korean trade deal. In Seattle, U.S. negotiators press South Korea to open market to U.S. vehicles.

"Business as usual just won't cut it this time," says Democratic Rep. Levin of Michigan.

STRONG MESSAGE? On eve of 9/11 anniversary, Republicans distribute tabloid newspaper "America Weakly" mocking Democrats' security stance. Pro-Republican group Progress for America begins ad campaign featuring father of Flight 93 hero Todd Beamer backing antiterror war.

REPUBLICAN ESTABLISHMENT steps up efforts to stop conservative Laffey from toppling moderate Sen. Chafee in Rhode Island primary Tuesday. Senate campaign committee declares "Steve Laffey is unelectable" and sends mailing amid late turnout drive. Laffey receives $5,000 from illegal-immigration foe Minuteman PAC.

HOLE CARD? White House strategists see low November turnout blunting Democrats' edge in polls. In nearly all 2006 primaries so far, turnout has fallen below 1982-2002 midterm average. One exception: above-average participation in Connecticut's Senate primary nominating antiwar Democrat Lamont over incumbent Lieberman.

COOPERATION? Citing counterterrorism demands, FBI crime lab tells law-enforcement agencies it will no longer routinely conduct latent fingerprint exams for state and local police. It will continue exams in cases posing unusual technical demands and in those "of a high-profile nature," the bureau says.

La.'s Jefferson Fights To Stay In Office (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, September 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — A bribery scandal has Congressman William Jefferson fighting for his political life following eight House terms in which he faced little opposition at election time.

A dozen candidates are challenging Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who FBI agents say was found with $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer. Jefferson denies any impropriety.

The Nov. 7 election is the first time Jefferson has been threatened with defeat since elected to the House in 1990.

"We wouldn't be in the race if not for our friend Jefferson's problems," says Spencer Washington of New Orleans, a supporter of candidate and former New Orleans city councilman Troy Carter.

Louisiana has an open primary system, meaning all 13 candidates regardless of party will appear on the ballot. If no one gets more than 50% of the vote, the two top vote-getters face off in a December runoff.

Jefferson faces eight Democrats — including two state representatives and a former city councilman — three Republicans and one Libertarian.

The race is not likely to shift the balance of power in the House. The district, made up mostly of New Orleans residents, is overwhelmingly Democratic. If Jefferson loses, his successor will be a Democrat, political observers here say.

"That district is not going to vote for a Republican — a white Republican especially," says Hastings Wyman, editor of the Southern Political Report.

Jefferson is Louisiana's only black congressman. New Orleans has a black majority even though more blacks than whites remain displaced since Hurricane Katrina virtually emptied the city in August 2005.

According to returns from last spring's mayoral election, the city is about 55% black, down from more than 67% before Katrina.

Less than half of the city's 460,000 residents have returned, but displaced residents may still vote in the November election if they remain registered in Louisiana.

Challengers to Jefferson say the coming years are too important to the city to be left to a man who may be preoccupied with defending himself.

DOJ_NMG_0061887

This is the first federal race for state Rep. Karen Carter (no relation to Troy Carter), who represents half a dozen New Orleans neighborhoods. She says the district needs new leadership to get through years of recovery from Katrina.

"We're going to be at the federal trough for the next 10 years, minimum, asking for help," she says.

"We need a credible, respected voice coming from the 2nd District."

In an interview Monday, Jefferson denied the bribery allegations and said he is confident of re-election.

"No matter what anybody says, I am innocent," he said.

Jefferson, 59, says voters will re-elect him on his record after Katrina, particularly his co-authorship of the Gulf Opportunity Zone Act, or "Go Zone," which gives tax breaks to businesses along the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast.

An FBI affidavit written in support of a search warrant alleges that Jefferson took money to help a Kentucky technology company called iGate win lucrative contracts in Africa. He has not been formally charged in the FBI sting operation.

In an affidavit sworn out in late May to obtain a search warrant for the congressman's office, the FBI describes Jefferson retrieving a briefcase filled with $100,000 from a car parked outside the Ritz-Carlton in Arlington, Va. An unnamed witness who is an iGate investor alleged Jefferson planned to use the money to coax African officials into deals.

Four days later the FBI raided Jefferson's homes in New Orleans and Washington. The FBI found $90,000 of the cash, which was marked, wrapped in foil in his Washington freezer.

The May 20 raid on his Capitol Hill offices was criticized by leaders of both political parties, who said it was a violation of the constitutional separation of powers.

Two of Jefferson's associates have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with the FBI. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate Inc., was sentenced Friday to 87 months in prison.

Louis Smith, 27, says he is voting for Jefferson.

"I like what he's been doing, and he's innocent until proven guilty," said Smith, who was taking a break Monday from installing countertops to eat barbecued ribs on his sheltered patio.

Jefferson's opponents are highlighting not only the congressman's alleged misdoings but his consequent loss of power in the House. In June, House Democrats removed him from his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

"When you don't have that position anymore and the seniority you'd otherwise be able to tout means nothing, you can't deliver what we need in the post-Katrina world," Karen Carter says. "It's absolutely critical that we have effective leadership when we make the ask (for money) year after year to rebuild this region."

Despite the long odds, the Republicans have not given up.

Political newcomer Joe Lavigne has waged a vigorous campaign with a profusion of yard signs and ads.

"I don't think it's as long a shot as people think," says Lavigne, 30, an attorney.

"The issues are not Republican or Democratic issues," he says. "The issue is how we're going to rebuild New Orleans bigger and better."

Louisiana Players Aid Jefferson Foe (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

As she builds support for her bid to oust embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D), Louisiana state Rep. Karen Carter (D) is getting help from several influential Louisiana Democrats, including former Sens. J. Bennett Johnston and John Breaux and former Rep. Chris John.

"I think she's a very impressive young woman," Johnston said Monday. "I think she is just exactly what New Orleans needs. It is more important than ever for New Orleans to be well represented. Somebody who can put a good face on the city."

Carter is one of 12 candidates who filed to challenge Jefferson in the Nov. 7, all-party primary. A December runoff is highly likely, unless one candidate gets more than 50 percent of the vote.

Jefferson has been embroiled in a federal bribery investigation since last year, and the FBI has raided his home and offices. He has not been charged and has denied any wrongdoing.

But Carter, 36, is making effectiveness the central issue of of her campaign, asserting that Jefferson's situation is both "embarrassing and disappointing," and the investigation is detracting from his Congressional work.

She said she has built a broad coalition of support, which includes business community and organized labor leaders, and she is also touting the backing of influential New Orleans Republicans.

Among them are Donald "Boysie" Bollinger, a shipyard mogul, and developer Joe Canizaro. Both Bollinger and Canizaro achieved "Super Ranger" status for their fundraising efforts during the 2004 Bush presidential campaign.

High-profile Democrats are also supporting her bid.

DOJ_NMG_0061888

Today she is set to receive the endorsements of New Orleans City Council President Oliver Thomas and City Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge-Morrell.

Hedge-Morrell is the wife of Criminal Court Clerk Arthur Morrell, a former state Representative and one-time chairman of the Legislative Black Caucus.

Thomas will headline Carter's first major fundraising event Thursday in New Orleans.

A big Washington, D.C., fundraiser is also in the works for early October, and Carter was in D.C. last week to meet with party leaders and interest groups. John, who helped escort Carter around town last week, is putting the October event together.

"I'm trying to help raise her some money," said John, who lost a 2004 Senate bid. "She's committed, she's smart. I think she'd be great for New Orleans."

John served with Carter in the state Legislature and has other past ties to Capitol Hill.

While earning her undergraduate degree at Howard University, Carter interned for Breaux as well as for then-Rep. Billy Tauzin (D-La.), who later switched parties.

"Karen comes from a prominent, highly respected political family in New Orleans. And I think she would make a terrific member of Congress," Breaux said in a statement.

Jefferson spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said the Congressman was not sweating the support of the three well-connected Members-turned-lobbyists.

"People in Washington certainly aren't going to win the race on the ground in New Orleans," Roussell said.

She added that the New Orleans mayoral race earlier this year was proof that support on the ground trumps money, and she also said that Carter's endorsements were not surprising because they come from people in "the same political organization."

Carter's father was the first black elected assessor in New Orleans, and the district he represented included some of the city's most influential territory, like the French Quarter.

Roussell said Jefferson still has a wide range of support within New Orleans and the 2nd district, and that he would be announcing his endorsements soon.

"Votes and connections with people are going to win the race — and the Congressmen's record," she said.

Jefferson has suffered from diminished fundraising in light of the federal investigation. In the second quarter of this year he raised just $20,000, but as of July 22, he had $322,000 in his campaign war chest.

Carter met with EMILY's List last week and an endorsement from the organization would no doubt be a financial boon to her campaign. Roussell said Jefferson is "doing very well" on the money front as well as in the field. She noted that on Saturday, while Carter attended the Congressional Black Caucus' annual legislative conference in Washington, D.C., Jefferson had a citywide canvass.

At the CBC gathering on Friday, Jefferson hosted a forum on rebuilding New Orleans. Mayor Ray Nagin (D), who won re-election earlier this year in a costly and high-profile runoff, attended the event.

Jefferson endorsed Nagin in his race against Louisiana Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D) — brother of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) — and the mayor could repay the favor by endorsing the Congressman's bid.

Carter has assembled a team of highly regarded consultants. She has hired Cornell Belcher as her pollster and the campaign expects to do a survey within the next two weeks.

Belcher, founder of Brilliant Corners Research and Strategies, is the lead pollster for the Democratic National Committee and is known for his focus on black voters as well as people of faith.

An independent survey done the week of Aug. 7 by Florida-based pollster Vern Kennedy, who specializes in polling for independent and business groups, showed Carter positioned to make the runoff with Jefferson. It showed Jefferson at 25 percent, Carter with 14 percent and state Rep. Derrick Shepherd (D) with 9 percent.

Carter also has hired Washington-based media consultant Dino Seder, who is teaming up with New Orleans-based Carvin Consulting to work on the race.

Carvin consulting founder Jim Carvin is one of Louisiana's original political advertising gurus, and the firm has worked to elect the past 10 New Orleans mayors, including Nagin in his recent race.

While there is no doubt less population in the New Orleans-based district, Roussell said the demographics of the district have not changed as much as people might think in the wake of Hurricane Katrina because some city residents have relocated to suburbs still within the district.

Unlike in the mayoral election earlier this year, which was held on a Saturday and not a Tuesday, satellite voting will not be allowed for New Orleans residents in November.

Democratic strategist and Louisiana native Donna Brazile, a contributing writer for Roll Call, noted that absentee balloting could be a big factor in the election and runoff.

DOJ_NMG_0061889

"The key is getting some of the displaced voters who are scattered around the state of Louisiana and the country to cast absentee ballots," Brazile said.

Aside from Carter and Shepherd, former state Rep. Troy Carter, who is also a former New Orleans city councilman, is the only other well-known contender in the 13 candidate field. Shepherd has already aired campaign ads.

Attorney Joe Lavigne is running the highest-profile campaign on the GOP side. But it is still viewed as a long shot that he can garner enough votes to make the runoff.

RI Senator Targeted In Tuesday Primary (AP-Y)

By Robert Tanner

AP, September 12, 2006

Moderate GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island faces a serious challenge Tuesday as the last big flurry of primary elections provides another test of the depth of anti-incumbent sentiment and the erosion of the political middle ground.

In all, nine states and Washington, D.C., hold primary elections. Maryland Democrats choose a Senate candidate to go up against Republican Michael Steele, the lieutenant governor. An open House seat in Arizona has drawn a contentious crowd of GOP candidates, as well as several hopefuls on the Democratic side. Minnesota Democrats will pick a candidate for a House seat left open by retiring 14-term Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo.

Many races won't be close, but will set up important November contests that include Senate seats in Arizona and Minnesota, and the race for governor in Maryland, Minnesota, Rhode Island and Wisconsin. Other states holding primaries are Delaware, New Hampshire, New York and Vermont, while the District of Columbia will select mayoral candidates.

Chafee's bid for a second term is the latest race with a moderate targeted by his own party's hard-line critics. Connecticut's Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman was beaten by anti-war candidate Ned Lamont, though the incumbent is still running as an independent, and Michigan Rep. Joe Schwarz, a moderate Republican targeted by the anti-tax Club for Growth, also was defeated.

Two other incumbents lost primaries in the last two months, though both had grown unpopular for their personal behavior — Alaska GOP Gov. Frank Murkowski and Democratic Rep. Cynthia McKinney of Georgia.

Chafee has also been targeted by the Club for Growth, a Washington-based group that has tried, not always successfully, to force candidates to vote against taxes. The group is backing Steve Laffey, a former investment banker and mayor of Cranston, R.I.

Chafee has drawn a remarkable amount of support from national Republicans, especially for a senator who has often been at odds with the party, bucking the administration on tax cuts, civil liberties and the Iraq war. He has the distinction of being the only Republican to vote against the use of military force in Iraq.

Polls a month before the primary showed the two Republicans running even.

Chafee himself acknowledged that the race could hinge on turnout in heavily Democratic Rhode Island, saying a low turnout could mean his defeat. His campaign has encouraged Democrats to drop their party registration so they could vote for him.

The battle comes amid a national fight for Congress, with Democrats hoping national dismay with the Bush administration and the GOP-led Congress could boost their efforts to win majorities in the House and Senate. Democrats need to win six Senate seats — and Rhode Island's is one of the more vulnerable, with polls showing Laffey would lose to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general, in the general election.

The last days of the campaign brought a flurry of mean-spirited mailings to voters. Fliers from the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which is backing Chafee, accused Laffey of wasting taxpayers' money, giving favors to campaign donors and being disrespectful of seniors.

Laffey's campaign sent voters letters and fliers criticizing Chafee for supporting abortion rights, being weak on terrorism and failing to protect Social Security.

Peter Ubertaccio, a political science professor at Stonehill College in Easton, Mass., said the negative tactics may better serve Laffey because his supporters are already behind him, while Chafee needs more of the undecided voters.

"Laffey seems to have that kind of momentum, and this just adds fuel to the fire," Ubertaccio said.

The fight for Congress also fuels a primary race for an open House seat in southeastern Arizona, where five Republicans and six Democrats jumped in when 11-term GOP Rep. Jim Kolbe, a moderate Republican, announced his retirement.

Candidates have argued about border security, illegal immigration and the war, but the campaign flashed into national view after the National Republican Congressional Committee ran an ad supporting Steve Huffman. Other candidates were furious.

Other races to watch include:

DOJ_NMG_0061890

· The Maryland Democratic Senate primary, where Rep. Ben Cardin and Kweisi Mfume, a former congressman and one-time head of the NAACP, are among 18 contenders for an open seat. The winner will face Steele, who, if he wins in the fall, would be the Senate's only black Republican.

· The Democratic primary for a House seat in Minnesota in an open, reliably Democratic district which includes Minneapolis. Four candidates are running, including state legislator Keith Ellison, who won his party's backing. If he won, Ellison would be the first Muslim member of Congress.

· The New York Democratic primary for attorney general, with former federal Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo — son of former Gov. Mario Cuomo — against Mark Green, the former New York City Public Advocate.

Also in New York, frontrunning Democratic gubernatorial candidate Eliot Spitzer faces a challenge from Nassau County Executive Tom Suozzi, while Sen. Hillary Clinton was far ahead of anti-war candidate Jonathan Tasini.

GOP Leaders Throw Weight Behind Chafee (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington And Rebecca Knight In Providence, Rhode Island

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Lincoln Chafee is not your average Republican. He voted against President George W. Bush's 2001 tax cuts. The following year, he was the only Republican in the Senate to oppose the Iraq war resolution. Last week, he stood in the way of his party's plans to extend John Bolton's tenure as US ambassador to the United Nations.

None of that seems to matter these days to national Republican leaders, who are doing all they can to ensure that Mr Chafee wins his party's primary election in Rhode Island on Tuesday. If he loses to Stephen Laffey, the conservative mayor of Cranston, they fear the party has no hope of keeping the seat in November's general election, imperilling the Republicans' control of the Senate.

"If Laffey wins, it really says that Republicans in Rhode Island care more about the purity of their ideology than holding the seat," said Wendy Schiller, a political science professor at Brown University in Providence, the state capital.

There are only about 70,000 registered Republicans in the state – about 10 per cent of all voters – and most political observers predict they will back Mr Laffey by a wide margin. A win by Mr Chafee depends on how many of the 340,000 independents who are eligible to vote in the primary show up at the polls to support him. Public opinion polls have varied widely, leaving the outcome uncertain.

Providence, like the state, tends to vote Democratic. Yet pockets of independent voters can be found in areas such as Wayland Square, a wealthy enclave in the eastern section of the city filled with stately homes with manicured lawns. A walk down Wayland Avenue, dotted with fine wine stores and clothing boutiques, finds the electorate divided.

Mr Laffey's constituency is composed mostly of pro-Bush, right-leaning voters who are frustrated by Mr Chafee's moderate politics. "[Chafee] is not a Republican," said one of Mr Laffey's supporters. "I appreciate what Stephen is trying to do by bringing back the party to its core values."

The Club for Growth, a Washington group that supports fiscally conservative candidates, has encouraged that view, praising the economic turnaround of Cranston under the energetic Mr Laffey and complaining about Mr Chafee's voting record in Washington. Its political action committee has spent $400,000 (€315,000, £215,000) on advertisements against Mr Chafee and its members have donated more than $700,000 to Mr Laffey's campaign.

David Keating, the group's executive director, said a win by Mr Laffey "would send a clear message to the Republican establishment that their base is sick of Washington's wasteful business-as-usual spending".

Mr Chafee holds the seat once occupied by his father, the late John Chafee, a popular figure and former governor, and the two are the only Republicans the state has sent to the Senate since the Great Depression.

Carl Simkevich, a university scientist, is casting his vote for Mr Chafee, but grudgingly. "I am voting for Chafee because I don't think that Laffey is electable," he said, predicting that Mr Laffey would lose to Sheldon Whitehouse, the Democratic candidate. But, he adds: "I wish Chafee were more of a Republican. He's certainly ticked off a lot of people in his party."

There are parallels between this race and last month's Democratic Senate primary in Connecticut, where Joseph Lieberman, a three-term senator, was defeated by Ned Lamont, a political novice who complained about Mr Lieberman's support for the war and his inattention to the state. Most important may be what the contests say about voters' preference for fresh blood over incumbents from either party.

Political analysts say that while the low-key Mr Chafee is known nationally for his independent streak – in 2004 he cast a symbolic protest vote against Mr Bush's re-election, writing in the name of his father instead – he has not done enough to cement his relationship with voters in Rhode Island.

A former specialist in equine foot care, Mr Chafee has flirted with leaving the Republican party. But the National Republican Senatorial Committee has stood by him, insisting that Mr Chafee is "the only Republican" who can beat the Democrats' candidate. Elizabeth Dole, chair of the committee, said that if Mr Laffey won today, her group would not spend any money to help him in November.

But they should be careful what they wish for. Nancy Bassel, a government worker who is registered as an independent, said she planned to vote for Mr Chafee. "There are certain issues that concern me – I am against the war and I am pro-choice – and I like that Chafee is a pretty liberal Republican," she said while browsing the discounted paperbacks outside Books on the Square, a cozy bookshop in Wayland Square. "I've always voted for Chafee and frankly I am a little surprised he hasn't crossed over [to the Democratic party]."

Laffey Decries Party, Beltway In His 'outsider' Campaign (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, September 12, 2006

CRANSTON, R.I. – If Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) were any other Republican senator running in a blue state, his move last week to block the nomination of United Nations Ambassador John Bolton on an expected party-line vote might smack of election-year politics.

But the move, which came five days before Chafee's heated primary culminates today, was business as usual for arguably the most moderate — or, as his party detractors say, liberal — Republican in the Senate.

While Chafee recently called his support for President Bush's agenda "spotty at best," his primary opponent, Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, is more conservative and likely would be a more dependable vote for the party. But with the Republican establishment entrenched against him in the name of keeping the seat Republican, Laffey has harnessed an anti-Washington approach to campaigning, hoping his outsider credentials will help him best Chafee then overcome some long odds to win in the general in this heavily independent but very blue state.

In Rhode Island, a slight majority of the state's voters are registered independents. Of the rest, there are more than three registered Democrats for every Republican.

Running in an open primary that could be largely decided by those independent voters, Laffey tries to avoid labels like "conservative" and "Republican." Early in the campaign he stressed Chafee's distance from the party and his own conservative credentials, but now he talks more about how Chafee has made himself irrelevant and how Washington needs someone who effects change instead of a "nice guy" who passively embodies independence.

He points to the fact that Chafee was among the last to decide on how he would vote on the nomination of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito and now the senator's indecision on Bolton (Chafee cites recent events in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and said they raise new questions about Bolton). Laffey also has called for Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation and classifies two of the four major plans on his website as "liberal" in nature.

Meanwhile, Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse is waiting in the wings. With no significant primary opposition, he has been able to focus his efforts on each of the Republicans while they duke it out amongst themselves.

Polls have given vastly different indications about who enters the Republican primary ahead — with one showing Laffey in the lead by 17 points and one showing Chafee up 14. But they all show Chafee and Whitehouse neck-and-neck in the general election while Laffey would have about 25-30 points to make up against the Democrat.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) has argued that Laffey cannot beat Whitehouse and the party has mobilized in support of Chafee, even though he has bucked them time and time again — on President Bush's tax cuts, on the war in Iraq, on social issues, on Alito and now possibly on Bolton.

The NRSC also said last week that it would not support Laffey should he win the primary. Laffey said that the NRSC, the Republican National Committee and the White House have asked him to withdraw.

Visiting with Cranston constituents at a well-attended Greek festival in the parking lot of a local church, Laffey insists he doesn't want the national party's help. And it's quite apparent that he has grown tired being asked whether he can win in the general.

"It's unfortunate that people concentrate on something that's so foolish," said Laffey, who has predicted he would "crush" Whitehouse. "You can't do a general election poll 'til this primary's done anyways. … Linc Chafee can't win the general election."

Laffey has made a trademark of his "blitzes" in which he runs — literally — from door to door meeting voters in this tiny state of about a million people. Asked how many people he visits who express concern about his electability, he initially says "nobody" and then concedes that it's more like "maybe one out of 100, one out of 200 people."

Donna Barrett of Warwick counts herself as one of those concerned Laffey voters. Sitting beneath a tent at the festival on Saturday evening and chatting with Laffey, she later explains that she's got to "vote my conscience" but says she is "a little bit nervous" that a Laffey victory today would hand Democrats the seat in November.

But she also says people she talks to aren't concerned about it. She attributes her skepticism to that fact that she pays more attention to political news than most people.

Barrett buys into Laffey's outsider approach. She doesn't dislike Chafee and says she wishes Laffey were an independent, but she says there's something to be said for a new face for the sake of a new face considering the state of affairs in Washington.

"I just don't think anybody dislikes Chafee," she said of the former Warwick mayor, who took his seat in 1999 after the death of his father, popular longtime Republican Sen. John Chafee. "It's going to be tough for me not to vote for Chafee."

Laffey, meanwhile, with his brash, in-your-face style, is a more polished campaigner. At the festival he says he is there as mayor and not a candidate, though he reminds at least a few people about today's primary as he frenetically leaps from one person to another, kissing the women and constantly grasping hands. His style plays to his message of populism and outworking everybody.

Chafee, meanwhile, has tried to paint Laffey's intensity as instability. Standing in front of his campaign headquarters before a barbeque Saturday morning, the sign his supporters hold up behind him for the TV cameras says it all: "Keep Chafee." A Chafee has held the seat for three decades; Laffey, meanwhile, is too unpredictable, Chafee says.

Speaking frequently in the third person as if to emphasize the Chafee name, the senator describes his style as "a very stable, thoughtful, calm, steady approach, whereas my opponent's more likely to say whatever suits the audience he's talking to at the moment. And I think Rhode Islanders are going to see that."

Political Moderates Imperiled (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 12, 2006

CRANSTON, R.I.

Many drivers roaring toward the beach wave, honk, or flash thumbs up to Sen. Lincoln Chafee and a gaggle of roadside campaign volunteers hoisting "Keep Chafee" signs. Some travelers don't react at all. But one woman scowls and plunges a thumb toward the dashboard.

"It's rare you see a woman [do that]," muses the Republican senator to those standing nearby. "We'll get her in the general [election]!" cries out an aide.

That's if Senator Chafee manages to get to the general election. Monday's GOP primary in Rhode Island will tell whether the soft-spoken, middle-of-the-road incumbent will survive a political climate that's unfriendly to moderates - or whether the state's Republicans prefer a candidate closer to the GOP conservative base, even if that raises the risk of losing the seat in November to a Democrat.

Campaign 2006 is proving to be a scorcher for moderates of both parties, especially in the Northeast, where at least eight of the key races for control of the House and Senate will be decided.

"Moderates in the Northeast are a disappearing species, and this could be the year of the final purge," says Darrell West, a political scientist at Brown University in Providence.

Like fellow moderate Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut, Chafee could lose the primary to a rival who's more aligned with the base. Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey has run an aggressive campaign, and, heading into the vote, polls show that either candidate could win.

But unlike the Connecticut primary, the Rhode Island contest is not just about Iraq or the candidate's ties to President Bush. It's about whether a politician can hold middle ground when the pull in both parties is to the extremes. It's also about contrasting candidate styles - Chafee, low-key and reflective; Mr. Laffey, high intensity and no shades of gray - in a state so small that one-on-ones with voters can still make a difference.

Chafee is the only Republican senator to have voted against the use of force in Iraq, and has bucked the Bush White House on issues ranging from tax cuts and Social Security to abortion rights and regulation of the environment. He also cast the lone GOP vote against confirmation of Samuel Alito to the US Supreme Court. His stands won him enemies among conservative activists, especially the Club for Growth, which hopes to make Chafee its second trophy this primary season.

It's also a key election for the Senate Republican establishment, which is supporting Chafee with advisers, mailings, and ads, as well as a highly targeted get-out-the-vote drive in the last 72 hours.

Early on, the National Republican Senatorial Committee urged Laffey to not get into the race, on the grounds that only a moderate could win a general election in a blue state like Rhode Island.

"The NRSC said I would make a good lieutenant governor ... a job with no power. I said to them: 'Do I look like a lieutenant governor to you?' " says Laffey, a former investment banker, who works the crowd at a Greek festival in Cranston as rapidly as he speaks. Chafee, he says, is "indecisive and irrelevant" in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0061893

National Republican Party groups have poured more than $1 million into the state for Chafee, blanketing Rhode Island with mailings that charge that Laffey is a "tax and spend" politician, "will say anything to get elected," and "just isn't ready for the Senate." The NRSC released a statement last week calling Laffey "unelectable in a general election."

Meanwhile, the Club for Growth, an antitax group, has raised comparable funds for Laffey. Its ads and mailings have been a constant in the state since May, including claims that Chafee "has been awfully busy trying to raise taxes," supports pork projects such as the "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska, and would give Social Security to illegal immigrants.

"Both political parties are being pulled to the extremes," says Chafee.

After Sen. Arlen Specter beat back a challenge from former Rep. Pat Toomey and the Club for Growth in the 2004 Pennsylvania GOP primary, Chafee hired key Specter strategists for his own race. "They have a track record beating the Club for Growth," he says.

In fact, highly intense races are rare in Rhode Island, where only about 1 in 10 voters are registered Republicans. Asked about this race, many at the Lions Club steak fry in West Greenwich say they're tired of all the advertising. "They're slaughtering one another with those ads on TV," says George Mitchell of Cranston, who says he's still on the fence. But the bigger fight for Republicans will come in the general election. "Everyone's mad at Bush, and Republicans are going to get slaughtered because of it. Just look at Connecticut," he adds.

While Laffey likes to "blitz campaign" around the state in a Suburban or a Winnebago, Chafee drives himself in a green Prius. "Senator Chafee likes to criticize, but when you count all the children we put in that Winnebago, we're getting about 80 miles per gallon per person," says Kelly Laffey, Stephen's wife.

The typically low turnout in Rhode Island primary elections - the record was 45,000 back in 1964 - makes this race especially difficult to predict. A recent Rhode Island College poll shows Laffey leading 51 to 34 percent. In response, the NRSC released its own poll, by Public Opinion Strategies, showing Chafee leading 53 to 39 percent.

"I have no faith in polling in this race, because we have no idea how many people are going to turn out," says Jennifer Duffy, who analyzes Senate races for the Cook political report. Almost 50 percent of Rhode Island voters are independents and, unlike Connecticut, independents can vote in this race.

"If we can get turnout up to 45,000, we will prevail," predicts Chafee. National environmental groups such as the Sierra Club and the League of Conservation Voters are urging activists in the state to turn out for Chafee.

But Laffey dismisses the projections. "Tuesday will send a real message to the Washington [GOP] elite," he says.

In Cranston, voter Howard Fleming assures the mayor that when a Chafee worker asked whether he was going to support the senator, he said: " 'Yes, to the very end' ... if you get what I mean."

Burns' Foe Compiles Highlight Reel Of Gaffes (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 12, 2006

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) had a bumpy August politically, to say the least.

Yet the three-term lawmaker with a penchant for putting his foot in his mouth entered September in surprisingly good shape given the negative publicity his comments generated.

That hasn't stopped Burns' opponent, state Senate President Jon Tester (D), from compiling a "highlight reel" of the Senator's gaffes, which his campaign will begin showing on the YouTube Web site today.

Whether he was accusing Virginia firefighters of doing a "piss-poor job" or commenting about the "nice little Guatemalan man" — with uncertain immigration status — who is doing work on his Virginia home, Burns spent most of August apologizing for his off-the-cuff remarks.

Probably the most damaging incident came in late July when Burns reportedly stalked up to an elite group of firefighters from Augusta, Va., in the Billings, Mont., airport and accused them of not doing a "goddamned thing" to put out a raging wildfire in Montana.

"You probably paid [one of the firefighters] $10,000 to sit around; it's gotta change," he told the group, according to the report written by a Montana Department of Natural Resources and Conservation employee charged with looking into the incident.

Burns apologized quickly, issuing a statement that said: "In retrospect, I wish I had chosen my words more carefully. My criticism of the way in which the fire was handled should not have been directed at those who were working hard to put it out."

By mid-August, Burns was taking friendly ribbing from Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), who was in Helena, Mont., stumping for Burns.

Warner recounted how as a young man he worked for the Forest Service in Montana, "fighting fires, Conrad," he said, turning toward Burns and coughing conspicuously.

DOJ_NMG_0061894

The move generated laughs at the event.

Yet for all the negative publicity, polls taken during the thick of it showed Burns running even with his Democratic challenger.

A USA Today/Gallup poll released on Sept. 1 showed Burns leading Tester 44 percent to 42 percent among registered voters, which was within the survey's margin of error. That's good news, according to the Burns camp.

"You look at all that has happened in the last year and he's within the margin of error starting the home stretch?" asked Erik Iverson, the Burns campaign's new senior adviser. "I honestly believe that Tester peaked too soon."

Tester spokesman Matt McKenna dismissed the notion that Burns is where he wants to be.

"I think that sounds like somebody who's been living in Washington, D.C., for the last year," McKenna said of Iverson. "Those of us who have been in Montana for more than 15 minutes recognize that there's an appetite for real change here."

Iverson is on a leave of absence from his duties as chief of staff to Rep. Denny Rehberg (R-Mont.) through the end of the campaign.

Iverson does not equate his hiring to the 2000 campaign, during which Burns was in serious trouble against now-Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer (D), who was then a political unknown, and turned to veteran GOP operative Dick Wadhams to pull him across the finish line.

"We got 60 days to go and it's all hands on deck," Iverson said. "I see myself as a supplement to what the campaign was doing before.

Tester's campaign chalks up the tight contest, despite Burns' verbal miscues, to the power of incumbency.

"He's a three-term incumbent U.S. Senator who spent $5 million and all he has to show for it is a tied race with a dirt farmer from Big Sandy," McKenna said.

Burns has used Hugo Reyes, the "nice little Guatemalan man," for yuks before.

At a June meeting, Burns told the group he has "this little fella who does our maintenance work around the house." Burns said he asked to see Reyes' green card, but Reyes demurred.

"I said 'oh gosh,'" Burns recounted.

Later that month at a debate with Tester, Burns told another anecdote about workers whose immigration status was unknown.

Burns said he was speaking to his contractor in Virginia when he saw an interview with an illegal roofing worker caught at the Mexican border on the TV news.

"So I told my roofer, 'you better go down and get your help or you won't get my house roofed."

Iverson said the legal status of Reyes' or any other employee doing work on the Senator's his Virginia home has never been in question.

"My understanding is that it is well documented that he's here legally and there is no question about that," Iverson said.

Two union chiefs have written Burns inquiring about the immigration status of his contractors.

Iverson dismissed the letters, which he has not seen, as "gotcha politics."

"This is the tempest in the teapot, this is some folks trying to make something out of nothing," Iverson said. "This is a desperate attempt to try to keep this story going."

The Burns campaign has not provided documentation that Reyes or any other handymen on the job at Burns' home are in the country legally.

Iverson said Burns does not condone illegal immigration, and his stance on the issue is clear.

As for his gaffes, Iverson said they won't be a political issue because Montanans know Burns well enough to know he does not mean any offense.

"Sure, were there some misstatements?" Iverson asked. "Absolutely. But at the end of the day with Conrad, what you see is what you get. He's not your typical pre-packaged politician; he's a real person."

Burns recently said that there are terrorists in this country who "drive taxicabs in the daytime and kill at night."

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, who has made much of reaching out to black and Hispanic voters during his tenure, dismissed Burns' past statements.

"I don't think these statements are seen as reflective of the party or his record," Mehlman said in an interview with Roll Call reporters and editors. "People vote for Conrad Burns because of his [legislative] record, not necessarily the things he says."

Iverson said Montana voters know Burns is not racially intolerant.

"We're all fallible," Iverson said. "We all make a mistake. He has absolute respect for our firefighters. He has respect for people of all different backgrounds."

Under Fire, Democrat Retreats (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

The U.S. Senate campaign of Missouri Democrat Claire McCaskill has been under sharp criticism since she accused President Bush of letting poor blacks in Louisiana die during Hurricane Katrina.

Mrs. McCaskill, the state auditor, is attempting to link Republican Sen. Jim Talent with the president as she tries to unseat the incumbent.

"George Bush let people die on rooftops in New Orleans because they were poor and because they were black," she told a group of Democratic state legislators last week.

The comments, made as she outlined Mr. Talent's efforts to attract minority voters, were first reported by Pub Def Weekly, a St. Louis-based blog.

"In a spirited voice, she told them that she would do everything she could to make clear to every Democratic voter that 'George Bush has no better friend than Jim Talent,'" wrote Pub Def Weekly's Antonio D. French.

Republicans, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, immediately called upon Mrs. McCaskill to apologize for the remarks.

"It is totally unconscionable to suggest that the Coast Guard helicopter crews who worked hours long past regulation were intentionally leaving poor, black Americans to die on their rooftops," Mr. Frist said on his blog.

Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who leads the Senate Republican campaign arm, issued a similar statement: "These outrageous comments have no place in public discourse."

But Mrs. McCaskill told KMOX radio in Missouri the statement's context as reported by Pub Def Weekly is "not exactly correct." She said she was acknowledging the sentiment of many Americans, and national tragedies are the time when people need government the most.

She characterized the Bush response to Katrina as "gross incompetence that turned tragic because so many of the people in New Orleans didn't have the resources to help themselves."

"Clearly, the Bush administration needs to accept blame for the tragedy in Katrina," she said.

Mr. Talent has been running television ads that laud his work with Democrats and portray him as an independent thinker. They don't mention Mr. Bush, who raised about $600,000 for Mr. Talent at a private Kansas City fundraiser Friday.

Former President Bill Clinton, meanwhile, campaigned for Mrs. McCaskill and Missouri Democrats at a weekend fundraiser in St. Louis that raised more than $1 million.

"You can vote for someone who will perpetuate the control of the narrow strip of the Republican Party that's been running America for six years," Mr. Clinton told attendees. "Or you can vote for someone who would be a proud successor in the Senate to Harry Truman: Claire McCaskill."

Mich. Voters Focus On Economy (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

PONTIAC, Mich. -- Mike Bouchard was eager to make the sale as he bantered with Tracey Allen at a Labor Day street fair. Pitching his Republican candidacy for the U.S. Senate, the Oakland County sheriff heard her say she favored Democratic incumbent Debbie Stabenow.

"Tell me," Bouchard smiled, holding a plastic water bottle under Allen's chin as a mock microphone, "what has she accomplished to make your life better? Thirty seconds or less."

When Allen merely smiled, he persisted: "I'll get you results!"

The candidate's high-spirited determination charmed Allen, but after he had moved on, she said Stabenow was her choice.

"I just want my gas to go down and my cost of living to go down," Allen said. "Everybody has felt the wrath of Bush. Anybody who is attached to the Republicans, I want out of office."

In Michigan, the November election is likely to come down to whom the voters blame for one of the nation's most troubled economies. With unemployment higher than the national average and many residents frustrated with Democratic Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, Republicans see a chance for a swing-state victory.

Bouchard has kept within striking distance in his first statewide race. But as he works to cultivate an image as a seasoned lawman and a pragmatic politician, he is finding that many voters are unwilling to replace a Democrat in Washington with a largely unknown Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0061896

Recent polls show Stabenow with about 50 percent of the vote and a lead of eight to 13 percentage points. She took her Senate seat six years ago after a one-point victory over incumbent Republican Spencer Abraham.

At this point in the 2000 race, she was more than a dozen points behind -- a fact cited by both sides this time. Stabenow's team points out how much better she is doing. Bouchard's advisers suggest there is plenty of time to catch up.

The GOP draws hope from polls showing that two in three voters are dissatisfied with Michigan's direction. The jobless rate rose to 7 percent in July, compared with 4.8 percent nationwide. Given deepening troubles in the auto industry, economists expect the number to remain high even with seasonal hiring.

A brain drain fueled by pessimism about the state's economic future has left Michigan ranked 49th nationally between 2000 and 2005 in retaining young adults, according to the Census Bureau. Detroit, no longer vibrant no matter how its leaders try, has lost a million residents since its heyday.

"Only three states have lost jobs in the last four years," as one Republican ad puts it. "Two of them -- Louisiana and Mississippi -- were devastated by hurricanes. The third is Michigan."

The state's long list of economic woes has been particularly damaging to first-term governor Granholm, who has suffered heavily as she battles a Republican-led legislature and a joyless budget squeeze.

Her Republican challenger -- Dick DeVos, former president of Amway Corp. -- has hammered her relentlessly while pouring more than $12 million of his own money into the race.

Polls suggest Granholm has a slight edge. A Detroit Free Press poll showed her ahead by two points at the end of August after closing an earlier four-point gap. A sounding for the Detroit News and four television stations gave her a seven-point lead.

That late-August poll, conducted by Epic-MRA, found that 50 percent of respondents viewed Granholm favorably and 49 percent unfavorably. The polls and recent interviews with more than a dozen voters in four cities also show the intense interest in the governor's race has distracted attention from the Senate contest.

"The Senate race is being overwhelmed by the governor's race," said Bill Rustem of Lansing-based Public Sector Consultants, who believes the situation helps the better-known incumbent. "The less attention is paid to the race, the less people know about who the alternative is, the better it is for Stabenow."

Stabenow, 56, is a former House member who has outraised Bouchard by millions of dollars. She is casting herself as more experienced and a reliable vote against what she calls the "Bush agenda." She says the GOP has shortchanged education and turned its back on manufacturing.

To counter Bouchard's claims that she has accomplished little -- Republicans at the state convention dubbed her "Do-Nothing Debbie" -- she cites favored bills and amendments.

On larger issues, Stabenow voted against the Iraq invasion while voting since for military spending. As a senator from a strong trade union state, she rejected a proposed guest-worker program, speaking against "importing cheap labor when you have Americans willing to work for good wages."

The two Senate candidates have dueled over border and homeland security issues, which Bouchard consider his strong suit. At 50, he is former state legislator and career police officer and member of one of the FBI's joint terrorism task forces, a network of dozens of teams across the country.

Stabenow speaks often about radio operability, the often unfulfilled goal of law agencies being able to speak to one another in a crisis. Bouchard, who volunteered for duty at Ground Zero and in flood-battered New Orleans, suggests that his rival is well intentioned but unschooled.

"I live, eat and breathe that. She doesn't understand the issue. She never got any of it done and in my book, talk is cheap," Bouchard said at a Pontiac coffee shop. "It's going to be a campaign based on results. She doesn't have them."

President Bush is broadly unpopular in Michigan but jetted into the state Friday to raise money for Bouchard. Bouchard said he was grateful for Bush's fundraising help, but he is keeping a certain distance, mindful of the national mood. He tells voters, "I'm the guy from Michigan who happens to be a Republican."

With both candidates calling it an election about change, the campaigns are essentially pushing voters to decide who, if anyone, should be ousted.

Is it, as Stabenow contends, the Republicans who dominate policymaking in Washington? Or, as Bouchard maintains, the Democrat who governs in Lansing and the one who commutes to Washington?

"I don't blame them," Southfield electrician Gregory Bracey, 54, said of Granholm and Stabenow. "Their hands are tied. We know Republicans are in charge."

But at the annual Peach Fest parade in the reliably Republican town of Romeo, north of Detroit, 20-year General Motors worker Clay Osborne said the two women deserve early retirement.

"There's a lot of jobs leaving the state," said Osborne, 59, as he stood at the corner of South Main and Pleasant. "Since Governor Granholm and Senator Stabenow have been in office, it's gone down the tubes."

Chicago's Daley Vetoes Bill Aimed At Big Retailers (WSJ)

By Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley used the first veto of his 17-year tenure to reject a living-wage ordinance aimed at forcing big retailers to pay wages of $10 an hour and health benefits equivalent to $3 an hour by 2010.

The veto is important to Wal-Mart Stores Inc., which plans to open its first store in Chicago late this month in the economically depressed 37th ward. The Bentonville, Ark., retailer is expanding to cities such as Chicago after saturating many rural markets in the U.S. (See the veto letter.1)

Mayor Daley had to persuade only two aldermen to reverse course on the ordinance to ensure his veto isn't overridden. The aldermen had voted 35-14 on July 26 to pass the ordinance.

The ordinance's sponsor, Alderman Joseph Moore, said an override of the veto remains possible. He said the council could delay its vote on the veto rather than settling the issue at its meeting tomorrow, when Alderman Manuel Flores, one of those who supports the ordinance, will be absent at a leadership conference in China. With more time, the votes could tip back in the ordinance's favor, Mr. Moore said. "Going against popular will, the mayor has now put the issue back squarely into the laps of the city council," Mr. Moore said. "I am hopeful this city council will see clear to overriding this veto."

The ordinance would have required retailers with more than $1 billion in annual sales and stores exceeding 90,000 square feet to pay their Chicago employees hourly wages of at least $9.25 starting in July 2007 and $10 by 2010. It also would have required those retailers to provide benefits such as health-care coverage equivalent to at least $1.50 an hour by July and $3 an hour by 2010.

The ordinance was another example of lawmakers trying to use local and state measures rather than federal law to mandate wages and benefits from big retailers. Maryland legislators in January overrode a gubernatorial veto to require large employers, namely Wal-Mart, to spend the equivalent of 8% of their payroll in the state on employees' health-care benefits. A federal judge struck down the Maryland law in July as conflicting with federal law, and none of the similar bills proposed in three dozen states has advanced to become law so far this year.

Wal-Mart operates nearly 4,000 stores in the U.S., including Sam's Club warehouses. Michael Lewis, a senior vice president of store operations for Wal-Mart, said the veto "encourages desperately needed business investment and development in the city."

In vetoing the ordinance, Mayor Daley cited a potential loss of jobs. In recent weeks, several big retailers had written to his office to oppose the ordinance. "I understand and share a desire to ensure that everyone who works in the city of Chicago earns a decent wage," the mayor wrote to the aldermen yesterday. "But I do not believe that this ordinance, well intentioned as it may be, would achieve that end. Rather, I believe that it would drive jobs and business from our city."

Chicago Mayor Vetoes Big-Store Minimum Wage (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

CHICAGO, Sept. 11 — In his 17 years at this city's helm, Mayor Richard M. Daley had never vetoed a decision of the City Council, a sign, it seems, that he gets his way most of the time.

But on Monday, Mr. Daley vetoed the Council's plan to make Chicago the first city in the nation to single out "big box" retailers like Wal-Mart and Home Depot for wage minimums for their workers.

"I understand and share a desire to ensure that everyone who works in the city of Chicago earns a decent wage," Mr. Daley wrote of the rules, which would have required large stores to pay at least $10 an hour by 2010, and at least $3 an hour in benefits.

"But I do not believe that this ordinance, well intentioned as it may be, would achieve that end," he continued. "Rather, I believe it would drive jobs and businesses from our city, penalizing neighborhoods that need additional economic activity the most."

The veto, praised by business leaders but condemned by labor groups and the aldermen who had pressed for the ordinance, set up the mayor for a rare political fight: Mr. Daley, who is up for re-election next year, may face an effort to override his veto at City Hall on Wednesday.

Despite the mayor's disapproval, the aldermen voted 35 to 14 in favor of the wage rules in July. But some of that support has grown shaky in the face of recent lobbying by the mayor's office. One person was absent for the original vote.

DOJ_NMG_0061898

An override would require 34 of the 50 aldermen, and at least one Council member who had supported the ordinance told The Chicago Tribune that she now intended to vote against it. Another alderman who supported the measure is expected to be absent.

The ordinance, which was to apply to stores with at least 90,000 square feet and which are part of companies grossing more than $1 billion a year, set off a firestorm after its passage.

Supporters called it a groundbreaking step nationally in forcing such businesses to improve treatment of their workers and pay them more than either the federal minimum wage ($5.15 an hour) or the state's ($6.50) require.

Opponents, including some City Council members from the poorest wards, said they feared the move would send stores and jobs into the suburbs, even as some large stores announced that they were delaying plans to sign new leases in Chicago.

On Monday, Wal-Mart praised Mr. Daley's decision. "His action encourages desperately needed business investment and development in the city, with job opportunities and savings for those who need it most," Michael Lewis, a Wal-Mart official, said in a release.

In the coming weeks, Wal-Mart expects to open its first store in Chicago, on the city's West Side. Some 11,000 people applied for the 400 jobs there, said David Tovar, a Wal-Mart spokesman. The range of expected wages there was unavailable, Mr. Tovar said, but he said the average wage for full-time hourly associates in Illinois was $10.41 an hour.

Wal-Mart Discounts Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

Yesterday Chicago Mayor Richard Daley issued his first veto ever, striking down a living-wage bill that would require "big box" retailers like Wal-Mart and Office Depot to pay a super-minimum wage of $10 an hour plus $3 in benefits to all employees by 2010. The national minimum is $5.15, and in Illinois the minimum is $6.50. So you ask: What else is new? Well this is Chicago, so follow us back through the big-box bill's politics, and even the most politically jaundiced reader might find a surprise.

In his veto message, Mayor Daley, a pro-union Democrat, declared that the wage law would "drive jobs and businesses from our city, penalizing neighborhoods that need additional economic activity the most." Wal-Mart and Target have announced plans to cease expansions in the city if the law is enacted. The city already loses $300 million a year in sales tax revenues when Windy City residents go bargain hunting in the suburbs. And of course if Wal-Mart, Home Depot and the others were to abandon the city, Chicago residents would be paying a great many millions more a year in higher prices. Still, the City Council has vowed a veto override vote later this week. What then? Well, the poor get stuck while those with the financial means will drive out to the suburbs to do some Wal-Mart shopping.

It turns out that the wage bill's chief sponsor, Alderman Joe Moore, shops at suburban big-box retail stores, for the usual reason. His campaign committee has purchased $30,589 worth of supplies at big-box retailers outside the city, according to disclosure forms. Alderman Moore isn't alone out there with a cart among the high stacks. A review of Illinois State Board of Elections disclosure forms finds that the 35 aldermen who voted to stick it to the "big box" retailers have spent $114,000 patronizing these non-Chicago stores.

And why not? The virtue of superstores isn't just that they're prodigious creators of jobs -- Wal-Mart alone has hired 240,000 workers since 2001 -- but that they hold down costs and pass on the savings to consumers, even to Windy City pols.

View Of God Can Reveal Your Values And Politics (USAT)

By Cathy Lynn Grossman

USA Today, September 12, 2006

The United States calls itself one nation under God, but Americans don't all have the same image of the Almighty in mind.

A new survey of religion in the USA finds four very different images of God — from a wrathful deity thundering at sinful humanity to a distant power uninvolved in mankind's affairs.

Forget denominational brands or doctrines or even once-salient terms like "Religious Right." Even the oft-used "Evangelical" appears to be losing ground.

Believers just don't see themselves the way the media and politicians — or even their pastors — do, according to the national survey of 1,721 Americans, by far the most comprehensive national religion survey to date.

Written and analyzed by sociologists from Baylor University's Institute for Studies of Religion, in Waco, Texas, and conducted by Gallup, the survey asked 77 questions with nearly 400 answer choices that burrowed deeply into beliefs, practices and religious ties and turned up some surprising findings:

·Though 91.8% say they believe in God, a higher power or a cosmic force, they had four distinct views of God's personality and engagement in human affairs. These Four Gods — dubbed by researchers Authoritarian, Benevolent, Critical or Distant — tell more about people's social, moral and political views and personal piety than the familiar categories of Protestant/Catholic/Jew or even red state/blue state.

For example: 45.6% of all Americans say the federal government "should advocate Christian values," but 74.5% of believers in an authoritarian God do.

Sociologist Paul Froese says the survey finds the stereotype that conservatives are religious and liberals are secular is "simply not true. Political liberals and conservatives are both religious. They just have different religious views."

·About one in nine (10.8%) respondents have no religious ties at all; previous national surveys found 14%. The Baylor survey, unlike others, asked people to write in the names and addresses of where they worship, and many who said "none" or "don't know" when asked about their religious identity named a church they occasionally attend.

·The paranormal — beliefs outside conventional organized religion — is immensely popular. Most people said they believe in prophetic dreams; four in 10 say there were once "ancient advanced civilizations" such as Atlantis.

·"Evangelical" may be losing favor as a way Americans describe themselves. About one in three Americans say they belong to denominations that theologians consider evangelical, but only 14% of all respondents in the survey say this is one way they would describe themselves. Only 2.2% called it the single best term. Top choices overall: "Bible-believing" (20.5%) or "born-again" (18.6%).

"Any politician who really wants to connect with Christians should be looking at those terms, not vague abstractions like evangelical. … They need to tap into labels that have salience," Baylor sociologist Kevin Dougherty says.

·Most Americans think their nearest and dearest are going to heaven. The pearly gates open widest for family (75.3% say they'll get in) and personal friends (69.3%). The survey did not ask whether people expect to go to heaven themselves.

·Religion-themed movies and books have a vast reach: 44.3% of those polled saw Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ. More than one in 10 of all surveyed say they spent $50 or more in the past month on items such as religious books, music and jewelry.

A closer look at what people read finds that 28.5% of Americans say they've read The Da Vinci Code. Baylor also found 19%, including 25% of all U.S. women, have read the Rev. Rick Warren's Christian handbook The Purpose-Driven Life, and 19% overall have read at least one of the novels in the Left Behind apocalyptic fiction series.

These are part of the first wave of results from the random survey of Americans who completed and mailed in a 16-page questionnaire. Conducted in the fall of 2005, the survey is a statistically representative sampling of the USA by age, gender and race.

The Baylor team will spend two years digging through the findings and releasing reports on subtopics such as civic involvement and volunteerism, then repeat the core questions in fall 2007 to track trends. The research is funded by the John Templeton Foundation.

Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, calls the analysis "intriguing. Baylor was able to ask many more probing questions than the usual surveys."

Others agree.

The Four Gods breakdown is helpful "if you are trying to understand religion's impact on society by how people see themselves from the inside, not by observations from outsiders," says John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life.

Baylor researchers determined the Four Gods breakdown by analyzing questions about God's personality and engagement.

The survey asked respondents to agree or disagree with any of 10 descriptions of their "personal understanding of what God is like," including phrases such as "angered by my sins" or "removed from worldly affairs." They could check off 16 adjectives they believe describe God, including words such as "absolute," "wrathful," "forgiving," "friendly" or "distant."

When USA TODAY asked people similar questions, it found views as varied as those of self-described fundamentalist Brian Snider of Madison, Ala., and Marilyn McGuire, who says she sees God in every sunrise and sunset, flower and kitten at her home on Orcas Island near Seattle.

Snider, 46, says God is "involved in the affairs of men at all times and he does judge us. … We still believe he is angry at sin."

McGuire, in her late 60s and once an active Episcopalian, now rejects all dogma. "I have my own system of what I think is true and sacred. I try to keep myself peaceful and keep myself in a loving state."

The four visions of God outlined in the Baylor research aren't mutually exclusive. And they don't include 5.2% of Americans who say they are atheists. (Although 91.8% said they believe in God, some didn't answer or weren't sure.)

DOJ_NMG_0061900

Still, says Baylor's Christopher Bader, “you learn more about people's moral and political behavior if you know their image of God than almost any other measure. It turns out to be more powerful a predictor of social and political views than the usual markers of church attendance or belief in the Bible.”

Though 12.2% overall say abortion is wrong in all circumstances, the number nearly doubles to 23.4% for those who see an authoritarian God and slides to 1.5% for followers of a distant God.

Highlights of Baylor's analysis:

·The Authoritarian God (31.4% of Americans overall, 43.3% in the South) is angry at humanity's sins and engaged in every creature's life and world affairs. He is ready to throw the thunderbolt of judgment down on “the unfaithful or ungodly,” Bader says.

Those who envision God this way “are religiously and politically conservative people, more often black Protestants and white evangelicals,” Bader says. “(They) want an active, Christian-values-based government with federal funding for faith-based social services and prayer in the schools.”

They're also the most inclined to say God favors the USA in world affairs (32.1% vs. 18.6% overall).

·The Benevolent God (23% overall, 28.8% in the Midwest) still sets absolute standards for mankind in the Bible. More than half (54.8%) want the government to advocate Christian values.

But this group, which draws more from mainline Protestants, Catholics and Jews, sees primarily a forgiving God, more like the father who embraces his repentant prodigal son in the Bible, Froese says.

They're inclined (68.1%) to say caring for the sick and needy ranks highest on the list of what it means to be a good person.

This is the group in which the Rev. Jeremy Johnston, executive pastor and communications director for his father's 5,000-member Southern Baptist congregation in Overland Park, Kan., places himself.

“God is in control of everything. He's grieved by the sin of the world, by any created person who doesn't follow him. But I see (a) God … who loves us, who sees us for who we really are. We serve a God of the second, third, fourth and fifth chance,” Johnston says.

·The Critical God (16% overall, 21.2% in the East) has his judgmental eye on the world, but he's not going to intervene, either to punish or to comfort.

“This group is more paradoxical,” Bader says. “They have very traditional beliefs, picturing God as the classic bearded old man on high. Yet they're less inclined to go to church or affiliate seriously with religious groups. They are less inclined to see God as active in the world. Their politics are definitely not liberal, but they're not quite conservative, either.”

Those who picture a critical God are significantly less likely to draw absolute moral lines on hot-button issues such as abortion, gay marriage or embryonic stem cell research.

For example, 57% overall say gay marriage is always wrong compared with 80.6% for those who see an authoritarian God, and 65.8% for those who see God as benevolent. For those who believe in a critical God, it was 54.7%.

·The Distant God (24.4% overall, 30.3% in the West) is “no bearded old man in the sky raining down his opinions on us,” Bader says. Followers of this God see a cosmic force that launched the world, then left it spinning on its own.

This has strongest appeal for Catholics, mainline Protestants and Jews. It's also strong among “moral relativists,” those least likely to say any moral choice is always wrong, and among those who don't attend church, Bader says.

Only 3.8% of this group say embryonic stem cell research is always wrong, compared with 38.5% of those who see an authoritarian God, 22.7% for those who see God as benevolent and 13.2% who see God as critical but disengaged.

“I still believe in God,” says Joanne Meehl, 56, of Barre, Mass., who wrote a book in the mid-'90s called Recovering Catholics. “But to me God is the universe, not as small as a ‘He' or a ‘She' but bigger than all of that.” Humanity is on its own, she says. “People who do wrong are punished in this world, not in the next. This world is it.”

Some might question whether a survey by Baptist-affiliated Baylor has a conservative Protestant tilt. For example, there's no mention of communion or saints — central to Catholic believers. Also, questions often used “church,” with no mention of synagogues or mosques. But Baylor researchers say their testing finds people view the word as generic for “house of worship.”

“This work was done by well-respected sociologists of religion,” the Pew Forum's Green says. “Baylor is becoming a leading evangelical university in the same way Notre Dame is a leading Catholic university, by doing first-rate objective social science.”

Rodney Stark, former president of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion and part of the Baylor team, says: “We wanted to break from the past 30 years of narrow questions. “ ‘Do you believe in God?' Everyone says yes.

“If you ask ‘Are you a Protestant, Catholic or Jew?' people don't even know what denomination they are today or what the label means.”

Americans May Be More Religious Than They Realize (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0061901

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

A survey released yesterday posits the idea that the United States -- already one of the most religious nations in the developed world -- may be even less secular than previously suspected.

The Baylor University survey looked carefully at people who checked "none" when asked their religion in polls. Sociologists have watched this group closely since 1990, when their numbers doubled, from 7 percent of the population to 14 percent. Some sociologists said the jump reflects increasing secularization at the same time that American society is becoming more religious.

But the Baylor survey, considered one of the most detailed ever conducted about religion in the United States, found that one in 10 people who picked "no religion" out of 40 choices did something interesting when asked later where they worship: They named a place.

Considering that, Baylor researchers say, the percentage of people who are truly unaffiliated is more like 10.8 percent. The difference between 10.8 percent and 14 percent is about 10 million Americans.

"People might not have a denomination, but they have a congregation. They have a sense of religious connection that is formative to who they are," said Kevin D. Dougherty, a sociologist at Baylor's Institute for Studies of Religion and one of the survey's authors. Baylor is a leading Baptist university, located in Waco, Tex.

The finding reflects the new challenges involved in trying to categorize religiosity in the United States, where people increasingly blend religions, shop for churches and worship in independent communities. Classic labels such as mainline, evangelical and unaffiliated no longer have the same meaning.

For example, 33 percent of Americans worship at evangelical congregations, which sociologists say are places that espouse an inerrant Bible, the importance of evangelizing and the requirement of having a personal relationship with Jesus. But only 15 percent of respondents to the Baylor survey said the term "evangelical" describes their religious identity.

Scholars have been saying for some time that the relevance of denomination is decreasing. But the Baylor survey, which asks about such subjects as God's "personality" and what people pray about, adds to a debate about what that means. It reveals the complex ways Americans describe their religiosity, and the minefield for today's scholars in trying to measure it. Is someone religious if they attend church? If they believe in God? If they identify with a particular religious group? What if they do one but not the others? Which gets more weight?

Academics who study religious demographics disagree about the "nones," and the Baylor study won't end that debate. Some say they are mostly secular -- those who aren't atheist but don't consider religion important. Some say they are in interfaith families and have mixed identities.

Some say they are new immigrants, including many from China, and second-generation Hispanics.

One thing the experts agree on: "Nones" tend to vote liberal but tend not to identify with a political party.

"What is most associated with 'no religion' from a political point of view is independence," said Barry Kosmin, principal investigator of a telephone survey that queried tens of thousands of respondents. His American Religious Identification Survey found that the number of "no religion" Americans jumped from 14.3 million in 1990 to 29.4 million in 2001. "If you don't belong religiously, you don't belong politically," he said.

Among the most innovative aspects of the Baylor survey, say scholars who know about it, are questions about how Americans describe God's personality. Respondents were offered 26 attributes ranging from "absolute" to "wrathful," and were asked whether God is directly involved in and angered by their lives and what happens in the world.

The researchers separated God's attributes into four categories: wrathful, involved, benevolent and uninvolved. They found that the largest category of people -- 31 percent -- was made up of those who said they believe God is both wrathful and highly involved in human affairs.

Beliefs about God's personality are powerful predictors, according to the survey. Those who considered God engaged and punishing were likely to have lower incomes and less education, to come from the South and to be white evangelicals or black Protestants. Those who believed God to be distant and nonjudgmental were more likely to support increased business regulation, environmental protection and the even distribution of wealth.

The changing demographics of the United States demand different polls as well, religion pollsters say. For example, approximately 3 percent of Americans observe faiths other than Christianity and Judaism. While still small, this group is growing rapidly, and scholars say that if current trends continue, that number could reach 10 percent in coming decades.

According to Democratic pollster Anna Greenberg, who focuses on religion, that is already the figure for Americans younger than 25.

Questions about the frequency of attending religious services aren't as relevant to Hindus and Buddhists, who often have worship spaces in their homes. Questions about weekly prayer services aren't as relevant to Muslims, who pray five times a day, she said.

John Green, senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life focusing on religion and politics, said: "The broader point is that this country that's always been religiously diverse is becoming religiously diverse in a new way."

The 'Daily Show' Generation (USAT)

By Mary Zeiss Stange

USA Today, September 12, 2006

Is Jon Stewart a corruptor of youth or a political mentor?

The question is wacky enough to be a Daily Show headline. But it has been seriously posed by a number of academics, most recently in a study published in May by two political science professors in the journal American Politics Research.

In "The Daily Show Effect: Candidate Evaluations, Efficacy, and American Youth," Jody Baumgartner and Jonathan Morris, of East Carolina University, claim to have discovered that viewing Stewart's nightly satirical riff on the news causes college-age Americans to become cynical about politicians and the news media.

"Because young people are more impressionable … and thus more prone to any adverse effects The Daily Show might have," Baumgartner and Morris conclude that the greatest potential net effect of Comedy Central's Peabody Award-winning show is a sense of apathy among the 18-24 crowd, approximately half of whom view Stewart's program on a more or less regular basis.

They reached this conclusion by contrasting the responses of students who had viewed 2004 presidential election coverage on The Daily Show to those of students who had viewed similar reportage on CBS' Evening News. The study had an ironic edge to it, however: The cynical and potentially more apathetic Daily Show viewers also seemed to be "more confident about their own ability to understand politics" than those who had "consumed" the network news.

The "Daily Show effect" study made media waves when The Village Voice ran a story about it in its education issue for this fall. Suddenly, pundits showed more interest in the political thinking of college students than they had since the 2004 elections. In August, MSNBC's Chris Matthews featured the issue on his Sunday morning talk show, putting former CBS news anchor Dan Rather on the spot to explain why young viewers might have opted for Stewart over him. In reply, Rather said something about how that age group wasn't really his demographic.

As a college professor who, among other things, serves as faculty adviser to our progressive student organization, I was immediately struck both by the rightness of Rather's response, and by the wrongheadedness of the assumption that educated young adults cannot discern a relationship between Stewart's satire (which Baumgartner/Morris persistently call "sarcasm") and pointed political commentary.

Because the courses I teach — in women's and environmental studies, and in American religion — have contemporary "real world" implications, I customarily build a current-events component into them. These assignments serve two functions: One is for students to relate news items from various sources — newspapers, magazines, broadcast media and the Internet — to course content. The other, more important one, is for students to pay close attention to the way the news is being "packaged." Are there politically or otherwise skewed stories, editorial content masquerading as straight news, and so on?

Based on my experience with them, I can attest that the current college-age generation is generally, and increasingly, media savvy when it comes to critically "consuming" the news. I would further argue that this is more so because of shows such as Stewart's (and more recently its spinoff, The Colbert Report) as well as websites such as that of The Onion newspaper. After all, in order to "get" their humor, one has to already know something substantial about the stories they parody.

As it turns out, two other academic studies, both from the Annenberg Public Policy Center of the University of Pennsylvania, bear out my classroom experience.

One was part of the Center's 2004 Election Survey under the direction of Kathleen Hall Jamieson. It disclosed that late-night comedy viewers were more likely than the early-to-bed general public to be knowledgeable about the issue positions and backgrounds of the presidential candidates — and viewers of The Daily Show were, as a group, better informed than those of David Letterman or Jay Leno.

These viewers were also younger, better educated and more likely to identify themselves as moderates or liberals.

Where did these hip, young Daily Show viewers get their knowledge of politics?

Not from conventional TV news. A second Annenberg report, released in May, studied media use among people ages 14-22 and found that for the majority of them (almost 60%), the Web is the primary source of news. Newspapers ranked a distant second, and the national evening news on TV (including cable networks) came in last. I'd say that over the years, the current-event reports in my classes have mirrored this pattern, bearing in mind that many people read newspapers online now.

A second set of facts emerged from this study: Reading newspapers (presumably, on- or off-line) increases political awareness, but searching the Internet increases both political awareness and civic engagement. The Daily Show generation, in other words, is not only apt to be more concerned about politics but also more likely to be spurred to do something with that concern.

The apparent sharp upsurge in the past several years of political activism — both liberal and conservative — on college campuses nationwide would seem to bear this out. Whether that activism will translate into significant voter turnout this November remains to be seen. But apathy it is not.

Are these same young people cynical about politicians and newscasters?

Well, yes. So are many of their elders. But don't blame that on Jon Stewart. As he himself famously pointed out on CNN's now-defunct Crossfire in October 2004, if the “serious” national news media are irked at being called to account by a show whose lead-in is “puppets making crank phone calls,” they have no one to thank but themselves.

'Death Of A President' Courts Controversy, But To What End? (WSJ)

By Joe Morgenstern

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

The first question posed by "Death of a President" is whether a filmmaker has the right to shout Assassination in a crowded theater. That's what happened, in effect, on Sunday night at the Toronto International Film Festival when Gabriel Range's film was screened for the first time, to a turnaway audience. A fake documentary set one year in the future, "D.O.A.P.," as it has also been called, depicts the assassination of President Bush by a lone gunman, and the prosecutorial rush to judgment that follows.

The answer to the question is yes, of course a filmmaker has the right. A distinction must be made between provoking controversy with obviously fictional, albeit incendiary, events, and provoking panic over a nonexistent fire. What's more, Mr. Range, an Englishman with an uncommon gift for simulating reality on screen, plays a clever game with his audience, inviting a rush to judgment on the merits of his film. I confess to having done just that -- jumped to the conclusion, sight unseen, that nothing the film might contain would be likely to justify the implicit opportunism of its premise. Now that I've seen it, I think that sometimes one jumps to the right conclusion.

The action begins in October 2007, when Air Force One touches down in Chicago and a motorcade takes President Bush to a downtown hotel, where he is to deliver a speech on the economy. (Video snippets of speeches Mr. Bush has actually given in Chicago are seamlessly integrated with the staged reality.) The scene-setting is impressive, and plausible enough, if pessimistic. The economy has been battered by soaring oil prices. North Korea poses a suddenly imminent nuclear threat. Opposition to the war in Iraq has brought throngs of angry demonstrators to Chicago's streets. And the film is respectful of Mr. Bush as a person, even though its heart obviously lies with the demonstrators, and later the arrestees, who fiercely denounce his administration's policies.

But the title of this production is, after all, "Death of a President," and its fateful narrative generates a buildup of anxiety from the moment the presidential plane hits the runway. The ingredients are mercilessly familiar: the motorcade hinting at Dallas; the surging protesters and club-wielding cops suggesting the deadly combat of Chicago during the Democratic convention of 1968; the president's vulnerability on the street evoking the attempt on Ronald Reagan's life. And I'm euphemizing when I say "anxiety." For those of us who are old enough to remember the assassinations of John F. Kennedy, Robert F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, the right word is anguish: Mr. Range's film is an anguish-generator of enormous intensity.

But let's set aside that generational divide for the moment and acknowledge that works of art can and sometimes should evoke fear and dread in the beholder. The next questions are whether "Death of a President" is a work of art, and whether it puts us through what it puts us through in order to illuminate something else beyond the anger and potential violence of contemporary life.

The film is certainly artful in its deployment of tried-and-true documentary techniques to create an alternate reality. Before and after the assassination (the details of which are mercifully veiled by crowds and ensuing chaos), Mr. Range, who wrote the script with Simon Finch, uses actors in fictional straight-to-the-camera interviews to reconstruct the events leading up to the shooting, and to comment on what ensues. Mr. Range is very good at directing actors -- he may have a bright future in conventional fiction films. And the script is very sly in imputing to the new president -- President Cheney -- an eagerness to act on the basis of dubious evidence: i.e. the indictment of a Syrian immigrant, despite grave doubts about his guilt. "Cheney," we are told by one faux interview subject, "had been obsessed by Syria, and getting rid of Assad, for years." ("Death of a President" was originally made for British television. There are currently no plans for broadcast in the U.S., although the screening has stimulated interest in theatrical distribution.)

For a while "D.O.A.P." holds out the promise of political satire, however partisan, or some sort of structural analysis -- what a U.S. government might do in such circumstances, both domestically and globally. But the movie has less on its mind than meets the eye. The first two-thirds of the story is taken up with events surrounding the assassination. The tragic totems of 20th-century American history are all there -- the TV bulletins (which are strangely off-key), the state funeral, the grief-stricken faces, the riderless horse. Yet they seem perfunctory, and become less convincing (or more repugnant, in the case of still photos supposedly showing the president in an operating room) as the minutes tick by.

And in the aftermath, the film loses track of any consequences to Syria or anywhere else. Its focus is the scapegoating of the Syrian suspect in a trial that takes place, quite implausibly, only seven months after the assassination, and that leads to what used to be called, before Watergate faded from national memory, a post-Watergate ending, tinnily cynical and tacitly smug.

As a piece of postmodern, mockumentary filmmaking, "Death of a President" does play -- and I use that word advisedly -- with other issues. By dramatizing the government's dependence on questionable forensic evidence, by manipulating images and flagrantly falsifying contexts (as in excerpts from a Cheney speech that are made to seem a eulogy for the fallen president), it reminds us of the undependable nature of supposedly objective truth. As filmmaking for the sake of filmmaking, it's part of a familiar genre: "Citizen Kane" employed a fake documentary as its basic narrative device.

But another distinction must be made -- between clever films that play games with interesting themes, and a film that depicts the murder of a sitting president. This is not to suggest that what's seen on screen might provoke a mad act in real life. Too little is understood about such causal connections, and in any case one hopes, and must assume, that this president is protected adequately.

The problem is that the game played by Mr. Range and his colleagues turns out to be, at bottom, banal. Do we truly not know that reality can be altered, whether by Photoshop or official lies? And by playing it so glibly, "Death of a President" ultimately, and paradoxically, does what it professes to deplore -- devalues the difference between real and false. Mr. Range is a talented man who knows how to control images and emotions, up to a point. By virtue of its subject, however, "Death of a President" takes on an unreal life of its own. The film itself becomes a riderless horse.

'Death Of A President' Faces Tough Questions, Audience (USAT)

By Harlan Jacobson

USA Today, September 12, 2006

TORONTO — The hot-ticket Death of a President, which had its world premiere here Sunday night, was not meant to be a political attack on President Bush, says its British TV director, Gabriel Range.

The film's title set off an orgy on the talk radio and TV circuit when it was revealed two weeks ago. But Range calls it a "fictionalized retrospective documentary … in which we're using the lens of the future to look at the present."

At press time, the British film did not have a deal for U.S. distribution.

In the movie, events are set forward to Oct. 19, 2007, when President Bush gives a speech to the Chicago Economics Club, a sequence lifted from archival news footage of Bush speaking to the real group earlier this year. Outside, the Chicago police beat protesters run amok.

As he walks from the hotel to his motorcade, "Bush" is assassinated.

The filmmakers use transplanted archival footage of Bush (and of Vice President Cheney giving a eulogy — critics tried to figure out whose funeral it was), but the actual assassination is a quick, blurry sequence reminiscent of the 1981 attempt on President Reagan.

Range says he used Photoshop, but the camera only fleetingly shows the president's face. The film is not, as the talk-radio world chattered last week, the work of fringe liberal Democrats having a wish-fulfillment fantasy. Range has given similar treatment to the collapse of the British transit system in a future-past 2003 doc called The Day Britain Stopped.

Death of a President flashes forward to a time after the administration has fictionally introduced Patriot Act 3, further expanding the power of government into the judicial process, which is seen as corrupted by the political need to blame Middle East enemies such as Syria. A Syrian immigrant is wrongly accused of the crime.

The movie didn't score any huge critical success here. The consensus seemed to be that the political conclusions — that American politics drives truth out the window — didn't seem to be worth the artistic effort to pump up the volume.

"They handled the assassination sequence well and not exploitively," says Todd McCarthy, film critic at Variety, who challenged Range after the screening for having too narrow of a focus on the future course of things.

"It's not as controversial as it could be," says Norman Wilner, who writes for the Toronto Metro weekly newspaper.

The point of all this specificity by Range and co-writer/producer Simon Finch is to make it seem real enough to audiences to get and keep their attention. "In order for what has affected us in the last five years to come across as realistic, it was important that George Bush be the president," Range told the packed 387-seat house at the downtown Paramount multiplex. "If we'd have used a fictional president, audience reaction would be completely different — like watching 24 or The Sentinel. This feels authentic."

DOJ_NMG_0061905

Festival co-executive director Piers Handling agreed, saying: "It's just part of the cinema landscape now, that increasingly people want the immediacy of real experience, real information, and the simulation of that 'reality.' Otherwise, it all feels removed at a time when audiences are saying, 'Whatever it is, give us reality and let us deal with it.' "

Handling said showing the film "has had no adverse impact on us as a festival."

Toronto chief programmer Noah Cowan, who booked the film, says awareness of it has "launched like a bullet on the international scene. Why wouldn't we book it? It's a completely innovative and creative construction of the way images can be used — which is precisely the conversation we should be having at a film festival."

The auditorium was silent during the film while viewers tried to follow the stream of political and forensic jargon. Audience response at the end was an unsure round of applause.

The Republican Collapse May Not Be So Imminent (NYT)

By Michiko Kakutani

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

Despite lots of talk about President Bush's dismal poll numbers, corruption scandals involving Tom DeLay and Jack Abramoff and the toll that the war in Iraq and the administration's mishandling of Hurricane Katrina may take on the Republican Party in this fall's midterm elections, the veteran political reporter Thomas B. Edsall has some bad news for Democrats. While such developments "may take the G.O.P. down in individual elections," he writes in "Building Red America," the Republican Party "holds a set of advantages, some substantial and some marginal," that have enabled it to "eke out victory by slim margins in a majority of closely contested elections" and that will probably give it an edge in the foreseeable future.

For that matter, neither party is likely to be happy with the findings of this provocative though in many ways familiar book. Mr. Edsall, who covered national politics for The Washington Post from 1981 to 2006, accuses the Republicans of using their closely contested victories to advance a conservative agenda that "does not have the decisive support of the people," of further polarizing the electorate and cynically forcing it "to pick between extremes," and of using "the slimmest of political margins" to try "to remake America — as well as America's role in the world."

As for Democrats, he depicts them as hapless, unfocused and reeling from self-inflicted wounds. He contends that "the social-issue left overwhelmingly sets the agenda of the Democratic Party," often to the detriment of its candidates in general elections. He takes the party to task for its "lack of credible policies" in the areas of globalization and education. (He curiously has little to say about its internal schisms over foreign policy and national security.)

And he argues that "Democrats and liberals have shown little interest in maintaining and sustaining institutions designed to produce majorities in Congress and to win the White House." He says that progressives tend to make project-specific grants instead of building party infrastructure and that "the mainstay organizations of the left," which were created when liberals were in power, aim to influence "sympathetic decision makers," not "to wrest power from adversaries," as many of their counterparts on the right so aggressively do.

Unless the Democratic Party makes fundamental changes in its structure, tactical operations and long-range strategic planning, he writes, the odds are that the Republicans "will continue to maintain, over the long term, a thin but durable margin of victory."

Certainly Mr. Edsall has been wrong in the past: only a year before Bill Clinton captured the White House, he said in his 1991 book, "Chain Reaction" (written with Mary D. Edsall), that the Democratic Party was "in danger of losing its stature as a major competitor in national politics."

And his new book is hardly without flaws: his zeal to make larger points about the two parties can lead to some gross generalizations and to his glossing over potentially significant divisions within the Republican Party between libertarians and cultural conservatives, between deficit hawks and big spenders, between practitioners of old-fashioned realpolitik and neo-conservative advocates of the Iraq war.

Many of the observations made in this book have been made before by journalists and political strategists, but Mr. Edsall does a nimble job of pulling them together to form a coherent picture, buttressing his assessments with lots of demographic and polling data and situating them in a historical context.

While building upon ideas he originally set out in "Chain Reaction," Mr. Edsall also grapples with more recent arguments made by writers like Thomas Frank ("What's the Matter With Kansas?"); Kevin Phillips ("American Theocracy" and "Wealth and Democracy," as well as the classic "Emerging Republican Majority"); Jacob S. Hacker and Paul Pierson ("Off Center: The Republican Revolution and the Erosion of American Democracy"); and John Micklethwait and Adrian Wooldridge ("The Right Nation").

Clearly, some of Mr. Edsall's conclusions are bound to be debated. He contests the suggestion — advanced by Mr. Frank, among others — that the Democrats would help their cause by embracing an old-fashioned economic populism, asserting that the ideological and economic bifurcation of the party (with an affluent, college-educated elite on one end and many low-income voters on the other) does not lend itself to populist appeals.

In contrast to Mr. Micklethwait and Mr. Wooldridge, who have argued that "the center of gravity in American politics has moved to the right" and that America is truly "in the thrall of the Right Nation," Mr. Edsall contends that the Republican Party "has not achieved a political realignment" but has simply tried to impose a deeply conservative agenda on the country "without clear majoritarian public support."

As Mr. Edsall sees it, growing political polarization in the United States, the rise of the conservative movement and the recent successes of the Republican Party can best be understood in the context of two revolutions that have changed American society over the last four decades: a social and cultural revolution "driven by a commitment to equality and the extension of rights to previously marginalized groups," and a technological and economic revolution that has altered the job market and business models and expectations.

These revolutions, Mr. Edsall writes, have created "two roughly equal partisan coalitions, one on the left, the other on the right," and in an effort to assemble a winning political majority, he argues, the Republican Party "has tapped into and capitalized on the sense of dislocation and conflict generated by rapid cultural modernization among many middle- and working-class voters." In his opinion, it has done so largely by using wedge issues like abortion and gay marriage, which push voters' "anger points" and motivate the base.

Securing the base, Mr. Edsall argues, became a central Republican strategy, especially after Mr. Bush's chief pollster, Matt Dowd, sent a memo to Karl Rove, the Republican mastermind, in the wake of the highly contested 2000 presidential vote. The memo — which declared that the center of the electorate had collapsed, that true swing voters made up a mere 6 percent of the electorate — destroyed, in Mr. Edsall's words, "the rationale for Bush to govern as 'a uniter, not a divider,' " as he had promised. Instead, it "freed Bush to discard centrist strategies" and promote "polarizing policies designed explicitly to appeal to the conservative Republican core."

Mr. Dowd's finding that "you can lose the swing voters and still win the election, if you make sure your base is bigger than theirs," says Mr. Edsall, decisively affected the Bush administration's policy making on matters ranging from tax cuts to the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

Mr. Edsall adds that trend lines suggest that "in America today, the G.O.P. has bested the Democratic Party in the symbolic manipulation of controversial sociocultural issues touching upon national security, patriotism, race, sex and religion," and that an array of demographic developments — including a "geographic distribution of voters" that gives the Republican Party "a strong, built-in advantage in the competition for control of the House and Senate" — has further enhanced the party's advantages.

Do the Democrats possess any advantages? Mr. Edsall cites a surge in small contributions to Democrats through online credit card donations in 2004 and the party's ability to capitalize on the Web, growth in certain constituencies (like Hispanic voters) that traditionally have favored the Democratic Party and an unwillingness on the part of a growing number of younger women to relinquish their "sexual autonomy."

His long-term outlook, however, points less to any signs of a Democratic resurgence than to what he sees as the Republican Party's philosophical shortcomings. "The protective stance of Republicans toward the rich and the dominant," he writes, "and the acquiescence to a morally and intellectually repressive social agenda are too much at odds with the American egalitarian ethic to achieve the overwhelming strength of the Democratic coalition of the New Deal era."

His conclusion: "Politics functions as a market, and the political marketplace is now significantly out of balance — it is in disequilibrium. If political parties were corporations, the political market would be viewed as territory ripe for takeover or for the entry of an outside competitor."

3 Killed Outside U.S. Embassy In Syria (AP-Y)

By Albert Aji, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 12, 2006

Gunmen apparently blew up a car outside the U.S. Embassy and exchanged fire with Syrian guards on Tuesday in a brazen attack on Damascus' diplomatic neighborhood. Syrian security forces killed three of the attackers, the government said.

The Interior Ministry, which is in charge of police, said a fourth assailant was wounded in what it called a "terrorist attack." The report, carried on state-run television, said an investigation was under way.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman confirmed the attack on the American Embassy by "unknown assailants" and said the event appears to be over.

"Local authorities have responded and are on the scene," spokesman Kurtis Cooper said. He said he had no further information.

A Syrian who works at the U.S. Embassy said there were no American casualities.

Rice Indicates Slight Shift In Stance On Iran Sanctions (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

PICTOU, Canada, Sept. 11 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in an ever-so-slight softening of America's stance, on Monday left open the possibility that the United States might suspend efforts to impose sanctions against Iran if it suspended uranium enrichment for two months.

"First of all, it would have to be suspension — verified suspension," Ms. Rice said. "Secondly, it's suspension for suspension. We've said that if they suspend," the United States would in turn halt its pursuit of United Nations sanctions against Iran and would join European talks with Tehran over its nuclear program.

Ms. Rice, who said Monday that she had spoken with the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, about his continuing talks with Mr. Larijani, also urged caution. "As far as I know, the Iranians have not said that they would suspend prior to negotiations, which is what the issue has been," she said.

Mr. Solana said Sunday that he made progress in the search for a compromise with Iran, and added that he and Mr. Larijani would meet again soon.

The United States has long contended that Iran is stalling for time to develop what American officials say is a nuclear weapons capacity. Iran says its nuclear program is only to produce energy for civilian use.

Ms. Rice, speaking to reporters aboard a flight to Halifax, said that "the time is coming very soon when we'll have to vote on a Security Council resolution" about Iran. But, she added, "From our point of view we have nothing to lose, as we work toward this Security Council resolution, having Javier Solana explore with the Iranians whether there's a way to get to negotiations."

In Canada for ceremonies to mark Sept. 11, Ms. Rice thanked the nation for opening its airports to United States-bound flights on that day and honored Canadian victims of the attacks.

Much of the language regarding Iran is nuance. The formal proposal made earlier this summer by the United States and Europe to Iran — to suspend its enrichment activities in exchange for a package of incentives or face sanctions — does not require a permanent suspension.

Indeed, the proposal even includes an offer that one senior Bush administration official characterized at the time as the "when hell freezes over" clause: that Iran, after it has satisfied regulatory bodies that its nuclear ambitions are peaceful, might at some point in the future be allowed to enrich uranium on its own soil. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue.

But the Bush administration has long made clear that what it wants is a permanent suspension. While that remains so, the coalition of six countries that made the offer to Iran is fragile, with Russia and China far less agreeable to the idea of sanctions against Iran than the United States and its European allies, Britain, France and Germany.

In order to keep Russia and China on board, Ms. Rice has taken pains to try to present the United States as taking a reasonable position and being willing to work with the Iranians. But the Americans have insisted all along on one non-negotiable demand: that Iran must suspend its enrichment activities.

The apparent shift in the American stance also reflects the hard realities that there are few good options on Iran, even if the Bush administration is able to get Russia and China to sign on to sanctions. Iran defied an Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations Security Council to halt production of nuclear fuel.

The United States is trying to get Russia and China, along with the European Union, to impose sanctions through the Security Council, beginning with restrictions on imports of nuclear-related equipment and material. Eventually, punitive measures might expand to restrict travel by Iran's leaders and limit Iran's access to global financial markets.

But few diplomats believe that Russia and China will agree to more than weak sanctions, and Ms. Rice must calculate whether the coalition will remain intact. If it does not, the United States could be left facing the possibility of further conflict in the Middle East at a time when it is still grappling with the Iraq war.

A nonproliferation analyst, speaking anonymously because he has not yet had time to review all the implications, said that part of the apparent new willingness by the United States to consider a temporary suspension might reflect the need to seize on any possible daylight with a country that has been an adversary since its Islamic revolution in 1979.

Rice Leaves Door Open For Dealing With Iran (USAT)

USA Today, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061908

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice did not rule out accepting what may be a new opening from Iran to bargain with the West over its disputed nuclear program, but she predicted Monday that United Nations sanctions would follow "if this does not work out."

Iran has told diplomats it may be willing to shelve its uranium-enrichment program temporarily, perhaps for two months, during negotiations with the United States and other world powers over the future and scope of the Islamic republic's nuclear program.

Rice said Iran has not put a formal offer on the table, but she did not reject the idea of beginning talks framed by an Iranian deadline. "The question is: Are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin? … Nobody is going to become accustomed to a nuclear-armed Iran; that's why we're on this course," Rice said.

The United States has led the drive for the U.N. Security Council to impose economic or other sanctions if Iran does not halt its nuclear program. Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to stop enriching uranium.

Uranium enrichment can lead to fuel for nuclear power reactors or for weapons. The United States accuses Iran of secretly trying to build a nuclear weapon. Iran says its program is to produce electricity.

House panel to take up tribunal bill

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., has drafted a bill largely along the lines of the Bush administration's plan to create military commissions to prosecute terrorism suspects. The bill he will ask the committee to approve Wednesday includes a provision that would allow judges to bar defendants from access to some evidence. The commission judges would be told they should determine what weight to give to any evidence that is withheld from the defendant.

Hunter's version is at odds with legislation that Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., and some of his Senate colleagues have drafted. Their bill would ensure that a defendant be allowed access to all evidence.

Hunter's proposal includes other slight deviations from the administration's proposal, including a requirement that no fewer than nine members of a commission be present in a case involving a potential death sentence. The administration's plan would allow five members to deliver a death sentence in certain cases. Hunter's bill also says the administration could convene commissions only in the cases of "alien illegal enemy combatants." The administration's plan would allow a broader range of terrorism cases.

Rice Open To Talks On Nuke Program (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left the door open yesterday for consideration of a possible a new offer from Iran to bargain with the West over Tehran's disputed nuclear program.

Still, she predicted U.N. sanctions would follow "if this does not work out."

Iran has told diplomats it may be willing to shelve its uranium-enrichment program temporarily, perhaps for two months, during negotiations with the United States and other powers over the future and scope of a nuclear program that Iran insists is peaceful. The Bush administration accuses Iran of hiding ambitions to build nuclear weapons.

Miss Rice said Iran has not put a formal offer on the table, but she did not reject the idea of beginning talks framed by a deadline.

"As to time limitations, I haven't heard any Iranian offer, so I don't know what to make of that," she said. "But the question is, are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin?"

"Our clock would be running, too," she told reporters aboard her plane.

Miss Rice was in Canada to thank Canadians for helping thousands of Americans stranded when their international flights were diverted on September 11 five years ago.

The United States has led a drive to ask the U.N. Security Council to impose economic or other sanctions if Iran does not roll back its nuclear program. Iran let pass without action an Aug. 31 deadline to stop uranium enrichment.

Such enrichment can lead either to fuel for nuclear-power reactors or for weapons. International inspectors have been unable to determine whether Iran's program, begun in secret two decades ago, is intended only to produce electricity, as Iran has claimed.

Iran has said it will not give up what it calls its right to the full range of nuclear technology and expertise, and has been wary of even a temporary pause in its development program.

The West, and the United States in particular, says a pause is essential to prevent Tehran from gaining ground toward a weapon if that is its hidden aim. Iran did suspend its uranium activities during two years of negotiations with European nations that fell apart last year without a deal. Tehran claims that, with a suspension, there is no incentive for the West to cut a deal.

DOJ_NMG_0061909

The latest Western offer, with the added inducement of face-to-face talks with the United States, would give trade, aid and political benefits to Iran if it scaled back its program and answered the West's concerns. Iran would still be able to develop civilian nuclear power.

"Nobody is going to become accustomed to a nuclear-armed Iran, that's why we're on this course," Miss Rice said.

She predicted, as other Bush administration figures have, that the Security Council would gradually ratchet up economic or political sanctions. The step-by-step approach is meant to offer Iran a way out as the pressure increases.

"I'm quite certain that you're going to see, if this does not work out, you're going to see sanctions, and that those will be commensurate with Iranian behavior," the top U.S. diplomat said.

The United States has had no diplomatic and few commercial or other ties with Iran since the 1979 storming of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The diplomatic coalition against Iran has appeared ragged at times, but has so far held together. The issue may finally be at a turning point if the Security Council takes up sanctions, a step that two of the council's veto-holding members have publicly said they oppose.

Brief Nuclear Halt May Lead To Talks With Iran (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice signaled yesterday that a temporary suspension of Iran's nuclear programs might be enough to pave the way for the first direct negotiations involving the United States and Iran in more than a quarter-century.

Speaking to reporters as she flew to Halifax, Nova Scotia, Rice said Iran needs to suspend uranium-enrichment activities before talks can begin, but she did not rule out something less than a permanent suspension. In talks over the weekend between Iranian and European officials, the chief Iranian negotiator offered a two-month freeze at the start of the talks.

"The point is, there would have to be a suspension," Rice said when asked about Iran's proposal. "If there is a suspension, we can have discussions, but there has to be a suspension. As far as I know, the Iranians have not yet said that they would suspend prior to negotiations."

Rice said she has not "heard any Iranian offer, so I don't know what to make of that," adding: "But the question is: Are they prepared to suspend, verifiably, so that negotiations can begin? That's the issue."

Rice's comments followed a round of private calls she had in the past day with European counterparts and came after positive meetings between European and Iranian officials. Two days of talks in Vienna between Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, and Javier Solana of the European Union went well, and both sides said they will meet again Thursday, according to diplomats from both sides who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the negotiations.

"First of all, it's suspension, verified suspension -- that's the condition," Rice said. "Secondly, it's suspension for suspension," she said, meaning that if Iran freezes its program, then the United States and its allies would halt a push for U.N. sanctions.

France, Britain and Germany have committed to push for sanctions against Iran if it does not halt its uranium-enrichment program, but the Europeans are also eager to find a route to negotiations. Other members of the European Union have strongly supported talks, rather than punitive measures, noting that Iran's technical progress on its nuclear program has been marginal while its position as a major oil exporter leaves it with significant leverage to batter European economies. Japan, which has billions of dollars' worth of investments in Iran's oil and gas industry, has been reluctant to back sanctions.

But all parties, including Russia and China -- two of Iran's closest economic partners -- have publicly said that Tehran must suspend its nuclear program for talks to begin.

Iran quit negotiations with the Europeans a year ago and restarted its nuclear program. In an effort to coax Iran back to the negotiating table, Rice announced in May that the United States would join the talks if Iran suspended its program again. The United States and its partners offered Iran the prospect of economic incentives if negotiations are successful -- or an escalating series of sanctions if the talks fail.

The Institute for Science and International Security, a nonpartisan think tank in Washington, yesterday posted a copy of Iran's confidential 21-page response to the offer of incentives that was officially conveyed in June.

David Albright, president of ISIS, said the document is tough to grasp and sometimes contradictory, but that there are positive elements, including a willingness to discuss suspension of uranium enrichment, even as Iran rejected the right of the U.N. Security Council to order a halt to enrichment activities. "This is not a hollow offer by the Iranians," he said -- adding, however, that "you just get mad reading this thing."

Iran, in its response, indicated willingness to comply with a Security Council obligation to freeze the program as long as it is not a precondition for talks. The Vienna meetings are aimed at finding face-saving ways out of the staunch positions all sides have taken while facilitating a path toward negotiations, officials said.

Rice spoke by telephone with Solana and with Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency overseeing a probe of Iran's nuclear program. Agency inspectors, in their fourth year of investigation, have not found proof of a weapons program but have also been unable to verify Iran's assertion that the enrichment program is strictly for energy production.

Rice reiterated yesterday that if the talks do not materialize, the United States will push for sanctions. "Our clock would be running, too," she said. "Nobody is going to become accustomed to a nuclear-armed Iran. That's why we're on this course."

Iran Closes Down 2 Opposition Newspapers (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, September 12, 2006

Iran closed down two opposition newspapers on Monday, one of which had recently poked fun at hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the way his government has handled nuclear talks with the West.

It was a fresh show of determination by Iran's ruling clerical establishment to silence dissent over its handling of nuclear talks with the West and deny reformers a chance to air their views ahead of elections scheduled for Dec. 15.

The rights group Reporters Without Borders voiced concern last week about harassment of Iranian journalists, including prison sentences and interrogations. Ahmadinejad has purged dozens of journalists, university professors and government officials seen as supporting warmer ties with the West.

Iran's most prominent reformist daily, Shargh, or East, ran a cartoon Thursday depicting a horse and donkey facing each other on a chess board. The donkey — a symbol of ignorance in Iranian culture — has his mouth open and light around him, while the horse shows no emotion.

Iranian judiciary officials apparently took the donkey to represent Iran in nuclear negotiations with the West, journalists said.

Ahmadinejad reportedly said he felt there was a light around him, and that world leaders focused unblinkingly on him when he addressed the U.N. General Assembly last year. Ahmadinejad is reportedly planning to address the assembly again later this month.

"We got a call from the Press Supervisory Board saying that we have no right to publish our newspaper as of today," Shargh editor Mohammad Ghouchani told The Associated Press.

Iran's official news agency reported the paper was ordered closed down for "dozens of violations," including the cartoon's publication and "publication of material against the rulings by the Supreme National Security Council." The council handles Iran's nuclear negotiations with the West.

"In recent months, nuclear officials have been warning the press to be careful over what they publish over Iran's nuclear policy and not write anything that contradicts what they do," reformist lawmaker Esmaeil Gerami Moghadam told the AP.

State-run television said Shargh was shut because it failed to appoint a new managing director to "more aggressively supervise material published in the paper."

The current managing director, Mahdi Rahmanian, denounced such a demand.

"Pressure on the press to change their managing director is illegal. The law doesn't allow the board to make such a demand," he said.

The Press Supervisory Board also ordered the political monthly Nameh, or Letter, to be closed down, IRNA reported Monday.

The paper's editor, Majid Tavallaei, said the reason behind the closure was the publication of a poem from dissident female poet Simin Behbahani. The text of the poem was not immediately available.

"Publication of the poem is seen as the main reason for the closure. They have taken that as an insult," Tavallaei said.

Echoing the rhetoric of the nation's 1979 Islamic revolution, Ahmadinejad appears determined to remake Iran by reviving the fundamentalist goals pursued under the republic's late founder, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Upon taking office last year, Ahmadinejad replaced nearly all his country's governors and lower provincial officials, as well as 40 ambassadors. Many of Iran's top government officials are now either former commanders of the elite Revolutionary Guards or former hard-line security officials.

Last week, he urged students to push for a purge of liberal, secular university teachers, and dozens of such instructors have been sent into early retirement during Ahmadinejad's rule.

Ahmadinejad and supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei both appear on a list of "press freedom predators" compiled by Reporters Without Borders each year.

Iran saw a wave of newspaper closures in past years amid a confrontation between reformers and hard-liners during the 1997-2005 tenure of reformist President Mohammad Khatami.

The hard-line judiciary shut down more than 100 pro-reform newspapers and jailed dozens of editors and writers on vague charges of insulting authorities.

But Moghadam said the new wave of press crackdown meant no tolerance for criticism ahead of upcoming elections.

"It is a clear message that they don't tolerate any voice of opposition. They also don't want reformers to convey their message through Shargh to the people ahead of the elections," he said.

Iran is preparing to hold elections for the Assembly of Experts, a clerical panel that has the authority to choose or dismiss Iran's top leader, and city council elections. Both are slated for Dec. 15.

Iran Shuts Top Reformist Paper, Citing Cartoon Seen As An Insult (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

TEHRAN, Sept. 11 — Iran's conservative press watchdog shut down four publications on Monday, including a major reformist newspaper.

The reformist daily, called Shargh, or East, was shut down indefinitely because the newspaper had refused to replace its director and because it published a cartoon in a recent edition that was considered insulting to the government, state-run television said, citing a statement from the press monitoring agency.

"Shargh was banned and referred to the court because of its frequent violations and refusing to make amends in the past month, especially an insulting cartoon in a recent edition," the statement said.

The statement said that the press agency had issued 70 warnings to the popular newspaper, which has a circulation of 100,000, and had ordered it to replace its managing director, which it had not done.

The cartoon published Thursday showed two chess pieces, a white knight facing an angry black donkey, a symbol of ignorance in Iran, on a checkered board. Journalists working at the newspaper said the cartoonist had tried to make the black donkey clearer on the checkered board by making the area around it whiter.

The cartoon was believed to be a reference to Iran's negotiations over its nuclear program, The Associated Press said, and an insult to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

He had been reported to have said that he felt in the spotlight with world leaders focusing unblinkingly on him when he addressed the United Nations General Assembly last year.

The political monthly Nameh, or Letter, was also shut down Monday, the news agency ISNA reported, but no reason was announced. The journal was published by religious nationalistic opposition groups.

The press agency also revoked permits for two other journals, Hafez and Khatereh. Hafez was a literary and historical monthly that had published articles about a former monarch of Iran.

"It seems that the government is limiting the freedom at home as the international pressure is increasing on Iran over its nuclear program," said Mohsen Kadivar, a dissident cleric and an Islamic philosopher in Tehran. "Now that the threat of sanctions looms, the government does not want to hear any protest at home."

The government shut down the daily newspaper Iran in May and jailed two of its journalists after it published a cartoon that Iranian ethnic Azeris said had mocked them.

More than a hundred newspapers and journals were shut down in previous years by the conservative judiciary. But the press has come under even stronger pressure since Mr. Ahmadinejad's election a year ago. Last month, a government spokesman, Gholamhossein Elham, was reported to have sent a letter to the public prosecutor calling on him to act against newspapers that publish accusations against the government.

In addition to the crackdown on the press, two political prisoners have died recently.

One prisoner, Valiollah Feyz Mahdavi, hanged himself last Wednesday, the government said. He had been sentenced to death on charges that he had ties to an armed opposition group in exile, the Mujahedeen Khalq. Mr. Mahdavi's death sentence had recently been upheld by a supreme court.

Another political prisoner, Akbar Mohammadi, died in jail on July 30, after a hunger strike protesting prison conditions.

Human Rights Watch warned last week that the health and safety of Iranian political prisoners was in grave danger and called on the government to appoint an independent commission of Iranian lawyers and doctors to investigate the recent deaths.

Iranian Newspaper Ordered Closed After Publishing Cartoon (LAT)

By Babak Pirouz

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061912

TEHRAN — Press authorities on Monday ordered the temporary closure of Shargh, Iran's leading reformist newspaper, just days after the publication printed a cartoon that appeared to lampoon Iranian nuclear negotiations.

In a letter to the paper's managing director, the Press Supervisory Board ordered the shutdown "for publishing articles insulting to religious, political and national figures, and fomenting discord."

The board also cited the publication's failure to comply with an earlier order to replace its managing editor, and about 70 previous warnings for violations of the press law in recent years.

Shargh, published by allies of former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, is the most widely read newspaper critical of the government and is one of the few reformist publications operating as the government increasingly cracks down on dissent.

A second opposition publication, the political monthly Nameh, also has been closed in recent days, reportedly for publishing a poem by dissident female poet Simin Behbahani, the Islamic Republic News Agency reported Monday.

The orders are the latest in what appears to be the beginning of a crackdown against reform-minded publications and journalists under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that also has resulted in the arrest of high-profile dissidents and the purging of dozens of liberal, secular professors from the nation's universities.

Journalists over the last two months have been sentenced to prison terms ranging from six months to four years for offenses that included "propaganda against the regime" and "insulting" Iran's supreme religious leader.

"By its recent actions, the government is now trying to control the way the news is produced, distributed and received," said Mashallah Shamsolvaezin, a spokesman for the Iranian Committee for the Defense of Freedom of the Press and editor of a number of reformist newspapers shut down by the judiciary.

The press board said it had warned the publishers of Shargh, which had been shut down for a week in February 2004 over similar charges, to appoint a new managing editor and halt its publication of material "insulting officials, religious and national figures."

The most recent purported violation was the publication Thursday of a cartoon titled "The Other Rule for Playing the Game," which depicted a horse and a donkey on a chessboard. A white halo appears around the donkey, an apparent reference to reports in several reformist papers that Ahmadinejad said he had been told that witnesses to his address at the United Nations last year had seen a halo of light around him. The president denied making the statement.

The board has referred the newspaper's case to the courts for trial. Mehdi Rahmanian, the managing editor, has vowed to appeal the closure.

Recent actions by the government seem to point to new restrictions for the press. In August, the government spokesperson wrote a letter to the judiciary demanding action against those spreading "falsehoods" about the government. Last week, the Ministry of Islamic Culture and Guidance published restrictions barring the use of most reformist websites as sources.

Proxy Terrorism From Iran (LAT)

By Natan Sharansky

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

IN THE SUMMER of 2000, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin told me a story that I have been unable to get out of my mind. We were meeting in the Kremlin, and I raised the grave danger facing the world from the transfer of missile technology and nuclear material to the Iranians. In Putin's view, however, the real danger came not from an Iranian nuclear-tipped missile or, for that matter, from the lethal arsenal of any nation-state.

"Imagine a sunny and beautiful day in a suburb of Manhattan," he said. "An elderly man is tending to the roses in his small garden with his nephew visiting from Europe. Life seems perfectly normal. The following day, the nephew, carrying a suitcase, takes a train to Manhattan. Inside the suitcase is a nuclear bomb."

The threat, Putin explained to me a year before 9/11, was not from this or that country but from their terrorist proxies — aided and supported quietly by a sovereign state that doesn't want to get its hands dirty — who will perpetrate their attacks without a return address. This scenario became real when Al Qaeda plotted its 9/11 attacks from within Afghanistan and received support from the Taliban government. Then it happened again this summer, when Iran was allowed to wage a proxy war through Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and northern Israel. But this time, the international community's weak response dealt the global war on terror a severe blow.

Five years ago, after 9/11, such a lack of culpability seemed inconceivable. That was when President Bush abandoned the conventional approach to fighting terror by vowing that the United States would henceforth make no distinction between terrorists and regimes that support them. You are either with us or you are with the terrorists.

In the pre-9/11 world, regimes were rarely held responsible for the actions of terror groups. Now the Taliban regime was being held accountable.

This was critically important for two reasons. First, it recognized that international terrorism relies on the support of sovereign states. It is regimes, after all, that give terror groups territory on which to train, arm and indoctrinate their members, and regimes that provide them critical financial, diplomatic, logistical and intelligence support.

Second, although shadowy terror cells are difficult to eradicate fully and suicidal fanatics impossible to deter, the regimes that support terror groups do have a return address and are rarely suicidal. Thus, holding the Taliban responsible for the actions of Al Qaeda, and elevating the logic for doing so to a central principle in the war on terror, greatly enhanced deterrence. Every single regime was immediately put on notice.

Fast forward five years. Hezbollah launches an unprovoked attack on Israel. It is clear that Hezbollah is a proxy of Iran. It is public knowledge that Hezbollah receives more than $100 million a year from the Iranian regime, as well as sophisticated weapons and training.

Yet Iran has paid no price for its proxy's actions. No military strikes on Iranian targets, no sanctions, no threat whatsoever to Iranian interests. On the contrary, in the wake of the war, there have been renewed calls in the democratic world to "engage" Iran.

Symptomatic of the moral myopia in the West is a farce worthy of Orwell: Former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami, under whom students were tortured after a 1999 crackdown at Tehran University and whose rule was marked by the continued stifling of dissent, spoke Sunday at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government on "Ethics of Tolerance in the Age of Violence."

The Iranian regime's intentions are clear. It calls for "wiping Israel off the map" and tells its followers to "imagine a world without America." It seeks to dominate the Middle East. By failing to hold Iran accountable for its brazen support of Hezbollah, the free world has undermined a central pillar in the war on terror and given the Iranian regime a huge weapon for achieving its ambitions. Now the mullahs know they can attack a democratic country with impunity.

Considering the apocalyptic fanaticism of Iran's leader, it is an open question whether the current regime in Tehran is capable of being deterred through the threat of mutually assured destruction. But given how the world has responded to Hezbollah, the point may be academic. For surely Iran would be better served by using proxies to wage a nuclear war against Israel. And if there is no accountability, why stop with Israel?

The road to a suitcase bomb in Tel Aviv, Paris or New York just got a whole lot shorter.

Starting Another War (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

It is quite possible that President Bush will bomb Iran's nuclear installations over the next couple of years.

Let's hope he looks at how Israel shot itself in the foot in Lebanon this summer and resists the siren calls of neocons who claim that a few air raids would make the Iranian nuclear menace disappear.

The argument Mr. Bush is hearing in favor of an airstrike is pretty simple: Iran is a terrorist regime that has sponsored attacks on Americans and on Jews (as far away as Argentina). The president of Iran is a hard-liner who has used language that, while subject to debate among Farsi speakers, may mean that his aim is to wipe Israel off the map.

A nuclear Iran would also have a devastating ripple effect around the region: Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Turkey might go nuclear as well. And considering how reckless Iran's foreign policy has already been, imagine if it felt emboldened with a nuclear weapon.

Moreover, if Mr. Bush doesn't strike Iran, there's a good chance that Israel will — and the U.S. would still get blamed (partly because the Israeli planes would fly through American-controlled airspace over Iraq).

So if the U.S. is going to get the blame either way, why not do it right, with a combination of American bombers and cruise missiles destroying Iranian nuclear sites in Natanz, Isfahan, Arak and perhaps Bushehr? A successful strike would have to destroy not only buildings but also kill the scientists involved; this is one military strike that would surely occur during working hours.

That's the argument. But Iran's leaders are probably praying for such a strike; it may be the only way that they can stay in power for more than another decade.

I've never been in a country where the government is so unpopular as in Iran, with the possible exception of Burma. The government is so corrupt, tyrannical and incompetent that it will eventually collapse — unless we attack its nuclear sites and trigger a nationalistic surge of support for the regime.

We Americans are still paying the price for our involvement in the 1953 overthrow of the elected Iranian government of Mohammed Mossadegh; if we bomb Iran, we may cement the mullahs in power for another 50 years.

Moreover, the military options are wretched, partly because Iran is probably doing much of its work at sites we can't destroy because we don't know where they are. The Natanz site for now is an empty room. We might kill Russian technicians at

Bushehr or elsewhere, and Iran might retaliate with terror attacks aimed at us (counterterrorism experts suspect that Iran has sleeper agents in the U.S. whom it could activate).

A military strike would also do nothing more than buy time. Ashton Carter, a former senior Pentagon official who has studied the possibility of a strike and considers it feasible (but unwise at this time), estimates that a one-time strike would delay Iran's nuclear weapon at most three or four years. The U.S. could then go back and hit the sites again, but Iran presumably would hide the locations, so later strikes would be less effective.

Dov Zakheim, who was under secretary of defense in Mr. Bush's first term, recalls that fears of Pakistan's "Islamic bomb" proved exaggerated and notes that Iran doesn't treat its 20,000 Jews as wretchedly as its rhetoric would suggest (Iran continues to be home to more Jews than any Middle Eastern country save Israel). Mr. Zakheim argues that the best way to protect Israel is to give Israel improved missile defense capabilities on the understanding that it not launch a first strike against Iran.

As for alternatives to bombs, the best option is more of the carrot-and-stick diplomacy that the West is already engaging in (including direct Iran-U.S. talks) — and keeping International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors in Iran to uncover the hidden sites. Few experts expect Iran to give up its nuclear program altogether, but it's likely that Iran could be persuaded to adopt a Japanese model: develop its capacity to the point that a bomb could be completed in weeks or months, but without testing or stockpiling weapons.

Granted, expert reassurances are easier to accept if you live in New York than in Tel Aviv, and the consequences of being wrong would be horrific. But however one judges the risks, the one thing we should have learned from Iraq and Lebanon is that military "solutions" can leave us worse off than before.

Abbas Agrees To Share Power With Hamas (AP)

By Diaa Hadid

AP, September 12, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas struck a deal Monday to share power with the militant Islamic Hamas, an accord that could restore international aid and could lead to contacts with Israel.

The breakthrough compromise falls short of international demands that Hamas fully renounce violence, but Israeli officials still voiced cautious support for the accord.

Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction, swept to victory in January legislative elections, defeating Fatah, and formed a government by itself. The West and Israel reacted by cutting off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, accusing Hamas of being a terrorist group.

Initially, Palestinians held the West and Israel to blame for their misfortune, but in recent weeks, they have directed that criticism at the government. Tens of thousands of civil servants launched a strike this month to protest the government's failure to pay them. A two-month Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip — begun after Hamas-linked militants infiltrated Israel and captured a soldier — has added to the Palestinians' misery.

After months of on-and-off talks, Abbas, the moderate Fatah leader, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas announced the accord Monday.

"The continuous efforts to form a national unity government have ended successfully with the announcement of a political program for this government," Abbas told Palestinian television. "Efforts in the next few days will continue to complete the formation of the national unity government."

Abbas aide Nabil Abu Rdeneh said the president would dissolve the Hamas-led government within 48 hours to clear the way for the formation of a coalition.

Haniyeh, who said earlier that he would retain his post in the new government, confirmed the two parties planned to rule together.

"I bring good news to the Palestinian people, and I feel proud and content that at this important moment we establish a national coalition government," Haniyeh said.

Both Fatah and Hamas officials said their deal was based on a proposal — formulated last spring by prominent prisoners held by Israel — that many have interpreted to imply recognition of Israel.

That proposal calls for a Palestinian state alongside Israel — effectively abandoning the Hamas goal of destroying the Jewish state — and accepts U.N. resolutions that call for compromise with Israel. Hamas also would allow Abbas to handle all dealings with Israel.

In addition, it also endorses a wider Arab plan seeking a comprehensive peace agreement with Israel. Arab allies of the U.S. are expected to present the plan to the U.N. Security Council this month.

Israel has been cool to the Arab plan, since it would require a withdrawal from all territories captured in the 1967 Mideast War, including east Jerusalem. Israel wants to adjust the borders to include some main Jewish settlements.

DOJ_NMG_0061915

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Israel would maintain its tough line with Hamas. "It doesn't matter what Palestinian government there may be, it must fulfill the three conditions" set by the international community, she said in Jerusalem. She was referring to the demands that Hamas renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept previous peace agreements.

She also said budding ties with Abbas could be in danger if Hamas does not comply. "Abu Mazen and Fatah cannot join a government that does not fulfill the conditions," she said, referring to Abbas. "If he does, I feel we will have a problem."

Prodded by visiting British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert both said they were prepared to hold their first working meeting.

In Beirut, Lebanon, a spokesman for Blair said the British leader regarded the Palestinian leaders' announcement as "potentially, a hugely significant statement."

Monday's agreement indicated that Hamas has finally buckled under the crushing international sanctions, imposed six months ago to pressure it to moderate. Without the vital international aid, the government was unable to pay salaries to its tens of thousands of civil servants. The government is the largest employer in the Palestinian areas, and the economic crisis caused widespread hardship.

"When we came to power, we wanted to achieve our Islamic program — to reduce people's suffering, to eliminate corruption, anarchy and lack of security, and of course, to find a resolution for the Palestinian issue," said Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas lawmaker. "Because of the embargo we faced, and its result on the Palestinian street, we couldn't achieve all of that."

A smaller Islamic militant group, Islamic Jihad, said it would not join the government, but spokesman Khader Habib said if a cease-fire with Israel is declared, "we will not sing out of tune."

Palestinian officials have been looking to Europe to lead the way in lifting the sanctions. European leaders have recently welcomed the Palestinian efforts to form a unity government.

Mouin Rabbani, an analyst with the International Crisis Group in Jordan, said Monday's agreement was a "positive signal" but by no means meets the requirements of the U.S. and the European Union.

While European countries have signaled they will reassess their policies toward a Palestinian national unity government, the signals are "far short of a formal policy commitment, and will be put to the test," he said.

Abbas And Hamas Agree To Coalition Government (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2006

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said today that his Fatah movement would join Hamas in a coalition government, a bid to quell factional clashes and persuade the West to halt an aid cutoff that has left the treasury broke.

The pact may help bring a measure of calm to the Gaza Strip and West Bank, easing protests by long-unpaid public workers and strife between the two parties' gunmen. However, it remained unclear whether a government reshuffle would go far enough to restart the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars in aid from foreign donors, including the United States.

Abbas announced the agreement after talks in Gaza City on Sunday with leaders of Hamas, the radical Islamist group that gained control of the Palestinian government after winning parliamentary elections in January. The U.S. and European Union cut off direct aid soon after because they classify Hamas as a terrorist group.

"The continued efforts to form a national unity government ended successfully by determining its political program," Abbas said in a statement posted by the official Wafa news agency.

Palestinian officials said Abbas would dissolve the Hamas government in the coming days and that a new governing coalition would be named, most likely under Hamas leadership but including other factions. Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman with Hamas, said the parties still needed to work out the makeup of the government.

"I am happy to bring our people the good news that we took into consideration the Palestinian people's supreme interests and the preservation of their rights," said Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, who is expected to lead the new government.

Details of the agreement were not released. A key unanswered question was whether the proposed government would satisfy the three conditions laid out by the so-called quartet of Middle East intermediaries — the U.S., the EU, Russia and United Nations — in order to resume the flow of aid. Those conditions are: recognizing Israel, halting violence and agreeing to honor past Israeli-Palestinians agreements.

Analysts said a government shake-up might be enough to get at least partial renewal of aid, such as from European donors.

Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, has steadfastly refused to recognize Israel explicitly and maintains that Palestinians have the right to resist the Israeli occupation with violence, if necessary. Hamas leaders had previously said they would honor past agreements only as long as they benefited the Palestinian people.

DOJ_NMG_0061916

U.S. officials in Jerusalem said they were awaiting details on today's deal.

Israel officials reacted cautiously, saying they wanted to see whether the proposed unity government would expressly accept the three international conditions and win the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier taken captive by Gaza-based militants June 25. Since Hamas took power, Israel has withheld about $50 million a month in tax and customs revenues that it collects on behalf of the Palestinians under a long-standing economic agreement.

"If a future Palestinian government were to accept the three benchmarks and they were to bring about the immediate release of Gilad Shalit, that would create new momentum, re-energize the peace process and put the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue back on track," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry. "Anything short of that would, unfortunately, be a recipe for stagnation."

Ziad abu Amr, an independent Palestinian lawmaker who mediated the negotiations between Fatah and Hamas, said Hamas had agreed to accept past Arab peacemaking initiatives and U.N. resolutions on the conflict. By accepting these, the group could be seen as having recognized Israel implicitly.

Hamas spokesman Sami abu Zuhri said that Hamas had not changed its positions. "We have said that we will not recognize the legitimacy of the occupation," he said in Gaza.

But it is still possible that the unity government could recognize Israel. Abu Amr, in a telephone interview from Gaza, said it is significant that the agreement was acceptable to Abbas, who favors negotiations with Israel and has repeatedly urged Palestinian militants in Gaza to stop firing rockets across the border into Israeli towns.

"It meets with the satisfaction of the president, who is fully aware of what the world wants," he said.

Abu Amr said Abbas made it clear that the new government could not succeed unless militants halted the rocket attacks and release Shalit, who was taken into Gaza after his capture. Hamas fighters claimed partial responsibility for the raid.

Since late June, Israel has carried out on-again, off-again military operations in Gaza that have left more than 200 Palestinians dead and led to the arrest of more than two dozen Hamas legislators and Cabinet members in the West Bank .

The coalition pact announced today stemmed from a "reconciliation agreement" hammered out by the parties in June that accepted a unity government in principle but was vague in its wording about Israel.

Abbas, whose Fatah Party accepts Israel and a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict, has sought to persuade Hamas to moderate its positions. While Abbas is president, Hamas holds a parliamentary majority and thus controls the government.

Hamas' tenure has been marked by factional violence, grave economic shortages due to the aid cuts and the collapse of many government services. Teachers and public employees have been on strike for more than a week to protest the government's failure to pay them regularly since February.

Hamas and Fatah gunmen, often members of the security forces, have clashed at times, contributing to a lawless climate, especially in the Gaza Strip.

Abbas too must shake things up if he has any hope of breaking the impasse and moving forward to try to negotiate a peace deal with Israel, said Ali Jarbawi, a Palestinian political analyst.

"He is willing to do what is necessary to break this deadlock," Jarbawi said. "If the only way is a national unity government and everyone gets a piece of the cake, fine." ken.ellingwood@latimes.com

Fatah, Hamas Move Toward Unity (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh announced an agreement in principle yesterday on the formation of a unity government comprising ministers from their rival Fatah and Hamas parties.

The final agreement is expected to include an implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas, but it was not clear whether it would go far enough to end an international aid boycott that has paralyzed the Palestinian government and left its workers unpaid for months.

The United States and European Union have insisted that aid cannot resume until the Palestinian government recognizes Israel, renounces terrorism and agrees to honor previous treaties with the Jewish state.

Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniyeh announced their agreement following weekend talks in Gaza City, Gaza Strip. A spokesman for Mr. Abbas said he hoped to conclude all the details within 48 hours.

Mr. Abbas hopes to persuade Hamas to sign on to a three-year-old Saudi peace formula calling for a full Israeli withdrawal from territories occupied since 1967 in return for full peace, and to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization's role as the body responsible for negotiating international agreements.

DOJ_NMG_0061917

"An agreement in principle was reached," said Saeb Erekat, a peace negotiator and aide to Mr. Abbas, "but there are many details to be ironed out, like composition of the government and the program of the government."

There was some doubt that all the questions could be resolved within the 48-hour time frame. Indeed, Palestinian officials in late June announced the creation of a unity government that never materialized.

Since then, Hamas has come under intense pressure to strike a power-sharing deal with Fatah that would restore billions of dollars of annual aid that pays the salaries of some 140,000 employees.

The Palestinian Authority has been shut down for a week by striking civil servants who are protesting the government's failure to pay salaries for the past six months.

While there was no direct U.S. endorsement of the accord between Palestinian factions, the State Department said yesterday that any Palestinian government must renounce violence and accept Israel's right to exist to join now-dormant Mideast peacemaking efforts and qualify for a resumption of full Western aid.

State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said the Palestinian government must accept the "three principles of peace" -- disavowal of terror and violence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements between the two sides, including a peacemaking process, the Associated Press reported.

The top editor of Hamas' weekly newspaper in the West Bank confirmed Israeli newspaper reports that the Islamic militants had agreed to support the Saudi peace initiative, but no confirmation was offered by Hamas officials yesterday.

"If we are united, then we can present ourselves as a strong group to the international community and the world," said Yazeed Khader, the editor of the Hamas weekly.

Israeli press reports said that Mr. Haniyeh was expected to remain prime minister in the new government.

Hamas' surprise victory in a January parliamentary vote gave it a majority of the Palestinian legislators and exclusive control over the Palestinian Cabinet.

Since then, the Islamic militants have refused to budge from their rejection of peace talks and refusal to recognize Israel.

During coalition talks with Hamas, Mr. Abbas has pushed for a political program based on a joint declaration issued by imprisoned Palestinian militants from both Fatah and Hamas.

Known as the "prisoners document," the declaration affirms the role of the plo -- headed by mr. Abbas -- as the political body responsible for negotiating international peace treaties aimed at establishing a palestinian state. Many consider ratification of the document an implicit recognition of israel.

Nevertheless, Israeli officials said that they would insist that any new government meet the conditions of the international community on the peace process and free an Israeli soldier being held in Gaza since June.

Such a development "would put Palestinian-Israeli talks on track," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev. "Short of that would be a recipe for further stagnation, which is neither an Israeli nor a Palestinian interest."

Palestinian Reports Unity Deal With Hamas (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger, Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

GAZA, Sept. 11 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said Monday that he had reached a tentative agreement with Hamas to form a national unity government in an attempt to end the Palestinians' international isolation and the cutoff in Western assistance to their government.

In a speech on Palestinian television, Mr. Abbas said it would take several days to finish the deal, and provided no details of how his Fatah faction and the militant group Hamas, which leads the government, had resolved their considerable differences.

"We have finalized the elements of the political agenda of the national unity government," Mr. Abbas said in his speech. "Hopefully, in the coming days we will begin forming the government of national unity."

Details of the political agreement were believed to be limited to the unity government, rather than committing the Hamas movement more broadly to its terms. A national unity government will also have representatives of other Palestinian factions like Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, said Ghazi Hamad, the spokesman for the Hamas government.

"We're trying to make a balance between the requirements of the international community and Palestinian factions," Mr. Hamad said. "For everyone to sit at the same table won't be easy, but we need to do this. We hope it will break the international siege and minimize the tensions on the street."

Mr. Abbas's intention in pressing to form this new government is to regain the funds that have been cut off to Hamas, by the West and by Israel, since it took office in late March.

Aides to Mr. Abbas said he hoped to be able to disband the current Hamas government within 48 hours, but that the two factions still disagreed over important portfolios. They are agreed that the current prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, will keep his job, and that Fatah will control the Finance Ministry. Fatah also wants the foreign minister's post, but Hamas wants Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas leader, to keep it. Hamas also wants to keep the Interior Ministry.

Officials said the new government would accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements, an implicit recognition of a two-state solution. It would call for the negotiation of an independent Palestine outside of Israel's 1967 borders, including Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem, on the basis of an Arab League initiative.

The document is expected to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has signed all agreements with Israel, as the negotiating representative of the Palestinian people, and to acknowledge the right of Mr. Abbas to negotiate for the Palestinians.

After Hamas formed the government, which Fatah initially refused to join, the United States and the European Union took steps to halt aid to the Palestinian Authority that constitutes part of the authority's budget, and Israel stopped handing over the $50 million a month in taxes and customs receipts collected on behalf of the Palestinians, a major reason for the Palestinian deficit.

All said that the government of Hamas, which they have considered a terrorist group, must first recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Since Hamas gained control of the government in March, the 165,000 employees of the Palestinian Authority have received less than two months of their salaries, causing considerable hardship and a collapse of the economy, especially in Gaza. Crossings into Israel from Gaza have been regularly closed, which Israel said was a result of security threats.

It is not known whether the unpublished program of the unfinished new government will be enough for Israel to hand over funds that now total more than $350 million. The European Union has already suggested, though not explicitly, that it will resume contacts and aid to a unity government, and the United States, which does not give direct budget support, has been wary, but its view will be important in the Israeli decision.

Ziad Abu Amr, a lawmaker and mediator in the negotiations, said that if a new government did not permit the resumption of funds transfers and aid, "there's not much point to the whole exercise."

The Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mark Regev, said that if a new Palestinian government accepted the three international conditions "and releases Gilad Shalit," a captured Israeli soldier, "that would create a new momentum in the peace process and put us firmly on the right track."

But he added, "Anything short of that would unfortunately lead to more stagnation that is not good for Israel, not good for the Palestinians and not good for anyone who wants peace in the Middle East."

The Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, told Israel radio that if the new government did not meet international conditions, and if Mr. Abbas "decides not to take a step in this direction, but rather join something which actually means he is joining a Hamas-led government of terror, then I'm afraid we are going to have a problem."

Hamas has moved a long distance, said Mr. Hamad, the Hamas government spokesman, adding, "No one should push them into a corner."

Hamas recognizes the fact of Israel but refuses to recognize its right to exist, a position repeated Monday by a Hamas spokesman, Sami Abu Zuhri, when he said: "Hamas will still have its political agenda. We will never recognize the legitimacy of the occupation." That term lets Hamas be vague at different moments about whether it means the occupation of land captured during the 1967 war, or, as its charter insists, Israel's very existence in the region.

But Mr. Hamad points out that the charter of Israel's conservative Likud Party calls for an Israel on both banks of the Jordan River, even as Likud governments have recognized the Oslo peace agreements of more than a decade ago and a two-state solution.

Since Fatah and Hamas agreed in principle on a national unity government in June, Mr. Abbas has made several statements indicating that a deal was close. He put major questions to Mr. Haniya 10 days ago, and reportedly threatened to dismiss the current government if it did not agree to work with Fatah to end the international aid freeze for the benefit of Palestinians in general.

Fatah says it is prepared to negotiate with Israel, and seeks a Palestinian state based on Israel's 1967 borders, which would include all of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, with a capital in East Jerusalem. Hamas says that all the land in the region belongs to Muslims, but has said it would consider a long-term truce with Israel if a Palestinian state were established based on the 1967 borders.

Broke and isolated, largely because of Israeli and American policy, the Hamas government has been ineffective since coming to power in March. Many Palestinian teachers went on strike at the beginning of the school year in early September. On Monday, Mr. Abbas called for the strike to end.

"We call for a return to work and the end of the strike because all the sons of the Palestinian people should unite in the national interest," he said.

Abbas Announces Deal With Hamas (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 11 -- Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas announced Monday that the governing Hamas movement and his rival Fatah party have agreed on the principles of a power-sharing government and may soon form a new cabinet to lead the beleaguered Palestinian Authority.

Under the plan, Abbas, the authority's president, is to dissolve the current Hamas-led cabinet within 48 hours. Abbas would then nominate the current Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas officials said, to assemble a coalition cabinet that would include members of his party, Fatah, other factions, and so-called technocrats unaligned with the leading movements.

Details of the agreement mark the first time Hamas has tacitly endorsed a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, if not explicitly the Jewish state's right to exist. Hamas and Fatah announced a tentative agreement several months ago, but it was never officially signed because of the tumult of an Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip following the June 25 capture of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit by gunmen from Hamas's military wing.

"The continuous efforts to form a national unity government have ended successfully," Abbas said on Palestinian state television Monday. "Efforts in the next few days will continue to complete the formation of the national unity government."

The deal follows contentious negotiations over a unified political program that would satisfy the rival Palestinian movements, as well as bring about an end to international sanctions against the Palestinian Authority. International donors froze aid after Hamas defeated the secular Fatah movement in elections eight months ago. Israel has withheld hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue that it collects on the Palestinian state's behalf.

The United States, the European Union and Israel all designate Hamas, an Islamic political movement with a potent armed wing at war with the Jewish state, as a terrorist organization.

The sanctions have left the Hamas-led government unable to pay salaries to an estimated 165,000 public employees, most of whom are on strike. In a rare show of unity, Abbas and Haniyeh both called Monday for all government employees to end the strike, spearheaded by young Fatah activists to give Abbas leverage in talks with Hamas.

The United States, the E.U., Russia and the United Nations -- a group of Middle East peace interlocutors known as the quartet -- have demanded three concessions from Hamas in return for resumption of aid that accounts for nearly half the Palestinian government's budget: Hamas must renounce violence, accept previously signed agreements, and recognize Israel's right to exist.

It was unclear whether they would accept the Palestinian agreement as meeting those conditions.

Palestinian officials said the deal does not require Hamas to explicitly recognize Israel or renounce violence. Instead, Hamas would accept previously signed agreements with Israel and the principles of a 2002 Arab peace initiative that calls for a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem, territory Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

Hamas's charter calls for the creation of an Islamic state across territory that now includes Israel. Party officials deny that the agreement amounts to a recognition of Israel. "Our program has not changed," Sami Abu Zouhri, a Hamas spokesman, said on al-Jazeera television.

Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said that "things are still fluid" concerning the terms of the political program. But he said that "it's clear that if the incoming government, assuming there is one, accepts the three benchmarks . . . as well as the release of Gilad Shalit, it could give new momentum to the peace process and put the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue back on track."

"Anything short of those benchmarks would be a recipe for stagnation," Regev said.

Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, spokeswoman for the U.S. Consulate here, which manages diplomacy with the Palestinians, said the political developments would be reviewed before any decision on aid is reached. But, she added, "if it's still falling short of the quartet's principles, then it's still falling short."

Blair Gets Rough Ride In Beirut (FT)

By Christopher Adams, Andrew England

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

Several thousand angry chanting protesters gathered in central Beirut on Monday, leaving Tony Blair in little doubt about the hostility many Lebanese felt towards his fleeting visit to their country.

“Blair you are a partner in the killing of children,” said one poster. “We demand the conviction of Blair a war criminal in Lebanon and Iraq,” said another.

DOJ_NMG_0061920

While hostile and vocal, the reaction reflects the country's experience of 34 days of Israeli bombardment that some argue Britain's prime minister bears a degree of responsibility for.

Many Lebanese accuse Mr Blair of supporting Israel in its war with Hizbollah, the Shia militant group, and he was widely criticised for refusing to call for an immediate ceasefire to the conflict. Some also deride him as a crony of George W. Bush, the US president.

"Blair, Bush, (Israeli Prime Minister Ehud) Olmert, three corns of one devil," one placard declared.

More than 1,000 Lebanese, mainly civilians, were killed in the war, and Israeli bombs destroyed thousand of homes, as well as roads, businesses and bridges.

"We respect the English people, but we are against Blair and the policy of the government," said Youssef Nour, a Hizbollah supporter at the demonstration where organisers used loud speakers to praise Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah's leader, and denounce Mr Blair.

"We say Blair is not welcome in this land, a land of dignity, a land of honour and resistance," Mr Nour added.

Shia politicians made their own protests.

Hizbollah's two ministers in the government, as well as two cabinet members from Amal, another Shia group, refused to attend a meeting of ministers with Mr Blair.

The prime minister was also scheduled to meet Nabih Berri, the influential Shia parliamentary speaker who acted as a mediator with Hizbollah. But Mr Berri, the leader of Amal, was abroad on a business trip in what was seen by some as another snub to the British leader.

"Hizbollah's position is that he is like Bush and (Condoleezza) Rice who killed the children, who refused the ceasefire and that means they share in the Israeli massacre. He should not have come," said Hussein Rahal, a Hizbollah spokesman.

Hundreds of soldiers, some in riot gear, deployed to keep the protesters away from Mr Blair's entourage, closing much of downtown Beirut to traffic.

But even in the relative tranquillity of the office of Fouad Siniora, Lebanon's prime minister, Mr Blair could not escape heckling.

As he and Mr Siniora were addressing journalists, an Irish woman, who said she was working as a volunteer in Lebanon, unfurled a banner reading "Boycott Israeli apartheid," and shouted: "It's an insult to the memories of thousands of Palestinians and Iraqis."

"Shame on you," she repeated as security men dragged her away.

"I've got used to demonstrations in my own country and demonstrations elsewhere as well," Mr Blair said.

Mr Siniora used the incident to play up Lebanon's fledgling democracy.

"We are proud of our democracy and the democratic measures used by some of our people today," he said.

But the fact that senior Shia politicians, particularly Mr Berri, did not meet Mr Blair could expose Mr Siniora to criticism from Lebanese groups who were against the UK prime minister's visit.

During the war, Lebanese parties projected a sense of unity, but the predominantly Christian and Sunni parliamentary majority that backs Mr Siniora has been under pressure since the August 14 ceasefire. Hizbollah, emboldened by its perceived success in the conflict, has been calling for a change of government, and it initially reacted much faster than Mr Siniora's administration to provide funds for those whose homes were destroyed.

However, Lebanese officials said the trip was important not only for Lebanon but also for efforts to find a solution to the broader Arab-Israeli conflict.

"It's important to have our requests heard, it's important (for leaders) to shuttle between Israel and Lebanon and other players in the region," said Misbah el-Ahdab, a Sunni parliamentarian in the majority bloc.

Protesters In Lebanon Drown Out Blair's Offers Of Aid And Support (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 11 — Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain dodged raucous demonstrators and endured a series of diplomatic snubs on his first official visit to this country, offering help for the Lebanese Army and vowing to renew efforts to bring peace to the Middle East.

His message was largely lost on a population angry at his failure to demand an earlier end to the fighting, which had killed nearly 1,200 Lebanese, an overwhelming majority of them civilians.

Hundreds of people gathered to protest near Martyrs Square on the edge of downtown Beirut, which for Mr. Blair's visit was cordoned off with barbed wire and guarded by hundreds of Lebanese troops with tanks. "Blair, bow your head before the children you have murdered," read one of the placards in the crowd.

DOJ_NMG_0061921

Several ministers refused to meet him, including the pro-Syrian speaker of Parliament, Nabih Berri. The front pages of most of the country's newspapers said he was not welcome.

But Mr. Blair defended his policies in the 34-day war.

"I could have gone out there and called for it all to stop, but it wasn't going to stop until there was a U.N. resolution that had a framework within which it could stop, in which the real problems could be dealt with," he told reporters, with the embattled Lebanese prime minister, Fouad Siniora, standing beside him.

Mr. Blair said Britain would send more than $75 million in aid to Lebanon this year and was ready to provide "training, equipment, any help we can give" to Lebanese security forces that were filling the void left by Hezbollah and departing Israeli troops in southern Lebanon. He said he would use his remaining months as prime minister to work for peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Siniora then urged Mr. Blair to push the Security Council to carry out an Arab plan offering Israel peace if it withdrew from Arab land occupied since 1967. "Only by addressing the underlying causes can we guarantee peace and security for the Middle East," Mr. Siniora said.

On Sunday, Mr. Blair said Europe and the United States should work with a Palestinian coalition government, including both the Fatah and Hamas factions, if that government distanced itself from the anti-Israeli policies of Hamas that have isolated the current Hamas-led government.

The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, said Monday that a coalition government could be formed within days.

Separately, President Jacques Chirac of France said Monday in Helsinki that China could send up to 1,000 peacekeepers to bolster the United Nations force meant to maintain the nearly month-old cease-fire.

In Russia, President Vladimir V. Putin ordered the deployment of Russian military engineers and other military personnel to help with the reconstruction of Lebanon. In a meeting with government ministers, he said his administration would submit a request to the upper house of Parliament, the Federation Council, which approves the deployment of Russian forces abroad.

The defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, said a battalion of combat engineers could be ready to leave by the end of the month. He said the soldiers would not be part of the United Nations peacekeeping force.

An engineering battalion typically has about 400 soldiers, but a Ministry of Defense spokesman said he could not say how many would be deployed.

Cameron Hits Out At US Foreign Policy (FT)

By Miranda Green

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

David Cameron, leader of Britain's opposition Conservative party, on launched an outspoken attack on the failures of American foreign policy, calling for a "rebalancing" of the close relationship between the US and the UK.

"We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America," he said on Monday, during a speech in London on the fifth anniversary of the September 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington.

Mr Cameron, the youthful new leader of a party that has close ties to the Republicans, used his first big speech on international relations to differentiate his stance from that of Tony Blair, the prime minister.

Mr Blair's staunch support for the US-led war on terror has compromised his standing with British voters and MPs in his ruling Labour party. The Iraq war and Mr Blair's apparent willingness to take the lead from President George W. Bush have also proved increasingly unpopular, while the prime minister's refusal to condemn Israel's attacks on Lebanon was also widely criticised.

"We will serve neither our own, nor America's, nor the world's, interests if we are seen as America's unconditional associate in every endeavour," Mr Cameron said, calling for a new approach to promoting the shared values of Britain and America abroad – human dignity, personal freedom and national self-determin-ation. "A moral mission requires moral methods. Without them we are merely warmakers," he added.

The Tory leader argued that the military and diplomatic partnership between the allies since the attacks, and the military actions in Iraq and Afghanistan, which he and his party supported, had been part of a foreign policy approach that lacked humility and patience.

"I and my party are instinctive friends of America and passionate supporters of the Atlantic alliance," he said, warning against the "intellectual and moral surrender" of anti-Americanism. But he added that being an uncritical ally was dangerous for Britain: "I fear that if we continue at present we may combine the maximum of exposure with the minimum of real influence over decisions."

Risking a rift with the Republicans and his own traditionalists, he attacked the "unrealistic and simplistic" neoconservative philosophy of Mr Bush's closest colleagues and advisers, calling it "a view which sees only light and darkness in the world – and which believes that one can be turned to the other as quickly as flicking a switch".

In a rare public statement issued on Monday, Baroness Thatcher, the former Conservative prime minister, said the attack on America was "an attack on all of us". She added: "With America, Britain stands in the front line against Islamist fanatics who hate our beliefs, our liberties and our citizens.''

Mr Cameron's predecessor as Conservative leader, Michael Howard, was kept at arms length by the Bush administration after failing to give unquestioning support to its policies.

But Mr Cameron is building bridges with other Republicans and has invited Senator John McCain to address his party's conference next month.

Tory Denounces Blair's 'Slavish' Tie To U.S. (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 11 — In his first major foreign policy address, David Cameron, the leader of Britain's opposition Conservatives, sought Monday to distance his party from what he called a "slavish" bond established between Britain and the United States by Prime Minister Tony Blair.

At the same time, though, he asked his audience of several hundred bankers and policy experts in London's financial district to bow their heads in silence during his speech at the moment when the first hijacked plane slammed into the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001.

Mr. Cameron is the main opposition contender likely to challenge whoever takes over the governing Labor Party from Mr. Blair, who has promised to quit within a year. His remarks seemed intended to sharply demarcate his foreign policy from that of Mr. Blair, for whom the war in Iraq and his ties with President Bush have proved politically ruinous.

His remarks — by a Conservative accusing a Labor leader of being too far to the right — showed just how far the British political spectrum has shifted since the end of the cold war and, particularly, since Mr. Blair's rise to power in 1997.

The speech was also intended to draw a line under previous Conservative policy. Mr. Cameron himself supported the Iraq invasion in 2003, but a senior Conservative, who spoke on the condition of anonymity under party rules, said: "We don't want to have an endless fight about what happened three or four years ago. This is about the next 10 years."

Mr. Cameron, 39, a former public relations executive who took over the Conservative leadership last December, assailed what he described as American neoconservatism and Mr. Blair's close alliance with the White House, which has encouraged British critics to label their prime minister America's "poodle."

But, he said, "I and my party are instinctive friends of America and passionate supporters of the Atlantic Alliance."

Mr. Cameron said there had been mixed success by Britain and the United States in curbing terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks. A terrorist attack on the same scale had been averted, he said, but "across the globe, terrorists are being recruited in increasing numbers and are active in many more areas than before Sept. 11." Anti-Americanism had taken hold, he said, "not just in countries affected by war and instability, but here in the West, here in Britain."

He urged development of "a foreign policy that goes beyond neo-conservatism, retaining its strengths but learning from its failures."

"We will serve neither our own, nor America's, nor the world's interests, if we are seen as America's unconditional associate in every endeavor," he said. "Our duty is to our own citizens, and to our own conception of what is right for the world. We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America."

The gibe was clearly aimed at Mr. Blair, who faced hostile protesters in Lebanon on Monday because of his support for the American and Israeli positions during the Lebanon war.

Senior Conservatives acknowledged that Mr. Cameron seemed to be positioning himself for a post-Bush White House. "He's unlikely to be prime minister when George Bush is president," the Conservative official said. Britain's next general election is due some time before 2010, probably long after the 2008 American presidential vote.

Before his speech, Mr. Cameron met with Robert H. Tuttle, the American ambassador, and asked him to "take the speech as a whole and not bits and pieces of it," said David T. Johnson, the deputy chief of mission, the No. 2 diplomat at the American Embassy. "Some of the things we disagree with," Mr. Johnson said in an interview, singling out a reference in the text of the speech to "illiberalism," referring to repressive behavior at the American detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

But, he said, "I take him at his word that he did not intend it to be anything other than pro-American."

DOJ_NMG_0061923

Much of the speech seemed intended for a British rather than an American audience, Mr. Johnson said. For instance, in the address, Mr. Cameron said that Mr. Blair had “lost the art” familiar to British leaders going back to Winston Churchill of effectively playing what he called the junior partner in the so-called “special relationship” with Washington.

“I fear that if we continue as at present we may combine the maximum of exposure with the minimum of real influence over decisions,” Mr. Cameron said.

He assailed Mr. Blair’s and Mr. Bush’s view of the effort to prevent terrorism, saying he was “skeptical of grand schemes to remake the world” and asserting that Western policy had lacked “humility and patience.”

He also attacked the notion that counterterrorism was “a single struggle between single protagonists.’’

“The danger is that by positing a single source of terrorism — a global jihad — and opposing it with a single global response — American-backed force — we will simply fulfill our own prophecy.”

George Osborne, a senior Conservative official, said in an interview: “He talks about the future. Most of the speech is about the future and how we get beyond neo-conservatism.”

Briton Urges Frankness Toward U.S. (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 11 -- Conservative Party leader David Cameron said Monday that Britain should be a frank "junior partner" to the United States instead of the "uncritical ally" he said it has become since the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

"We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America," Cameron, 39, said in a major foreign policy speech that distanced him from Prime Minister Tony Blair, who has been criticized as unfailingly supportive of President Bush, especially on the Iraq war.

"We have for more than half a century acted as a junior partner to the United States," Cameron told a group of U.S. and British business and political leaders. He called Winston Churchill junior partner to Franklin Roosevelt during World War II, as was Margaret Thatcher to Ronald Reagan in the 1980s and John Major to George H.W. Bush during the Persian Gulf War, he said.

"It is not an easy part to play, but these three prime ministers learned to carry it through with skill and success," said Cameron, who hopes to regain the prime minister's job that his party lost to Blair and the Labor Party in 1997. "I worry that we have recently lost the art. . . . The sooner we rediscover the right balance, the better for Britain and our alliance."

Thatcher was in Washington on Monday for ceremonies marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Describing his own party members as "instinctive friends" of the United States, Cameron indicated that close ties would continue under a Conservative government but with that balance.

His speech came four days after Blair reluctantly announced that he would step down within 12 months. The prime minister has been facing diving approval ratings, caused in large part by disillusionment with the Iraq war and Blair's closeness to Bush.

A poll for the BBC released Monday found that 56 percent of Britons who were questioned believed the West was losing the "war on terror" and that only 20 percent thought it was winning. Fifty-five percent said they believed Britain was too closely aligned with U.S. foreign policy, while 19 percent said the relationship was about right.

Blair and his presumed successor, Chancellor Gordon Brown, have been openly feuding, causing many in Labor to worry that a wounded, infighting party might have a hard time defeating Cameron's Conservatives in elections that must be held by 2010. An ICM poll in the Guardian newspaper last month showed that Conservative support had risen sharply, to 40 percent, while Labor support had dropped to 31 percent, its lowest level in 19 years.

Blair's woes were underscored Monday when he was greeted by crowds of angry protesters in Lebanon, some carrying placards saying "killer" and "war criminal." Blair was widely criticized in Britain, as well as across Europe and the Middle East, for joining Bush in refusing to call for an immediate cease-fire during the recent Israel-Hezbollah armed conflict in Lebanon.

Cameron said Britain must not "turn a blind eye to the excesses of our allies," including "disproportionate Israeli bombing in Lebanon."

Rice Warns Sudan Of Relations With U.S. (AP)

AP, September 12, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she told Sudan on Monday there is no chance of improved relations with the United States if it flouts the world's demand for U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

Rice gave reporters a brief account of her morning meeting in Washington with Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol. She was visiting Canada to thank that ally for its generosity in helping stranded American air passengers during the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I won't say that we made progress, but I will say that I delivered the strongest possible message in the strongest possible terms to the Sudanese government that any hope for bettering relations between the United States and Sudan rests on Sudan's cooperation with the United Nations Security Council resolution," she said.

In August, the U.N. passed a resolution that would give the world body authority over peacekeepers in the Western Sudanese province of Darfur and is meant to give more power and funding to a force, now run by the African Union, that has been unable to stop the humanitarian catastrophe there. The violence has killed more than 200,000 people and continues to worsen.

Rice said Akol carried a letter to President Bush, which she had not seen. He also "brought hope for better relations between the United States and Sudan, and I told him in no uncertain terms that wasn't on the agenda unless Sudan acted responsibly," she said.

The Bush administration has had strained relations with Sudan over the deaths and displacement of villagers in Darfur. Rice found herself in the middle of a diplomatic incident when she visited the Sudanese capital of Khartoum last summer. She asked for and demanded an apology from the Sudanese government after security agents for President Omar al-Bashir treated members of Rice's traveling party, including reporters, roughly.

Also pressuring the Sudanese government, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee introduced legislation Monday calling for targeted sanctions against those responsible for atrocities in Darfur.

The bill by Indiana Republican Richard Lugar calls for sanctions against people determined by the president to be "complicit in, or responsible for, acts of genocide, war crimes or crimes against humanity in Darfur."

Sudan Flouting Peace Treaty, Annan Charges (WP)

From News Services

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

Sudan's government has violated the Darfur peace agreement with military attacks that are "legally and morally unacceptable," U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan said yesterday.

Annan said in a meeting of the U.N. Security Council that thousands of Sudanese troops have been sent to western Sudan, in violation of the peace accord, and North Darfur has been bombed. The violence has cut off food aid to 355,000 people in the northern part of the region, he said.

"I strongly condemn this escalation," Annan said.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) introduced legislation that would authorize U.S. assistance to the 7,000 African Union troops in Darfur and call on President Bush to name a special envoy for the crisis.

The African Union has said it would begin withdrawing its troops next month. Last month, the Security Council authorized up to 21,000 U.N. troops to replace them, but their deployment requires Sudan's approval, which its government has thus far refused.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met in Washington with Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol and said later she had urged Sudan "in the strongest possible terms" to accept the U.N. force.

"I won't say that we made progress," Rice acknowledged.

Violence and disease have left as many as 450,000 people dead and 2.5 million homeless in Darfur.

Mystery Lingers In Kyrgyz 'Kidnapping' (WT/AP)

By Leila Saralayeva

The Washington Times, September 12, 2006

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan -- A U.S. servicewoman who reappeared as mysteriously as she vanished gave confused accounts of her three-day absence and refused to make further statements after consulting with the U.S. Embassy, a Kyrgyz police official said yesterday.

Air Force Maj. Jill Metzger, who had been stationed at the U.S. base in Manas, outside the Kyrgyz capital, Bishkek, disappeared Sept. 5 while shopping in the city. She resurfaced Friday night when she knocked on the door of a house in Kant, about 15 miles outside Bishkek, and claimed she had been kidnapped.

Maj. Metzger was flown out of Kyrgyzstan within a few hours of her reappearance and was admitted Sunday to a U.S. military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany. There was no immediate word regarding what she was being treated for.

Kyrgyz authorities have said her swift departure could impede their investigation, because they wanted to question her further to clarify her account. According to investigators, Maj. Metzger said an object with a note saying it was a bomb was placed in her pocket in a Bishkek department store and that she was kidnapped after following the note's instructions on where to go.

DOJ_NMG_0061925

"It seemed to me that her testimony was little believable. She was confused in her evidence," said Batmirza Dzhailobayev, head of the Kant police department.

"After she spoke with somebody from the embassy, she categorically refused to give testimony. Then people from the U.S. Embassy took her away," he said.

Mr. Dzhailobayev noted that although Maj. Metzger had told police that her abductors had stolen her necklace, she was still wearing an expensive-looking wedding ring.

Also yesterday, a resident of the house where Maj. Metzger appeared said the 33-year-old was clearly in distress.

"Our first impression was that the woman was severely drunk ... [but] there was no smell of alcohol, and we then understood that she was in shock," Svetlana Ivashenko said. She said Maj. Metzger was dressed in clothes that appeared to be several sizes too large for her.

Mrs. Ivashenko said Maj. Metzger spoke only in English, which neither she nor her husband understand, so they awoke their daughter to try to help understand.

"Who had seized her, why and where they had held her all this time, she couldn't clarify," Mrs. Ivashenko said. "As she told all this, she didn't weep -- she just sobbed and held her head."

Mrs. Ivashenko said there was blood on Maj. Metzger's feet and that she said she had walked a considerable distance. She also said the right side of Maj. Metzger's face appeared to be badly bruised, although Mr. Dzhailobayev said that "it was my impression that there were no bruises on her face."

Maj. Metzger was serving a four-month stint with the 376th Air Expeditionary Wing at Manas, where the U.S. military has maintained a base since 2001 to support operations in nearby Afghanistan. She had been scheduled to return Friday to her regular post at Moody Air Force Base, Ga.

Senator Shoots Down Reports Of Close Call (HILL)

By Emily Heil

The Hill, September 12, 2006

The headlines sounded frightening.

“Missile Fired at McCain’s Helicopter,” one read, referring to an apparent Aug. 28 incident in the Republic of Georgia during a codel led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), which included six senators.

According to news stories, the Georgian Interior Ministry said a helicopter escorting a delegation of U.S. senators was fired on.

But returning from the month-long recess, senators on the codel, including Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), said they heard of the purported missile fire only after they had returned home. It turned out the statement is inaccurate, and that the senators’ helicopter was never under fire. The U.S. embassy in Georgia on Sep. 5 released a statement setting the record straight.

“A thorough investigation by Georgia’s Ministry of Internal Affairs and the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), confirms that, contrary to initial reports, no missile was fired at any helicopter transporting the U.S. Senate Delegation led by McCain on August 28, 2006,” the statement read. “It appears that another helicopter, which was on the way from Tbilisi to join the Senate delegation helicopters in western Georgia, was the intended target of the missile.”

Even though the senators were never in the line of fire, the incident at least made for a colorful what-I did-on-my-summer-vacation exchange.

“Did you get shot at over there?” Graham asked Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), who had been part of a separate, earlier codel to Georgia.

“Yeah, they missed,” Lugar joked.

Lightening bolt more likely to hit Senate

For House staffers who continuously gripe about the Senate’s lack of good faith, it’s official. The Senate is in fact more “godless” than the House when it comes to upholding the separation of church and state.

The folks at the Secular Coalition for America awarded 18 members of the Senate (and only seven in the House) a “perfect score” for “commitment to the separation of church and state, and their willingness to protect the interests of the non-theistic community.”

The group based the grades on 10 key votes in each chamber, including those on judicial nominees in the Senate.

Senators earning the aetheists’ praise are: Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), John Kerry (D-Mass.), Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), Carl Levin (D-Mich.), Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.), Patty Murray (D-Wash.), Jack Reed (D-R.I.), Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.).

DOJ_NMG_0061926

House members with perfect scores are: Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), Barbara Lee (D-Calif.), Jim McDermott (D-Wash.), Pete Stark (D-Calif.), and Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.).

Crikey! Hill's Aussie pays tribute to croc hunter

As the Hill's lone Aussie (at least by his own count), Greg Keeley is shedding more than crocodile tears over the death last week of Steve Irwin. The outdoorsman and TV personality known as the "Crocodile Hunter" had a special place in the hearts of Australians, particularly those living abroad, says Keeley, who is the communications director and military advisor for Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.).

The beloved Irwin was a great ambassador for the land Down Under, he notes.

"He's done wonders for me personally," Keeley says. "Everyone thinks I wrestle crocodiles and have a kangaroo in my backyard."

Keeley and his wife, Katie, met Irwin at a dinner in Los Angeles, and were impressed by Irwin's energy and easygoing manner.

"The personality you see on TV is exactly the way he was in real life," Keeley says.

Since Irwin's death, condolences have been pouring in from fellow Hill staffers, journalists, and military officials, Keeley says, and he's touched by the sentiments.

"It literally stopped the country," he said.

Feehery turns into a TV talker

It's nearly impossible to throw a Blackberry in D.C. without hitting a pundit. Now, there's one more target. John Feehery, the former spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) turned flack for the Motion Picture Association of America, has become a talking head, at least part time.

Feehery has a regular gig on Bloomberg TV, appearing every other week to gab about the usual roundup of politics and what's ahead in the next week's news. He alternates with former Clinton spokesman Joe Lockheart in a seven-minute segment every Friday on the show "Money & Politics."

Feehery says the new role (for which he isn't paid and does not represent the views of the MPAA) is much the same as his current and former jobs.

"It's just talking," he laughs.

Hill cable junkies have noted an uptick in the wattage of the guests on Bloomberg TV of late, and we hear Washington bureau chief Al Hunt—and his A-list Rolodex—is behind the change. Alexander Bolton and Elana Schor contributed to this page.

US And EU Condemn China's News Rules (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration joined the European Commission on Monday in criticising Beijing's imposition of new restrictions on the distribution of foreign news in China, saying it viewed the rules with "great concern".

A State Department official said Beijing's media policies in general were "incompatible with China's aspirations to build a modern information-based economy" and were a breach of fundamental rights.

The regulations announced at the weekend by Xinhua, Beijing's propaganda arm and China's biggest news agency, require international news services...to censor information distributed inside the country. The rules also ban the agencies from selling directly to local customers, including banks and other financial services companies.

The European Commission on Monday condemned moves by China to tighten controls on foreign news agencies, saying the new rules were a "real cause for concern".

Johannes Laitenberger, spokesman for the Commission, told a news conference in Brussels: "We oppose strongly this kind of restrictive practice."

The European protest was the first sign of the potential diplomatic cost of the moves by Xinhua to limit more closely the operations of international news agencies.

Leading agencies have yet to react in detail to the rules, which allow Xinhua to revoke the licence of any found distributing content that "harms China's national security or honour", or "disturbs the Chinese economy" or "hurts ethnic feelings".

A representative for one of the foreign news and information groups, who would not be named, said: "One of the big issues is does this just impact news agencies or does it affect financial information services as well."

Dow Jones declined to comment on the rules and Bloomberg said it would not be making a comment.

Old China News Agency (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0061927

China's state-run news agency, Xinhua, literally means "New China." How ironic, given its very old business tactics.

Xinhua has released a sweeping update to a 1996 law on foreign news agencies that smacks of expropriation and may violate China's World Trade Organization commitments. The document asserts the Chinese government's right to broadly censor foreign news companies' content over a range of sensitive subjects, including "sovereignty" (read: Taiwan), "religion" (Falun Gong), or China's "interests" (Iran, Burma, Sudan). Article 12 of the new regulations gives Xinhua "the right to select the news and information released by foreign news agencies" and to "delete" offending material.

We doubt they'll succeed. No self-respecting foreign news agency will allow the Chinese government to read an article before it's published on the mainland. For financial newswires that provide real-time pricing and market information -- such as the one owned by this newspaper's parent company, Dow Jones -- censorship would be literally impossible. Chinese banks, brokers, insurers and traders -- the bulk of which get their information from foreign news companies -- also won't appreciate seeing markets move against them because they received their information late.

The real story here, then, may be Xinhua's ambitions. According to Sunday's document, "foreign news agencies" will no longer have the right to sell news directly to their customers. They'll have to ply their wares through a Chinese "agent," which presumably will require a few yuan for its trouble. The Journal reported yesterday that this "agent" will be the China Economic Information Service, which, no surprise, is appointed by Xinhua.

As recently as 1996, Xinhua tried unsuccessfully to push through censorship rules on foreign news organizations. It also tried to bar government institutions from buying news products directly from foreigners, and to fix subscription prices. After a pitched battle...news organizations agreed to register with Xinhua on an annual basis. But they refused to submit to censorship, price setting, or government middlemen who'd take a cut of their profits.

From a business standpoint, Xinhua may now feel that it has no other option than to assert monopoly control. In the decade since the prior rules were promulgated, domestic news organizations have proliferated. Media Partners Asia Ltd. in Hong Kong estimates there are some 3,000 registered newspaper titles, and more than 9,000 magazines, not to mention proliferating blogs. In the most profitable and fast-growing segments, such as financial newswires, Xinhua has essentially been left in the dust.

But why muscle in now? Perhaps Beijing's political elite feel threatened . Freedom of information is unsettling to any authoritarian state. In recent years Beijing has alternatively creaked opened, then slammed shut, the television industry and lifestyle magazines. In recent months, the Communist government has also floated new rules restricting reporting of natural disasters and riots; increased oversight of local television broadcasters; convicted New York Times news assistant Zhao Yan and Singapore's Straits Times reporter Ching Cheong, and so on.

Xinhua is the Communist Party's mouthpiece, a symbol of what China really is. The reformers among Beijing's elites need to explain to their colleagues that returning to old habits of censorship won't protect their future.

No More Chinese Whispers (WSJ)

By James McGregor

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

It took an undiplomatic Chinese diplomat to tell China and America what we both need to hear: "It is high time to shut up!"

In a mid-August BBC interview Sha Zukang, China's ambassador to the U.N. in Geneva, used those words to tell American politicians to stifle complaints about Beijing's rapidly growing military budget. He noted that defense spending in China, with a population five times larger than the U.S., is a small fraction of the American military budget, which accounts for nearly 50% of global arms spending. "It is the U.S.'s sovereign right to do whatever they deem good for them," Mr. Sha said. "But don't tell us what is good for China." As Mr. Sha's comments indicate, after 25 years of economic reforms and more than a decade of nearly 10% annual growth, Beijing is weary of and angry about America's constant criticism. The Communist Party leadership is turning this hectoring to its advantage at home, where the leaders understand that, while in the age of the Internet they can't stop information from coming in, they can shape how the people think about what they learn from abroad.

Since the early '90s, the Chinese leadership has been teaching its people that China is re-emerging as a benevolent great power while America is determined to hold China back. School textbooks portray the U.S. as a hegemonic power seeking world domination, and rank us equal to terrorism as a threat to world peace and stability. The state media echoes that message, depicting American advocacy of democracy, press freedom and individual rights in China as a cynical plot to destabilize the country.

Their efforts are effective. A March 2006 opinion survey by the Global Times, a Chinese newspaper, showed that 59% of city-dwellers believe the U.S. seeks to contain China. The 2005 Pew Global Attitudes Project survey showed that only 42% of Chinese view the U.S. favorably. A 2003 survey by Duke University of hundreds of Chinese cities and rural counties indicated that the more educated people are, the more likely they are to hold negative views of the U.S. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0061928

My personal experiences after 15 years in Beijing reflect those results, even among Chinese who studied in the U.S. At a lunch I hosted to bring Henry Kissinger together with young Chinese entrepreneurs, he looked around the table and asked: "Now that we have such impressive economic progress in China when and how do you envision democracy developing?" They looked at him, aghast. Finally, one answered for the group: "Do we want to destroy all the progress China has made?"

When the Chinese look at America, they see a media-driven political system with election campaigns featuring crass manipulation of wedge issues that divide the population, while failing to focus on America's real problems. When they look at their own system they see a political strategy that attempts to hold the people together as tightly as possible for as long as possible -- albeit by brutalizing those who get in the way -- to make the necessary wrenching changes China must go through to prosper.

The Chinese people want the rule of law and fairness. But they also want a government that solves problems and focuses on progress. The many vainglorious and venal local Communist Party cadres are roundly detested. But Chinese who experienced the chaos of the Cultural Revolution also believe that America must be purposely seeking to destabilize China. Surely the U.S. isn't so naïve as to think instant democracy would make China a better place?

Half a world away, our sensationalist broadcast media is equally adept at demonizing China for the American populace. When CNN's Lou Dobbs discovered that ranting generates ratings, he quit asking CEOs thoughtful questions about China and now focuses on flogging it for stealing jobs and unfairly threatening U.S. economic preeminence. Bill O'Reilly and his infotainment-obsessed brethren at Fox stir up a similar stew of angry anti-Chinese cornpone. And neither network has any trouble finding like-minded and uninformed talking heads from the Congress eager to obscure their own leadership and policy failings by laying America's economic insecurities and difficulties at China's doorstep. During a book tour that took me to many American broadcast outlets in the past year the producers invariably asked: "Are you our anti-China or our pro-China guest?" They were baffled when I answered that I was the "let's-try-to-understand-China guest." Our TV screens may be in color, but discussions of China are exclusively in black and white.

The rest of the world doesn't share our fear and loathing of China. For the past 15 years, its diplomats have undertaken a very effective charm offensive to build a positive image abroad. People-to-people contacts abound, with Chinese students filling universities around the globe. Outbound Chinese tourists now outnumber those from Japan. China's slogan for dealing with its neighbors is: mulin, anlin, fulin, which translates as: be friendly, make them feel secure and help make them rich. It works. A 2004 BBC poll of 23,000 people in 22 countries showed that 48% considered China a positive global influence -- 10 points higher than the U.S. Moreover, the survey showed that 58% of the respondents ages 18-to-29 had a positive view of China.

So what should an insecure and out-of-sorts superpower and a paranoid and increasingly pugnacious aspiring superpower do to avoid a collision? First, do as Ambassador Sha requests: "Shut up!" Second, both sides need to designate statesmen with the stature, credibility, influence and wisdom to shape public opinion and bring a halt to the systematic demonizing of one another. From America's side, I nominate Hank Paulson, the Treasury secretary. He is well-regarded in China and well-informed as a result of making some 70 trips there during his Goldman Sachs days. His business background is a huge plus. After two decades of on-the-ground experience investing billions of dollars and employing millions of people in China, the U.S. business community is far ahead of politicians in understanding the Chinese government and people.

Mr. Paulson also has a ripe opportunity. Both President Bush and Condoleezza Rice are too bogged down in the Middle East, and ideologically uncomfortable with China, to do more than occasionally trim the weeds of the U.S.-China relationship. While Mr. Paulson comes to his new office too late to become Mr. Bush's Bob Rubin, he does have three years to set himself up to be the next Kissinger for China. The business community, both governments and the media will listen to him if he is forceful and forthright.

It will be easier for Mr. Paulson to influence China than many think. Behind the bluster, the Chinese leadership under President Hu Jintao is uncertain and searching for where to take the country as it becomes an integrated part of the global community for the first time. China doesn't really know what it wants to be next. It just knows that it doesn't want to be what it used to be: a feudal country that foreigners could carve up like a ripe melon, eventually becoming a dysfunctional civilization that a messianic leader could bring to the edge of social and economic insanity. With WTO membership, China's doors are now permanently open. Foreigners are part of the Chinese business and social fabric and a restive Chinese population is increasingly demanding an accountable and honest government. Chinese leaders understand that there is a mismatch between their economic and political systems that needs to be aligned, but they aren't sure how to do it.

The current danger is that Chinese leaders will believe their own baloney, that America's main goal is to keep China poor and weak, and base their future course on that premise. The truth is, some in America have that agenda. But another truth is, we couldn't do it even if we wanted to.

We can't afford to let the ignorant and insular in both China and America teach, tease and taunt our two nations into an unnecessary and potentially cataclysmic collision. Mr. Paulson is 60 years old, wealthy as hell, and intrigued by China. What else does he have to do for the next couple of decades?

Uruguay At Center Of Lively U.S.-Venezuela Chess Game (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, September 12, 2006

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay — Long taken for granted by its much larger neighbors, Uruguay suddenly finds itself one of the main fronts in the struggle between the United States and Venezuela for dominance in South America. The Bush administration and President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela are jockeying for position here, each trying to undercut the other by winning over Uruguay's left-wing government.

Washington is offering a free-trade agreement that would pull Uruguay into the United States' orbit and weaken Mercosur, the regional trade group to which Uruguay and Venezuela belong. Mr. Chávez has countered with attention-getting investments, subsidized oil, acts of charity and a growing alliance with left-wing factions of the ruling Broad Front.

Pablo da Silveira, a professor of political philosophy at Catholic University of Uruguay and a political commentator, likens what is happening to "a geopolitical chess game, in which Venezuela is playing the black pieces, in other words, oil" in an effort to gain influence. In this small, strategically situated place, he added, "Chávez and the United States are seeking the same thing, and for the same reason: to make Uruguay a test case" for their widely varying visions of the region.

Mr. Chávez, for example, has pledged to invest an estimated $500 million in an oil refinery here and has invited the Uruguayan state oil company to join its Venezuelan counterpart in exploration projects. As it has done in Cuba and the Caribbean, Venezuela is supplying petroleum products at a discount, and Mr. Chávez has promised that a gas pipeline he wants to build from Caracas to Buenos Aires will pass through here.

Venezuela has also put up money that allows some unprofitable ventures in Uruguay that employ relatively large numbers of people — like tire, glass and sugar plants — to stay in business. Most recently, the Chávez government has offered support for an ailing government financial cooperative that makes small loans to people and small businesses that normally do not qualify for bank loans.

"It doesn't cost Chávez a lot of money, but it generates a lot of good will," said Danilo Arbilla, a former editor in chief at the weekly magazine Búsqueda. "That way, when he comes here, he's solved people's problems, and they will go out for him."

Not to be outdone, the United States has countered with a proposal to build a medical and dental clinic near a working-class area of Montevideo. Left-wing groups aligned with Mr. Chávez maintain that the offer is really a plot by the Pentagon to establish a military base in Uruguay.

The Bush administration's main thrust, however, is its offer of a free-trade accord that would allow Uruguay to increase exports of meat, leather, cheese and other products to the United States.

Uruguay's population and economy are small, with barely three million people and total trade with the United States amounting to slightly more than $1 billion last year. But the country is a member of the Mercosur customs union, which includes Brazil and Argentina, and a free-trade agreement with the United States would weaken the group and put pressure on Uruguay's two big neighbors to negotiate bilateral accords with Washington.

Uruguay's relations with Argentina and Brazil have been tense recently. Argentina is trying to block work by a Finnish-Swedish consortium and a Spanish company on two cellulose plants, the largest foreign investment in Uruguay's history.

Brazil declined Uruguay's request to mediate the dispute — Argentina says the plants violate a border treaty — which has raised what Uruguayans consider unreasonable barriers to trade and torpedoed the candidacy of an Uruguayan, Carlos Pérez del Castillo, to be director of the World Trade Organization.

Early this year, Tabaré Vázquez, Uruguay's first Socialist president, told a radio station here that "Mercosur has become more a problem than a solution." But in an interview in late August, he said his country had no intention of leaving the group, but wanted instead "more and better Mercosur," without "giving up our right to open ourselves to the rest of the world."

Mr. Vázquez was reluctant, though, to say explicitly that he favored a free-trade agreement with the United States. Brazil and Argentina have suggested at various times that such an accord with the United States would be incompatible with membership in Mercosur and could be grounds for expulsion.

"Both countries want to improve their commercial exchanges with each other, and we have agreed that paths exists that allow us to achieve that objective," he said, referring to the United States and Uruguay. "We've set a methodology and a timetable," he added, a reference to the fact that President Bush will lose his authority to negotiate "fast track" trade agreements

June 30, 2007, unless Congress renews it. Though the United States has already signed an investment treaty with Uruguay, Washington initially showed little interest in a free-trade accord. Two Bush administration officials had all but ruled out the idea before Mr. Bush announced, during a visit by Mr. Vázquez to the White House in May, that he favored "extending our commercial relations" and suggested that talks begin here as soon as possible.

Mr. Bush made his offer as Venezuela was preparing to join the Mercosur group, which was founded in 1991 and is based here. Venezuela was formally accepted into the group in July, and Mr. Chávez's public statements have made it clear that he would like to transform Mercosur into more of a political alliance with an anti-American tint.

But Mr. Chávez may have overplayed his hand by suggesting the creation of a NATO-like alliance and a common Mercosur army. That proposal was not well received in the four original member countries, Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay, all of which endured military dictatorships in the 1970's that committed major rights violations, and Mr. Vázquez said in the interview that the idea did not interest him.

Within Mr. Vázquez's governing coalition, though, left-wing groups close to Mr. Chávez and his "Bolivarian Revolution" to raise living standards for the poor have been working to undermine Mr. Vázquez's flirtation with Washington. Montevideo is awash in graffiti that emphatically proclaim "No F.T.A. with the Yankees!" and an "anti-imperialist forum" held here late in August called for closer ties with Venezuela.

At a 10-hour televised congressional hearing here in late August, those differences were on display.

Uruguay's finance minister, Danilo Astori, argued for an accord with Washington. Its foreign minister, Reinaldo Gargano, made the case for Venezuela: a 314 percent increase in trade in the first half of this year, more than a score of cooperation accords signed in the last 18 months and the strengthening of what he called "South-South relations."

But "the Chávez option is only interesting if he can compensate what we lose in trade opportunities each year by being inside Mercosur," an official, speaking on condition of anonymity because Mr. Vázquez has said only he is authorized to speak on the subject. "But his internal situation won't let him spend that kind of money year after year. He can afford millions, but not billions."

The U.S.-Korea Tie: Myth And Reality (WP)

By Daniel Sneider

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The U.S. visit this week by South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun offers yet another opportunity to bemoan the crisis of confidence in our alliance. Anti-American views, particularly among the young, remain widespread in South Korea. On an official level, there are strains over the role of U.S. troops based in Korea and a stark divergence in approaches toward North Korea.

This portrait of a troubled alliance is often contrasted with a supposed golden age in U.S.-Korean relations during the Cold War. But that view obscures a history of sharp disagreement between the two allies. It is a mythical past that stands in the way of repairing our alliance today. In reality, Korean nationalism and American strategic policy goals have often clashed. Differences over North Korea have arisen repeatedly. And anti-Americanism has been a feature of Korean life for decades.

This was true from the earliest postwar days, in a relationship born out of a fateful and poorly considered decision to divide Korea, after decades of Japanese colonial rule, into American and Soviet zones of occupation. Syngman Rhee, South Korea's first leader, was often at odds with his American backers. Washington feared Rhee would provoke a war with the communist North, even after the end of the Korean War.

Relations with Park Chung Hee, who came to power in a military coup in 1961, were even thornier. Park was a fierce Korean nationalist and, according to a close former aide, uncomfortable with Americans. The two countries collided over North Korea policy, economic goals, human rights and democracy.

In the 1970s, South Koreans developed deep doubts about the durability of the alliance, an uneasiness fed by the Vietnam debacle and the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Korea. Park defied U.S. pressure in declaring martial law in 1972, junking the constitution and jailing leading opposition figures. He launched a secret campaign of influence-peddling and bribery of American congressmen to counter U.S. criticism of his policies.

While Park feared abandonment by the United States, North Korea's Kim Il Sung worried that China, after developing ties to Washington, might sell him out. Thus Park, even though he had been the victim of two assassination attempts by North Korea, reached out to Pyongyang. During high-level talks in 1972, there was a remarkable shared belief that the major powers were the obstacle to Korean reunification.

The most alarming sign of an alliance in crisis was Park's dangerous decision to develop nuclear weapons, made in secret in 1971 after Richard Nixon's withdrawal of one of the two American infantry divisions. According to my research, American officials became alarmed over the seriousness of this effort when a young CIA agent provided evidence of a crude design for a nuclear warhead.

DOJ_NMG_0061931

In the spring of 1975, my father, the late ambassador Richard Sneider, sent a top-secret cable to Washington calling for an urgent review of the U.S.-South Korean alliance. Korea was "no longer a client state," he wrote, but was "well on its way to middle power status with ambitions for full self-reliance including its own nuclear potential."

Sneider recommended creation of a new partnership, one more akin to our alliances with NATO or Japan. He also pushed for quiet but tough diplomacy to dissuade Park from heading down the nuclear road. That campaign succeeded finally, but not before my father warned Park that the entire security alliance was jeopardized.

Park was assassinated in 1979 by his own intelligence chief, who claimed to have acted at American instigation. The charge was false, but it remains widely believed in Korea. The perilous state of our alliance reached a peak with the Kwangju uprising against military rule the following year, when hundreds of Koreans were killed by troops deployed with the alleged acquiescence of the United States.

Dispelling the myth of the previous golden era in U.S.-Korean relations does not mean that our relations lacked a foundation of shared interest or that the difficulties we face today are not serious. The gap over how to handle the threat from the North is certainly wider and more evident than in the past. And the democratization of South Korea makes our differences visible and harder to manage.

As policymakers from both countries meet this week, they need to take a deep breath and remember that our alliance survived tremendous stresses in the past. The task before us is not to focus on our divergence but to pick up the challenge left unmet 30 years ago -- to define the basis for a long-term relationship that is durable and reciprocal and that finally sheds the shackles of dependency.

The writer, a former foreign correspondent, is associate director for research at Stanford's Shorenstein Asia-Pacific Research Center. He is working on a diplomatic history of the American alliances with South Korea and Japan during the Cold War.

A Sensitive Seoul Isn't Always A Good Thing (WSJ)

By Mary Kissel

The Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2006

SEOUL -- "Frustrating!" Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, said of his job, jovially echoing my own assessment at a recent, soju-soaked dinner here. "Frustrating, how?" I probe. There are plenty of foreign-policy sores: a growing rift with the U.S., China's expanding influence on the peninsula, and the prospect of a North Korean nuclear test. The foreign minister, a genteel man who's the leading candidate to succeed Kofi Annan at the United Nations, shrugs and laughs heartily; diplomatically, his tongue is tied.

"Fearful" might be a more frank characterization of South Korea's foreign policy. Not fearful that the North will attack the South -- President Roh Moo Hyun's government won't publicly acknowledge that as a possibility. Rather, Seoul's foreign policy is based on a deep-seated fear of the North's collapse and the prospect of China's military involvement in the ensuing turmoil. That's pushed the Roh administration to pursue an agenda whose chief goal is maintaining the status quo in the totalitarian North, where 23 million fellow Koreans eke out a rude existence in the world's most brutal regime. This foreign policy is based on an increasingly twisted rationale for appeasement of Kim Jong Il -- and is accompanied by a slow ideological drift away from the U.S., the nation which has kept the peninsula secure over the past 50-odd years.

The U.S.-South Korea alliance has proved a bedrock of security for North Asia's democracies, including Japan. Until Mr. Roh won in 2002, South Korean presidents -- even his immediate predecessor, "sunshine" advocate Kim Dae Jung -- understood why they needed the U.S. shield. Without it, Seoul would be privy to the whims of China -- which historically has treated the peninsula as an appendage -- or Pyongyang, which is tacitly backed by Beijing.

But Mr. Roh's administration just doesn't see it that way. Mr. Ban, picking at the noodles, fish and beef arrayed before us at dinner, discusses how to construct a "harmonious relationship" with the North that's based on building "mutual trust." On a swing through Europe last week, his boss, Mr. Roh, claimed that the North's recent missile launches were "aimed at achieving political purposes rather than posing military threats." Given that nearly 30,000 U.S. troops are stationed in South Korea, that kind of talk doesn't sit well in Washington.

Could Seoul and Washington be sliding toward an "amicable divorce," as some Korea-watchers are terming it? Under this view, this week's White House summit between Mr. Roh and President Bush is marriage counseling. Expectations are low, as prickly agenda items are plentiful: the timing of the transfer of wartime Korean troop control to Seoul (an idea that the Pentagon has almost gleefully embraced); increasingly frayed Seoul-Tokyo relations; shaky negotiations for a South Korea-U.S. free trade agreement; and Mr. Roh's re-establishment of emergency food aid, along with verbal niceties for Kim Jong Il.

Mr. Ban sometimes sounds like he's in denial. He insists that the U.S.-Korea relationship is fine, and says he's "hugely troubled" by the perception that anything's amiss between Seoul and Washington. South Korea, he points out, cooperates with the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which aims to stem the trade of WMD. (The South hasn't signed up formally, however, because it's afraid of upsetting the North.) South Korea, like the U.S., claims it wants better human rights in North Korea. But it won't sign a U.N. resolution condemning the North's brutal repression of its citizens -- again, for fear of upsetting Pyongyang. Like the U.S., the South wants to see a unified, democratic Korean peninsula, which would imply regime change. But again, Mr. Ban could never say so outright because it would -- you guessed it -- offend the North.

Outside the government, ties between the two nations remain strong. The world's biggest and 10th-biggest economies are broadly and deeply linked. Cultural exchanges, including the more than 80,000 students who study in the U.S. every year, are rock solid. The U.S. Embassy in Seoul issues more visas daily than any other American embassy in the world.

So from where does this fear swilling around Seoul originate? For a start, the demilitarized zone is a mere 40 minutes' drive outside of Seoul, and over time, that threat has psychologically neutered South Korea's policy makers. Missile defense isn't an option, Mr. Ban points out, as defensive measures couldn't be launched fast enough to counter a concerted Northern offensive. And he stresses, somewhat incongruously for an economy larger than Russia's, that South Korea is still a "middle power." The U.S. alliance is important, that reasoning goes, because it's the only thing keeping the North checked. But this logic is at odds with his government's insistence that the North wouldn't threaten the South at all.

Any military option against the North is "out of consideration," Mr. Ban says emphatically. But what if Kim Jong Il's regime falls, and China installs its own dictator or exerts its own control? Mr. Ban insists that Seoul's goal is "unification," without a timeframe. But it would be awfully convenient to see Beijing impose a little order north of the border.

China might like that, too. It's certainly not in its interest to see a strong, democratic, unified Korean peninsula that's more closely aligned with the U.S. Beijing has already established strong political links with the North through energy and food donations. The Chinese are putting money into North Korean mining projects, infrastructure, tourism and trade. The six-party talks, Mr. Ban hints -- but doesn't say outright -- don't get anywhere because of Chinese intransigence.

For more than half a century, Pax Americana has ruled on the peninsula. But today, even South Korea's opposition Grand National Party, for all its hawkish rhetoric, doesn't really envision a military option for dealing with North Korea. It will take more than a frosty summit this week -- a further U.S. troop drawdown, perhaps? -- to stimulate some real fear among the Korean people about who's protecting their interests and ensuring their security. "I would be sensitive to term it [North Korea] as a threat," Mr. Ban said, at the start of our dinner together. Maybe that's the problem.

It's A Boy! (WP)

The Washington Post, September 12, 2006

The little prince lets Japan off the hook -- for now.

THE BIRTH of a child is always a joyous occasion, but the birth of a 5-pound, 10-ounce son to Japanese Prince Akishino and his wife, Princess Kiko, has been a cause for particular celebration there for a single reason: the baby's gender. The baby is the first boy to be born in the imperial household in 41 years, thereby allowing the country to sidestep, at least for now, an emotional national debate about whether to permit a female to ascend the Chrysanthemum Throne. As the conservative newspaper Sankei Shimbun exulted, "The birth of the little prince has completely erased the dark mood of Japanese worried about the nation's future."

Our best wishes to the family, but it's too bad the arrival of the little prince is letting the country and its archaic system of royal succession off the hook. The baby had hardly had his first diaper changed when politicians rushed to postpone consideration of a measure that would have allowed female succession; Crown Prince Naruhito and his wife, Princess Masako, have a 4-year-old daughter.

It's a bit odd to complain that the rules of any particular monarchy are outmoded; in this democratic age, the entire institution is anachronistic. Yet the Japanese emperor has evolved with the times: Once revered as a living god, the emperor renounced his divine status after World War II to become, as the Japanese constitution provides, "the symbol of the state and of the unity of the people." Symbols matter, and in a country whose institutions and society remain pervaded with sexism, a female emperor could hardly be a better one.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney, Rumsfeld Urge Americans To Persevere In War Against Terrorists. AFP (9/12, Mannion) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney called on Americans to stay united and persevere in an increasingly divisive war against terrorism five years after the September 11 attacks on the United States." Cheney "joined US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld at a memorial ceremony at the site where a hijacked American Airlines jet struck the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, killing 189 people, including the five Al-Qaeda hijackers." Said Cheney, "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power." Cheney and Rumsfeld, "key architects of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, alluded only indirectly to the bitter divisions that have opened since the attacks on New York and Washington. Both, however, sounded themes of national unity and determination in their speeches, and broadly defended the administration's performance."

PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/11, Ifill) reported, "At the White House this morning, Vice President Cheney and his wife, Lynne, were joined by former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher for a moment of silence. Later at the Pentagon, where 184 people died, a visibly moved vice resident spoke to victims' families." Cheney: "Surely men and women here and aboard flight 77 were in their last moments holding and comforting one another. And when we think of them, it will always be with a special feeling of empathy and sorrow. We will always understand the pain of their families. And our nation will forever look with reverence upon their place, this place where their lives ended. We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power. The war on terror has placed hard duties on our military and on the Department of Defense. You have done all our country has asked of you and more. And you know better than most that much hard work and sacrifice still lay ahead."

Fox News' Special Report (9/11, Goler) reported Cheney "defended the continuing response to the worth-ever attack on US soil." Cheney: "This nation has defeated tyrants and liberated death camps, raised the lamp of liberty to every captive land. We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power."

The AP (9/11) reports Cheney "says the fact that there has not been another attack on US soil shows 'we've done a pretty good job' of protecting the country against terrorists." At a memorial observance "near the site where an American Airlines plane slammed into the Pentagon five years ago, Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld walked side-by-side to the speaker's platform as somber music played. Rumsfeld's arm was in a sling; he is recovering from shoulder surgery. A moment of silence was observed at 9:37 a.m. EDT, the exact time the plane struck, killing 184 people." Also in attendance was "retired Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, who was vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff the day of the attack."

NYTimes Criticizes Cheney Statement On Iraq. The New York Times (9/12, 1.21M) editorializes, "It's hard to figure out how to build consensus when the men in charge embrace a series of myths. Vice President Dick Cheney suggested last weekend that the White House is even more delusional than Mr. Bush's rhetoric suggests. The vice president volunteered to NBC's Tim Russert that not only was the Iraq invasion the right thing to do, 'if we had it to do over again, we'd do exactly the same thing.' It is a breathtaking thought." The Times adds, "If we could return to Sept. 12, 2001, knowing all we have seen since, Mr. Cheney and the president would march right out and 'do exactly the same thing' all over again. It will be hard to hear the phrase 'lessons of Sept. 11' again without contemplating that statement."

Dionne Says Cheney "Impatient With Democracy." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/12, A23, 748K), "Perhaps Vice President Cheney should quit his current job and work within a political system more to his liking, the kind in which those in charge can protect national security by telling everyone what not to say and what not to think." Cheney "seemed terribly impatient with democracy Sunday on 'Meet the Press' when he suggested that those who oppose President Bush's Iraq policies are helping -- excuse me, validating -- the terrorists." Dionne adds, "If Cheney doesn't like 'the kind of debate that we've had in the United States,' is there any other 'kind,' short of a lock-step endorsement of all of Bush's choices, he'd endorse?"

New Jersey Prosecutors Assert Right To Phone Records. The AP (9/12, Defalco) reports, "New Jersey has the right to obtain information about a federal domestic surveillance program because that program is no longer a secret, the state argued in response to federal efforts to quash its investigation." The AP continues, "The Justice Department wants to throw 'an impenetrable cloak insulating the federal government's domestic surveillance activities from all judicial scrutiny,' acting New Jersey Attorney General Anne Milgram said in a statement Monday." The AP adds, "New Jersey prosecutors subpoenaed 10 phone companies in May because of suspicion that state consumer protection laws may have been violated if phone companies were turning over records to the National Security Agency. … The federal government sued the New Jersey attorney general's office in federal court June 14, claiming compliance with the state's subpoenas or even acknowledging the existence of such a program would threaten national security. … The state in its response, filed late Friday, argued: 'There is no secret for the state secret privilege to protect.' … The federal government considers the program vital to fighting terrorism, but critics say it unconstitutionally gathers private information. … Federal officials have objected to efforts by several states and civil liberties groups to investigate or shut down the NSA program. Most recently, it filed a lawsuit against a Connecticut state agency last week and against Maine utility regulators last month."

Hughes Questions Lack Of International Outrage At Terrorism. In a USA Today op-ed (9/12), Karen Hughes, Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs at the State Department, says, "Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, one essential ingredient is still lacking in our international response to terrorism: The concerted moral outrage of everyday citizens of every faith and country." Since 9/11, "hundreds of others have been torn from their families, murdered as terrorists targeted morning commuters in London, Madrid and India, wedding guests at a hotel in Jordan, children in school in Russia and lining up for candy in Iraq, tourists in Egypt and Bali, Indonesia. This is not right, or normal, or acceptable, and a much louder chorus of voices needs to join in condemning it." Our "challenge is to launch a new grassroots movement across all faiths and continents, a movement that clearly states that no grievance, no complaint, no matter how legitimate, can ever justify the targeting and killing of innocent civilians. A movement that commits to teach our children that life is precious, diversity should be celebrated, and hope can conquer hate."

Hughes was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/11) why the US image in the Arab world has plummeted in recent years despite the fact that "almost every single time the United States deploys troops around the world, it's designed to help a Muslim country or Muslim people, whether liberating Kuwait or in Kosovo or in Bosnia or in Somalia, Iraq, Afghanistan." Hughes said, "There are a couple of things. First of all, there's a lot of propaganda out there, a lot of it very negative about us. We don't hear the full story a lot of times."

In Video, Bin Laden Deputy Warns Of New Attacks. ABC World News (9/11, story 0,:10, Gibson) reported that Al Qaeda used the 9/11 anniversary "to make a series of new threats. Osama bin Laden's deputy Ayman Al-Zawahiri called on revenge on American and declared Persian Gulf countries would be al Qaeda's next targets."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/11, Blitzer) reported Ayman al-Zawahiri "is warning that US troops in Iraq and Afghanistan are quote, 'doomed.' Osama bin Laden's top deputy delivered those words in a sophisticated new video coinciding with this, the fifth anniversary of the September 11th attacks."

The AP (9/11, Keath) says the video of Ayman al-Zawahri "was one of three al-Qaida released for the anniversary, showing increasingly sophisticated techniques as the group tries to demonstrate that it remains a powerful, confident force five years into the US war on terror." One video "showed images of the planes striking the World Trade Center, lionizing the 19 suicide hijackers as men 'who changed history.' Another was a 91-minute documentary-style video in which Osama bin Laden is seen smiling and chatting with the planners of the Sept. 11 attacks in an Afghan mountain camp." Al-Zawahri "spoke in the third and longest video, warning Americans of more attacks to come. 'We have repeatedly warned you and offered a truce with you. Now we have all the legal and rational justification to continue to fight you until your power is destroyed or you give in and surrender,' he said. 'The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events.'" The Washington Times runs a similar AP story (9/12, Ganley).

The New York Times (9/12, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports Zawahri "criticized America's military support for Israel during the country's recent war with Hezbollah, and he called on the Muslim world 'to rush with everything at its disposal to the aid of its Muslim brothers in Lebanon and Gaza,' according to a full transcript of the video provided by the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups." Zawahri "said Al Qaeda would strike again in coming weeks, but he gave no indication of the type of targets or specific locations."

The Washington Post (9/12, A17, DeYoung, 748K) reports Zawahri's comments "reflected an ongoing al-Qaeda effort to position itself as the vanguard of the Palestinian fight against Israel and to capitalize on the outrage the conflict generates in the Muslim world." Zawahiri "claimed that US defeat in Iraq is near and that 'jihadi reinforcements' are closing in on Israel."

Former CIA Officers Say Al Qaeda Announcing Intentions To Target Saudi Arabia. CNN's The Situation Room (9/11, Todd) reported, "Former CIA officers say that al Qaeda with this message is also probably saying their intentions to target Saudi Arabia and other regimes in the Gulf region. How would they do that? Well, according to Gary Berntsen and other CIA officers we spoke to, they would likely use their operatives in Iraq and Afghanistan who are now part of the insurgencies in those countries. Many of them are Saudis. They say that they will take those operatives back to Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states once the US pulls out of Iraq and Afghanistan and they will use those operatives to target shipping, oil reserves, possibly even engage in assassination attempts of key leaders."

Bin Laden Said To Be In Pakistan. NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 3, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the "frustrating manhunt" for Osama bin Laden, focusing on the CIA's efforts to find him by tracking the delivery of the audio and video tapes that are his only known contact with the outside world. This strategy enabled the CIA in 2004 to capture "a mid-level al Qaeda figure, but no bin Laden" in a Pakistani village. NBC calls bin Laden "the number one target of the war on terror," adding "Recently the search has centered on Pakistan's Chitral Valley, home to Madrasahs that foment radicalism." The piece concludes by quoting National Counter Terrorism Center director Vice Admiral John Scott Redd (retired) as saying that despite bin Laden's continued evasion of US forces, "Our intelligence has gotten better, our operations have gotten better. So al Qaeda is -- we've basically set them back on their heels."

Hunter Military Tribunal Bill Similar To Bush Proposal. The AP (9/12, Flaherty) reports House Armed Forces Chairman Duncan Hunter "has drafted a bill largely mimicking an administration plan to create military commissions to prosecute terror suspects." Hunter will "propose on Wednesday that his panel approve a bill that would allow the exclusion of evidence to protect classified information. A floor vote is expected next week." The bill "puts Hunter, R-Calif., in line with the White House and Senate leadership, but at odds with his counterpart, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va. Warner and some of his colleagues have drafted a rival bill that would ensure defendants are allowed access to all evidence against them."

CQ (9/11, Donnelly) reports House Republicans "fell in line Monday behind President Bush's proposal for military tribunals to try terror suspects, further isolating a trio of Senate Armed Services Committee leaders who support legislation that would provide such suspects with greater legal protections." Rep. Duncan's bill "would permit the introduction of classified information unavailable to defendants, hearsay evidence and testimony given after coercive interrogation. Like the president's proposal, the House bill also would permit suspects to be excluded from their own trials and amend a law that guarantees suspects the protection of the Geneva Conventions."

Key Senate Republicans Make Concessions To Administration. The Washington Post (9/12, A17, Smith, 748K) reports the Bush Administration "has won concessions from key Senate Republicans in proposed legislation on standards for detainee treatment and the rules for military trials of terrorism suspects, although some disagreements persist between the lawmakers and the White House, Senate sources said yesterday." The disagreements "that remain involve whether suspects can be convicted with evidence they are never allowed to see, an approach favored by the administration but opposed by the Republican senators." The "two sides also still differ over the terms of a related amendment to the U.S. War Crimes Act that would limit the exposure of CIA officials and other civilian personnel to prosecution for abusive treatment of detainees, the sources said." But in a "sign that Congress is nonetheless preparing to act quickly to establish 'military commissions,' as the trials are known, and provide other legal relief sought by the administration, the Senate trio at odds with the White House circulated a revised bill yesterday containing their concessions." Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen.

Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) last week "had circulated a draft that diverged more sharply from the White House's version."

Graham Says Senate Won't Approve Restricting Terrorists' Access To Evidence. McClatchy (9/12, Rosen) reports Sen. Lindsey Graham "says he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them." The clause "would prohibit defense lawyers from sharing classified information with defendants they represent. He marked it with a red pen." Graham said, "That's the killer. I fell over when I read it." McClatchy adds Graham "said he supports 90 percent of the bill, which Bush sent to Congress on Wednesday. But 'I don't feel good about telling someone — no matter who they are — 'We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why.'"

US Courts Can't Stop Military From Transferring US Citizen To Iraqi Court. The New York Times/AP (9/12) reports government lawyers "said Monday that American courts had no authority to stop the military from transferring an American citizen to an Iraqi court to face charges that he supported terrorists and insurgents." Shawqi Omar, "a citizen of both Jordan and the United States who once served in the Minnesota National Guard, was captured in Iraq in 2004. He is being held at Camp Bucca, a prison in southern Iraq, where his family says he has not been charged or allowed to speak with a lawyer." His family "is demanding that Mr. Omar be brought before an American court, where prosecutors would have to show probable cause for detaining him and he could consult with a lawyer."

PATRIOT ACT:

Connecticut Librarians Speak Out About Patriot Act Gag Orders. The New Britain (CT) Herald (9/12, Capozzi) reports, "Public libraries in mid-sized Central Connecticut towns are not likely places for an FBI investigation involving a perceived threat to national security, but unbeknownst to their patrons and the majority of their staff, they were in the midst of one last summer." The Herald continues, "In late June 2005, Library Connection Inc., a non-profit consortium of 26 central Connecticut libraries, received a National Security letter from the FBI, involving a top-secret investigation of patron Internet usage. … Subsequently, four executive members of the consortium were placed under life-long gag orders, made possible through the Patriot Act, which does not require court evidence or oversight. Although the names of the John Does were to be kept secret by the government, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union found the government had failed to redact one mention of Director of Plainville Public Library Peter Chase's name and other identifying information from the legal documents. From the identifying information that was not omitted, it didn't take long until the national press had identified Chase and the other John Does." The Herald adds, "Soon, Chase was being bombarded with calls from newspapers all over the country and even in Japan and France. But even after all the media attention, the government would not allow the gag order to be lifted. … Through the ACLU, the four consortium members, Chase, George Christian, Library Connection Executive Director, Barbara Bailey, librarian at Glastonbury's Welles Turner Library and Janet Nocek, librarian at Portland Public Library, fought the gag order against Connecticut United States Attorney Kevin O'Connor under the alias John Doe. … Bridgeport Superior Court ruled the law was unconstitutional and the government appealed that decision, later withdrawing the appeal in May 2006, thus releasing the four librarians from the gag order."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Appeals For Unity, Calls War On Terror A "Struggle For Civilization." President Bush addressed the national from the Oval Office last night. The AP (9/12, Hunt) reports Bush said "the war against terrorism is 'the calling of our generation' and urged Americans to put aside differences and fight to victory." Bush also "staunchly defended the war in Iraq though he acknowledged that Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people." The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Fiore, Gerstenzang, 918K) says Bush sought "to justify the increasingly unpopular US military action in Iraq, which he called a battleground in the war against terrorism." The president also "said somberly that the United States was engaged in a 'struggle for civilization.'"

Summarizing the speech, CBS News (9/12, 1:40, Couric) reported the President "marveled at the heroism of 9/11 when he said ordinary citizens responded with extraordinary acts of courage. He also praised the American soldiers serving overseas, and again, explicitly linked the war in Iraq to a broader war on terror. He tried to rally the nation against a enemy he says is trying to create a radical Islamic empire, and he said this is the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century."

While the White House insisted the President's remarks on the war on terror were not meant to be political, most media commentators analyzed them from the perspective of the partisan clash over the upcoming midterm election. On CBS News (9/12, 1:15), Jim Axelrod said, "We were told it would be a non-political speech, where there would be no distinctions drawn between Democrats and Republicans, and then he delivered…a speech with stark differences in terms of the arguments made about handling the war on terror. I think what we're seeing here is probably the bridge to September 12th, which, of course, marks eight weeks until the mid-term elections, and clearly this speech moves from this sort of non-political unity display to the final two-month sprint for the mid-term elections." Also on CBS News (9/12, 1:40), Bob Schieffer said after the speech, "We had almost 3,000 people who died since 9/11…but that sacrifice has been made by a very small segment of our society because we no longer have a draft army. … I think it is very difficult to make the case that you're in a life-or-death situation without asking most of the people to sacrifice. I think that's the challenge that the President has tonight, but this is where he wants to frame the next election. He wants it to be about who can best fight the war on terror. And that was the case. He laid out his case tonight."

On NBC News (9/11), Tim Russert said, "I think the President noting Iraq and saying [that] although Saddam was not responsible for September 11th he was a 'clear threat and that Iraq will be an ally in the war on terror' is going to prompt many Democrats to say the President was the politician in chief tonight as well. There are only 56 days before the mid term elections."

On ABC' Prime Time Live (9/11), George Stephanopoulos said, "The chairman of the Republican National Committee says the key question in this election is: Do you believe we are at war? The President made that point tonight. America is at war. It is a war we will win. The President believes if the country is convinced of that, his party will limit its losses in November. He used the most powerful tool he has tonight to make the case, that Oval Office address." ABC (Gibson) added, "Indeed, that is the central issue in the election that is are coming up in two months."

Nina Easton said on Fox News (9/11), "There was soaring rhetoric, but…it was a political speech. There wasn't a direct attack on his political foes but there was a dwelling on Iraq. It's interesting he has not spoken about Iraq on a 9/11 anniversary except in election years, 2004 and now. Last year, by the way, he just did a moment of silence on 9/11. But this time he dwelled on that war. … So I thought his dwelling on Iraq was quite notable a couple months before an election."

Joe Scarborough said on MSNBC (9/11), "It is a campaign effort, obviously. And the President's problem is there remains linkage between his war on terror and the war in Iraq. Something the Administration wanted a few years back. But the lines that stick out here is when he says America didn't ask for this war and Saddam Hussein posed a great threat. Moral ambiguity and war didn't mix with others and it doesn't mix with this President now. Unless he can make that sell, that this was not a war of choice, then the President's words tonight will fall a deaf ears with Americans."

The New York Times (9/12, Rutenberg, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports, "Even by the standards of his latest round of speeches, Mr. Bush's language was particularly forceful, even ominous, with warnings of a radical Islamic network that was 'determined to bring death and suffering to our homes.'" The Times also says "Bush's address brought to a close a day when leaders of both parties put aside, at least for the moment, the acrimony that has characterized the national security debate since the brief period of national unity after the attacks. But as soon as the speech was over, the partisanship flared again."

Democrats, in fact, charged that White House had injected politics into the 9/11 anniversary. USA Today (9/12, A7, Jackson, 2.27M) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "told reporters earlier in the day that the speech would not be political," but political analysts "suggested that is an impossible task less than two months before Election Day." Sen. Charles Schumer, who heads the Democrats' Senate campaign committee, "called the speech 'disappointing.' He said, 'You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it.'"

The Washington Post (9/12, A1, Abramowitz, Fletcher, 748K) says Bush "melded one of the most unifying events in recent national experience -- the common horror and sadness of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon -- with one of the most polarizing, the war in Iraq." Democrats "said Bush politicized the Sept. 11 anniversary. 'The president should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning to commandeer the airwaves to give a speech that was designed not to unite the country and commemorate the fallen, but to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had 'nothing' to do with 9/11,' said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.)."

The Washington Times (9/12, Curl, 88K) also reports, "With midterm congressional elections less than two months away and Democrats charging that Mr. Bush is politicizing the fifth anniversary of September 11, the president urged unity and condemned partisan politics."

The New York Times (9/12, Sanger, 1.21M) says that "a speech that began as a commemoration of one of the most searing and painful moments in American history became something else. For much of his 17-minute address from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush in effect acknowledged that his political standing and the success of his avowed mission to make the world safe from Islamic terrorism now rests on victory in Iraq, a mission his critics say was a deadly detour from the task he set out five years ago." Bush's "aides acknowledged beforehand that it would not be easy. The country Mr. Bush faced on Monday was very different from the shocked, angry but unified nation he addressed from the same chair 1,826 days before. Iraq and its aftermath had changed everything, dividing Americans who five years ago had largely unified around Mr. Bush's strategy, cutting his approval ratings in half and leaving in its wake questions about whether the president had made an ugly confrontation with Islamic extremists worse."

The Washington Post (9/12, A17, Balz, Abramowitz, 748K) says "falsely optimistic predictions of progress have undermined the administration's credibility. A majority of Americans question fundamental elements of the president's argument, including his contention that Iraq is the central front in the campaign against terrorism. Cumulatively, it leaves decidedly uncertain whether this week's flood of rhetoric and remembrance can alter Bush's perilous circumstances -- at a critical moment for the future of the Iraq mission and the president's own domestic standing 56 days before the midterm elections."

There was little consensus on the speech among commentators last night – not even on whether the President's rhetoric was poetic or nor. Tom Brokaw said on MSNBC (9/11), "I was surprised that there was no poetry in it. And that he didn't take us to a different place in terms of when he wants to go next. This is the kind of speech he could have given three years ago. The American public has been through a lot in five years, and with all due respect to the President, they'll be measuring his rhetoric versus the reality they see almost every day in what they see in the newspapers and on television." Meanwhile, Morton Kondracke said on Fox News (9/11), however, said, "There was a lot of soaring rhetoric in this speech. It was not quite Churchilian, but on the cusp."

Charles Krauthammer said on Fox News (9/11), "It was a sober address. It wasn't soaring or poetic. Sobering that befits a country in a difficult war. I was struck by how political it was." Krauthammer added that Bush "planted a flag on policy and said, 'Here I stand.'"

Fred Barnes said on Fox News (9/11), "This is the fifth speech in a series of speeches that the President has given on the war on terror over the last, well, since late August. This is sort of the capstone, the summing up and the President did a good job on it. I think most Americans probably didn't hear the first four and we all saw them and read them and so on. He said, 'Look, this war on terror, including Iraq is going to shape the future of the 21st century that we are on offense against terrorists and we need to stay on offense and the result can be this new Middle East which will not be the seed bed of terrorism the way it's been over the last 20, 30 years.' And by doing, that I thought he did what he needed to do."

On CBS News (9/12, 1:15), anchor Katie Couric interviewed presidential historian Douglas Brinkley, who said, "It was the Bush doctrine in another disguise. If we smell a threat out there somewhere in the world, we have to go after them. He made it very clear he was sticking to his guns, I was right to bring down Saddam Hussein, and the very fact he is invoking this on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks shows you he does see a connection between Iraq and 9/11 and that is one of the things that is debated. And he said you're wrong about this, we had to get rid of the guy, and he was a threat. He may not have been responsible for 9/11, but he would have been responsible for future 9/11s."

John Tierney also addresses Bush's rhetoric in his New York Times column (9/12). He writes, "Somewhere, Osama bin Laden must be smiling. Or at least he will be whenever his couriers deliver the next batch of press clippings. Once again he has beaten America at an American game: public relations. … Last night, President Bush paid him homage by quoting his warning that America will face 'defeat and disgrace forever' it if loses in Iraq. Bush himself called the war on terror a 'struggle for civilization,' and said it was essential to 'maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations.'" Tierney adds, "It was just the kind of apocalyptic language favored by bin Laden, except that, for all his delusions, he might realize that American civilization is not really in jeopardy. Americans can try to copy him, but they don't understand his rhetorical technique."

Similarly, in his Washington Post column (9/12, A23), Richard Cohen says Osama bin Laden "laughs, the madman does, whenever George Bush says, as he has over and over, that America is 'winning this war on terror.' Bin Laden knows better. He has already won." From "bin Laden's standpoint, this has been a glorious victory, made possible, it has to be said, by the totally unforeseen incompetence of the Bush administration. It was so intent on going to war in Iraq that it would not finish the job in Afghanistan. So, to bin Laden's absolute amazement -- I am guessing here -- the United States took on his enemy, the secular and ungodly Saddam Hussein, whom bin Laden himself would gladly have murdered. It has to be a wonderful thing when your enemy vanquishes your enemy."

In Bellwether District, Voters Seen As Skeptical Of Bush's Terrorism Speeches. The New York Times (9/12, Hulse, 1.21M) reports on Colorado's 7th Congressional district, a suburban Denver district that is considered a bellwether in the battle for control of the House. The Times reports that "interviews over the last three days here found Republicans, Democrats and independents all expressing degrees of skepticism about Mr. Bush's motives in delivering a set of high-profile speeches on terrorism and the war in Iraq two months before Election Day. While it is too early to know whether the White House will succeed in winning over enough voters to make a difference in what is shaping up as a tight race, the interviews suggested that Mr. Bush's newest efforts to cast his party as better suited than Democrats to defend the country had yet to overcome concern and anger among many voters about Iraq and a more generalized sense of discontent with the administration." Even "strong Bush supporters said they doubted the presidential drumbeat on terrorism would alter the political landscape here."

Bush Feels He Bested TV Anchors In Interviews. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/11) reported President Bush is "described as very pleased with his performances in a spate of high-profile TV interviews that he granted in the past couple of weeks. Specifically, Bush believes he got the best of his encounters with anchors Brian Williams, Katie Couric, Charles Gibson, and Matt Lauer." White House insiders "say the President wasn't eager to do the interviews in the first place because he believed the anchors would try to embarrass him in order to burnish their credentials as tough interrogators and get higher ratings. Now that the interviews are over, the President believes he made his points smoothly and effectively, especially about the importance of winning the war in Iraq and the overall war on terrorism, and perhaps persuaded more Americans to support his policies in those areas. 'He's been very comfortable' with the interviews and will do more between now and the congressional elections November 7, says a senior White House official."

42% Of Americans Feel Safer Than Before 9/11. NBC Nightly News (9/11, lead story, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight, in a just released NBC News poll, 42% of Americans tell us they feel safer now than they did prior to September 11. 32% say it's about the same. 23% say they are less safe today."

45% Blame Bush Administration For 9/11 Attacks. William Schneider said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/11), "In June 2002, 32 percent of Americans blamed the Bush administration either a great deal or a moderate amount for the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. And, now, that number has gone up to 45 percent. More people are willing to criticize a president who is no longer as popular. But, also, congressional investigations uncovered damaging information, like the title of a daily intelligence briefing the President received a month before the attacks." Schneider added, "Forty-one percent of Americans say the Clinton Administration deserves a great deal or a moderate amount of blame for the 9/11 attacks. The older you are, the less likely you are to blame the Bush Administration, and the more likely you are to blame the Clinton administration. Americans under 30 are the 9/11 generation. Fifty-five of them blame the Bush administration for 9/11. Only 30 percent blame the Clinton administration. The 9/11 generation is likely to have less vivid memories of the 1990s, when many of them were children. Some of their criticism of President Bush may be driven by opposition to the war in Iraq. Americans under 30 are the least supportive of that war. Their generation is doing most of the fighting."

Giuliani "Shocked" US Has Not Been Attacked Again. Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/11) that it "shocks me that we haven't been attacked again, which I expected. If you would ask me this question the night of September 11, five years ago, I would have said to you and everybody else in America, particularly American law enforcement, 'We're going to get attacked. We better get ready for a number of attacks, you know, suicide bombings and other kinds of attacks.' So, I thank God that that's not the case and I expect we are going to get attacked again but I'm thankful that we got these five years."

Negroponte Touts Improved Cooperation Of US Intelligence Agencies. National Intelligence Director John Negroponte was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/11) if there is a "sense of esprit" about trying to get ahead of terrorists by a few hours and prevent an attack. Negroponte said, "I think it's enormous. I think you've seen evidence of that in the disruption of various plots that have taken place. You also see much better cooperation between the key agencies, the FBI, the CIA, the National Security Agency. They work as teams now. There is teamwork all the way down to the local level, both in our country and abroad, between these agencies. It's an integrated effort because it's not any one single intelligence methodology that is going to unravel, unearth these plots. It's usually a combination of human intelligence, on the one hand, and then technical intelligence of various kinds on the other. You've got to marry the two together and that's extremely important. And I believe that with the reforms that have taken place and with the lesson learned from 9/11, these agencies are much, much better. They're far, far ahead of where they were five years ago."

US Observes Fifth Anniversary Of 9/11 Attacks. The nation yesterday observed the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, with President and First Lady Laura Bush visiting the three sites of the terrorist attacks -- Ground Zero at the World Trade Center, Shanksville, Pennsylvania, and the Pentagon -- for commemorative events. The anniversary was the focus of the major media outlets, which reported on both the official ceremonies and private remembrances. Network newscasts all led with the story, which was also covered on the front pages of the major dailies, such as USA Today, the Washington Post, and New York Times, in multiple articles.

The network coverage was somber, and included many personal observations from the family members of 9/11 victims. ABC World News (9/11, lead story, 2:30, Harris) reported, "Under a brilliant blue sky with a striking resemblance to the one that morning five years ago, the family members of the can people that died at Ground Zero came back. At 8:46 the moment the first plane hit the north tower a moment of silence. President Bush and First Lady Laura Bush were at a fire station nearby." ABC World News (9/11, story 7, 3:10, Gibson) also ran a story on the children of 9/11.

CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Today President Bush sought to be both commander and comforter in chief as we all remember that day." CBS (Axelrod) added, "President Bush visited all three places, consoling families, laying wreaths, and sharing a moment of silence. The President made no public remarks today. Aides called it a wordless day, understanding perhaps that the power of 9/11 is in the images, kids holding pictures of dads and moms they lost, flowers piled high in the pools of remembrance." CBS Evening News (9/8, story 5, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported on the mentor of a boy who lost his father, a Port Authority policeman, on 9/11.

NBC Nightly News (9/11, lead story, 2:25, Taibbi, 9.87M) reported, "As Vice president Dick Cheney put it at the Pentagon, Americans took what happened on 9/11 personally and still do." Vice President Cheney: "And our nation will forever look with reverence upon the place where their lives ended." Tiabbi: "President Bush visited each of the attack sites and soon all you could see was flowers. All you could hear were the voices of those who still grieve." NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 2, 1:00, Fratangelo, 9.87M) also interviewed mourners at Ground Zero.

USA Today (9/12, Hampson, Jones, 2.27M) reports Americans "solemnly remembered and mourned Monday the lives lost five years ago in the worst terror attacks on the nation, a tragedy that President Bush said brought 'extraordinary acts of courage' and heroism from ordinary citizens." USA Today (9/12, Hampson, 2.27M) also says the anniversary "prompted Americans to measure the day's meaning through the words and tears of the victims' survivors." The "expressions of grief, longing and hope came amid public sentiment that the war on terror is far from over."

The Washington Post (9/12, A1, Powell, White, Vargas, 748K) reports in a front page story that "there was an aching familiarity to the rituals. In New York, family members recited 2,749 names, punctuated by violins and the wail of bagpipes, to the drawn and tearful faces of the families of the victims." Bush "and Vice President Cheney paid homage to the dead. And as during the past few weeks, they did not hesitate to try to draw a connection between the Sept. 11 attacks and the war in Iraq."

The Washington Post (9/12, A1, Ruane, 748K) reports, "Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, residents and visitors across the Washington region paused yesterday, away from the grand commemorations, to remember the milestone and take stock of all that has and has not changed in the half-decade since 2001." The Washington Post (9/12, B2, Smith, 748K) also profiled Colin Wolfe, a 14-year-old on 9/11 who volunteered for the Marines and was killed in Iraq on August 30. Yesterday, "family and friends gathered at Arlington National Cemetery to honor the slain Marine. His parents picked Sept. 11 for the burial, believing it to be a fitting tribute to a young man who gave his life for his country in Iraq."

The AP (9/12, Westfeldt, McClam) reports, "Clutching photos to their hearts and blowing kisses to the sky, tearful loved ones of Sept. 11 victims recited a 3 1/2-hour litany of the lost Monday, the names echoing across an expanse still largely barren five years after terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center." The "ritual has changed little since the first anniversary of the attacks, and in many ways the site has remained the same as well."

McClatchy (9/12, Boyd, Hutcheson) reports, "Across the land, Monday brought back memories of that awful morning five years ago: the crisp blue sky above Manhattan, the silver planes streaking into tall buildings, the flames, smoke, dust, horrified faces, people running, firefighters and police officers struggling, the fear, grief and death." The New York Times (9/12, McFadden, 1.21M) reports a "wounded but resilient America paused yesterday to remember the calamitous day when terrorist explosions rumbled like summer thunder and people fell from the sky." But if "there was a theme to this year's proceedings, it was honoring the dead while moving on with life."

The AP (9/12, Nephin) reports that in Shanksville, Pennsylvania, "hundreds of people…gathered Monday in a wind-swept field to remember Flight 93, the hijacked jetliner in which passengers tried to storm the cockpit on Sept. 11, 2001, to wrest control from terrorists shortly before the plane crashed in southwestern Pennsylvania." President Bush "laid a wreath at the crash site and privately greeted family members in a cold drizzle as they marked the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks."

The New York Times (9/12, Stanley, 1.21M) reports it is "painful, but not difficult, to memorialize Sept. 11 on television. There are so many images from that morning, so many ways to recreate its horror and mourn those who died."

New York Members, Administration At Odds Over Categorization Of 9/11 Victim As Non-Firefighter. The Hill (9/12, Bolton) reports New York Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) and Charles Schumer (D), and Rep. Pete King (R-N.Y.) "gathered with President Bush at St. Paul's Chapel in New York Sunday to commemorate the five-year anniversary of the 9-11 attacks, but behind the scenes they are struggling with his administration over the controversial death of one rescuer." Glenn Winuk, "whose first love in life was being a firefighter but who became a lawyer at Holland & Knight to earn a better living — did what would be natural to any first responder near the scene of a disaster: he rushed to it." Winuk died in the collapse of the South Tower, but "the Justice Department last week made public a ruling that Winuk was not eligible to be recognized as a firefighter having died in the line of duty despite his years of volunteer service." The Justice Department's decision "has denied Winuk's parents $250,000 in federal benefits," but Jay Winuk "said his family's fight is about much more than money."

FDNY Still Recovering. CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "No families suffered a greater loss on 9/11 than the family that is the New York City fire department. Fire fighters rushed into the burning towers as everyone else rushed out and 343 of them died that day. Five years later, those who were in charge of the recovery effort here at Ground Zero are still recovering themselves."

Makeshift Memorial Holds Unidentified Remains Of 9/11 Victims. ABC World News (9/11, story 6, 2:15, Gibson) reported, "There is here in New York, in Lower Manhattan, a tent set up that most people walking by not even notice. Indoor tennis courts, perhaps, urban campers, you might think. It's anything but. Its one of the saddest reminders of September 11th." ABC (Weir) added, "Beneath a noisy Manhattan highway, under this gleaming white tent, sit three containers, very big and very sacred. They hold almost 14,000 human remains, carefully preserved, but too small or damaged to name. There are pews nearby, a simple altar, precious space for the 1,151 families who were never given anything to bury."

Wreckage From WTC Stored At JFK. NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 5, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have a special look tonight at all the wreckage that was taken from Ground Zero. All of it sacred. And it's all awaiting a home, a permanent memorial. It's all being cared for in a hangar at New York's JFK Airport. They don't want us to show you the outside of the building but we can say this if you've flown in and out of Kennedy airport, you've taxied right by it. Tonight for the first time on network television, you will get to see what remains of that day. It's as if that day five years ago is now contained in this room. The violence is over and the heat has cooled, but it's all here. You can feel it, you can smell it. It's enough to make anyone angry and sad and spiritual all over again. It's an airline hangar as church."

9/11 Novel Praised For Exposing Distortions. In a USA Today book review (9/12), Deirdre Donahue says it "would be a shame if Jess Walter's novel The Zero were lost amid all these other 9/11 projects. The author of the unforgettable non-fiction book Ruby Ridge and the admired novel Citizen Vince, Walter uses 9/11 and the past five years as a launch pad to explore how bureaucrats and profit-hungry corporations have distorted a tragedy."

More Commentary. In the Wall Street Journal's "Global View" column (9/12), Bret Stephens says, "Here's a puzzle: Why is it so frequently the case that the people who have the most at stake in the battle against Islamic extremism and the most to lose when Islamism gains -- namely, liberals -- are typically the most reluctant to fight it?" Yet "after 9/11 at least a few old-time voices on the left -- Christopher Hitchens, Bruce Bawer, Paul Berman and Ron Rosenbaum, among others -- understood that what Islamism most threatened wasn't just America generally, but precisely the values that modern liberalism had done so much to promote and protect for the past 40 years: civil rights, gay rights, feminism, privacy rights, reproductive choice, sexual freedom, the right to worship as one chooses, the right not to worship at all." But "five years on, however, Messrs. Hitchens, Bawer et al. seem less like trendsetters and more like oddball dissenters from a left-liberal orthodoxy that finds less and less to like about the very idea of a war on Islamic extremism, never mind the war in Iraq."

In his Washington Post column (9/12, A23), Eugene Robinson says that by "far the most fateful post-Sept. 11 coinage is 'war on terrorism.' The phrase that has come to define our era is entirely suspect, except perhaps the 'on.'" Witness the "recent arrests of would-be airline bombers in London, or the fact that so many of the high-value terror suspects held until recently in secret CIA prisons were captured in Pakistan, an ostensible ally. We should call this police work what it is, although that might make it harder to ignore such principles as habeas corpus and due process."

New York City Attorneys Adjusting To Life After 9/11. The National Law Journal (9/12, Jones) reports, "In the five years since the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, attorney H. Taufiq Choudhury said that he has grown numb to the reminders he sees every day on his way to work in lower Manhattan. … 'I've gotten used to it,' he said. 'The feeling is not as sharp.'" The Journal continues, "An immigration lawyer, Choudhury initially relocated his solo practice from the 22nd floor of 1 World Trade Center to midtown Manhattan after the attacks. But today, his firm, which also endured the 1993 trade center bombing, is back in the downtown area. … There is a certain comfort for Choudhury in returning to lower Manhattan, he said, but his practice still suffers as a result of the events on Sept. 11, 2001. … 'It has changed for the worst,' he said." The Journal adds, 'Choudhury is just one of an estimated 14,000 New York lawyers -- more than 10 percent of all lawyers in the state -- whose practices were upended when the planes brought down the Twin Towers. The businesses of virtually every lawyer working below 14th Street in Manhattan were affected by the attacks. In the towers themselves, attorneys and support staffers at about 30 law firms lost their offices and, in some cases, their lives. … Five years later, some law firms have come back to the downtown area, but many others have opted to start over in areas less scarred."

FBI Agents Tout Post-9/11 Counter-Terrorism Initiatives. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/12, Louwagie, 398K) reports, "As he reflected on five years of fighting terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks, Minneapolis FBI special agent in charge Michael Tabman said Monday that a second local squad was created last year to focus on international terrorism groups." Tabman "said he wanted a second squad to increase intelligence-gathering and reach out to communities, building trust and cooperation so people feel free to come forward with information. The squad is one of several local changes that reflect new priorities in the FBI. 'We have gone from an investigative agency to a preventive agency,' Tabman said." He "credits the USA Patriot Act with giving the FBI and other agencies better tools to do their work," although "there's still a lot of oversight when decisions are made on intelligence gathering -- something the public still wants, he said." Tabman added, "We're not going to wipe out terrorism, just like we can't wipe out drugs or stop crime completely. Every day that we don't have a terrorist act, every day that citizens go home and feel confident we'll have a safe day the next day, we've won.'"

The AP (9/12) reports Tabman "says it's no accident that there's been no further terrorist attacks in the five years since 9-11." He "says that reflects the bureau's decision after the attacks to make preventing terrorism its top priority." At a media briefing yesterday, "Tabman rattled off statistics he says shows the bureau's emphasis. That includes almost 1500 new agents bureau-wide, 65 new anti-terror task forces nationwide between the FBI and local law enforcement agencies, and a shift from investigating crimes to preventing them."

International Reaction Mixed On Fifth Anniversary Of 9/11. The AP (9/12, Ganley) reports, "the nations of the world joined Monday in solemn remembrance of Sept. 11 — but for many, resentment of the United States flowed as readily as tears." Critics say Americans "have squandered the goodwill that prompted France's Le Monde newspaper to proclaim 'We are all Americans' that somber day after the attacks, and that the Iraq war and other U.S. policies have made the world less safe in the five years since." In Europe, "where Islamic terror has struck twice since 9/11, in the Madrid train bombings and the London transit attacks, the silent tributes were tinged with doubts and recriminations." Adding to "the global jitters, a senior al-Qaida leader issued a new warning." Ayman al-Zawahiri said, "You should worry about your presence in the (Persian) Gulf and the second place you should worry about is Israel."

Some Islamic Blogs Commemorate 9/11 Anniversary. In a New York Times op-ed (9/12), Bernard Haykel and Saud al-Sarhan report on the Islamic jihadi and al Qaeda-related blogs' commemoration of the 9/11 anniversary: "The Web sites affiliated with many of militant jihadism's top thinkers, including Abu Muhammad al-Maqdisi and Sulayman al-Alwan, remained silent. That shouldn't surprise us: the Salafi strain of Islam, to which most jihadis subscribe, prohibits commemorating anniversaries." But "perhaps more remarkable was the fact that this year, a number of Web sites affiliated with Al Qaeda did commemorate the day — no doubt because they knew Americans would." Some messages "yesterday were clearly meant for Western consumption, reminding the United States that Al Qaeda is still active and bent on future attacks, and even posting images overlaid with threats in English."

Rice Thanks Canadians For Help On 9/11. The AP (9/12, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday the generosity of Canadians who took in thousands of stranded American air passengers five years ago represents the best of human nature in the face of evil." Rice "commemorated the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terror attacks with a short visit to the closest US ally. She read a letter of thanks from President Bush to employees at Halifax's small airport who helped coordinate a huge impromptu aid effort."

House GOP, Democrats Deadlocked On Language Of 9/11 Resolution. The Hill (9/12, O'Connor) reports, "House Republicans and Democrats are locked in a standoff over the language of a resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001." Democratic leaders "want the GOP to remove any reference to legislation passed in response to the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon, which include the USA Patriot Act of 2001, the Homeland Security Act of 2002 and the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004." Republicans "argue that many of these accomplishments were listed in two of the previous four such annual resolutions." Democrats "requested that Republican leaders remove a long passage that refers to the bills signed by President Bush, according to a draft from Sept. 6 obtained by The Hill. GOP leaders refused, citing the two previous resolutions and a need for Congress to refer to its accomplishments following the attacks."

Roll Call (9/12, Davis, Yachnin) reports, "Deliberations over the annual anniversary resolution stalemated Monday, according to several House aides, with the GOP leadership now expected to bring the legislation to the floor Wednesday despite Democrats' unhappiness with the text of the measure. 'Negotiations have stopped,' said a GOP leadership aide, who confirmed Hastert's office had walked away from the negotiating table. 'We're going forward with it.'"

The New York Times (9/12, Zernike, Nagourney, 1.21M) runs a similar story titled "A Solemn, Sad Moment To Reflect, But Politics Also Surfaces." The Times says Republicans and Democrats are "squabbling over the wording of a Sept. 11 resolution in what aides to both parties acknowledged was, to no small extent, a bid to gain political advantage. And throughout the day, even as Democratic and Republican aides talked about efforts to avoid being seen as tarnishing the memory of the attacks with blatant political appeals, candidates and Congressional leaders were issuing statements reflecting political implications that Republicans and Democrats saw in the day's events." The Times also reports that "in election years -- 2002, 2004 and now 2006 -- the Republican-controlled House has included language heralding accomplishments in the war on terror. This time, the Republican version of the resolution applauded the reauthorization of the legislation known as the USA Patriot Act, as well as the tough immigration bill passed in the House."

The Washington Times (9/12, Bellantoni, 88K), meanwhile, reports under the headline "Lawmakers Unite Once Again Over 9/11" that "politicians gave a message of unity and determination yesterday." In "a rare bipartisan event," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "and Republican leaders joined Democratic leaders Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi and about 100 other lawmakers on the steps of the Capitol. The lawmakers recalled the evening of September 11 when many members of Congress gathered on the steps and sang 'God Bless America.'" The Times adds, "Republicans and Democrats came together for that moment in a spontaneous show of patriotism, members said yesterday as they enter what are sure to be the bitter last two months of the election season." The Washington Post (9/12, Weisman, Babington, 748K) also reports the story in a story titled "Whereas Congress Cannot Set Aside Politics."

McCain Says US Missed An Opportunity After 9/11. Sen. John McCain said on MSNBC's Hardball (9/11) that the US "passed up an opportunity after September 11th. I think we should have said, we're going to double the size of the Peace Corps, triple the size of Americorps, we're going to set up volunteer organizations all over America to ensure our security. We're going to give young people $18,000 in educational benefits for 18 months of military service, call Americans to serve. The country was united. We should have called them to serve, not just tell them to take a trip or go shopping."

Clinton Says US Is Safer, But Not Safe Enough. Sen. Hillary Clinton said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/11) that the US is safer since the 9/11 attacks, "but we're not safe enough. I think that we know that our borders and our ports and our mass transit and rail systems, our bridges, our tunnels, our chemical, nuclear plants are just not yet where they need to be and we're not following the recommendations of all the experts, including the 9/11 commission, that we distribute money here at home based on what the risk is. So my primary focus today, as I spent time with family members and, you know, reflected back the last five years, is whether we've done everything we know to do to protect our citizens here in New York and across America and I think, unfortunately, the answer is not yet."

Clinton was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/11) if the world is different since the 9/11 attacks. Clinton said, "I think it certainly is for me. It is for many Americans and the way that an event of such enormous importance sort of divides your life, pre-9/11 and post-9/11. And for thousands of people, life will never be the same. But I think it's also important that we maintain our values and our common sense about who we are as people and how we have to promote our interests and our concerns in the world, and how we have to make more friends and allies and not enemies, because if we're in for a long struggle, as we hear all the time -- and I don't doubt that, I think it is a struggle against an ideology that has religious overtones to it -- then we have got to be smart about how we're dealing with that."

Hamilton Angered By Kean's Role Advising ABC 9/11 Docu-Drama. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/12, A2), Dana Milbank says there have "been few political love stories as beautiful as that of Tom Kean and Lee Hamilton, the former chairman and vice chairman of the 9/11 commission." So it "packed even more punch when Hamilton, at the National Press Club luncheon, lectured his friend about the falsified Sept. 11 docudrama Kean helped ABC produce." Kean has "infuriated many a Democrat who saw him as a nonpartisan truth-teller. In his work on ABC's 'The Path to 9/11,' Kean has blessed what has been documented to be a collection of falsehoods -- a disproportionate number of which make the Clinton administration look bad."

The New York Times (9/12, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "Perhaps the entertainment industry will come up with a few lasting lessons from the outcry over ABC's 'dramatization' of the events leading up to the terrorist attacks on 9/11. One suggestion: when attempting to recreate real events on screen, you do not show real people doing things they never did." It was "especially disturbing" that Kean "was willing to lend his prestige to this ill-considered project. Mr. Kean served as a senior consultant to the miniseries and has repeatedly defended it in public, even as several Democratic members of the commission criticized its distortions."

Despite Volatility, Ammonium Nitrate Easily Attained. ABC World News (9/11, story 5, 3:00, Gibson) reported on President Bush's touting of government efforts to prevent terrorist attacks, continuing to examine the widespread availability of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, which "has been used around the world in devastating terror attacks from Istanbul, Turkey to Oklahoma City." In an "ABC News undercover investigation…with virtually no questions asked, we were able to make large buys in Virginia and North Carolina." ABC reports that New York Rep. Peter King (R) has worked to gain restriction on the sale of the substance, but says he has had to accept a "watered down" version of his legislation, owing to the efforts of American Farm Bureau lobbyists. ABC "assembled 1,000 pounds of ammonium nitrate. And undetected, moved it into a storage shed just a few miles from the White House."

Critics See Gaps In Aviation-Security Despite Billions Spent. The Washington Times (9/12, Hudson, 88K) reports that in spite of billions spent "to protect against future airplane hijackings, …critics say many changes made are haphazard and misguided and that serious security gaps remain in place five years after the September 11 terrorist attacks." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said in a speech at Georgetown University Friday that "the hardening of cockpit doors, 'thousands' of federal air marshals 'on aircraft protecting travelers every day all over the world' and 'armed flight deck officers authorized and trained to defend the cockpit'" had laid "a solid foundation for the future of our aviation-security efforts for the five years and the 10 years to come." However, "United Airlines is the only company that has installed steel cable barriers to prevent someone from charging the flight deck." Meanwhile, "Only a small fraction of 25,000 to 30,000 daily flights are protected by air marshals."

CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/11, Griffin) reported that "one of the biggest federal bureaucracies born out of 9/11," the TSA, "has repeatedly failed government security tests. … The Orlando Sentinel Newspaper reported this summer that, of 830 TSA screeners at this airport, 501 took a test in June, and could not recognize explosives or other banned material. That means 60 percent of the 830 failed." Later, Secretary Chertoff appeared on the show from Washington, and Zahn asked him about the "startling statistics" from Orlando. Chertoff began by "clearing up a couple of misconceptions," telling Zahn that "it is a fact that we do have a unified no-fly list and selectee list. And it is the case that everybody who gets on an airplane is run against that list. … It's also the case that that particular test, my understanding is, occurred when a group of new screeners were brought on board, and that the next month, the results became much better."

Former FBI Official Says Airliners Are Unguarded During Refueling. The Washington Times (9/12, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column that Dan Coleman, who was the FBI's top expert on Osama bin Laden, predicts that the next terror attack on Washington could be a "hijacked plane swooping down over the green grass of the National Mall, roaring over tourists' heads, and straight into the dome of the US Capitol. … Airliners are virtually unguarded while refueled on airport tarmacs, Mr. Coleman cites among other security weaknesses not yet fully addressed. In addition, transportation workers still aren't sufficiently screened, and while grandmothers in wheelchairs can't slide by X-ray scanners, terrorists can."

Lawmakers Support Liquid Ban Until Effective Screening Possible. USA Today (9/12, Frank, 2.27M) reports, "Lawmakers from both political parties say the month-old ban on carrying most liquids on airliners should remain until airport screeners and machines can detect explosives such as those that alleged terrorists planned to use to destroy US-bound planes in August." The TSA, meanwhile, "said last month that it was studying whether it can safely allow passengers to carry small amounts of liquids on airliners. … Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recently said that leaving the ban in place might keep security lines moving faster than a potentially confusing policy allowing small quantities of liquids."

Senate Panels Not In Complete Agreement On Port Security Bill. Roll Call (9/12, Pierce) reports for "all the talk of Senate committees skipping arm-in-arm down the path to stronger port security, the floor of the venerable chamber this week instead will feature its share of territorial disputes." Though the chairmen "of the three committees of jurisdiction — Commerce, Science and Transportation; Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs; and Finance — lauded the alleged compromise bill in floor speeches last week, a number of key agreements between the three, most notably how to fund the $835 million bill, have yet to be worked out. And the bill is in danger of being larded with myriad expensive transportation-related amendments." Despite the hurdles, "aides to both parties say they should be able to come up with some finished product by Thursday, before, perhaps, turning to an Amtrak authorization bill."

Passage Still Expected. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Simon, 918K) reports with "both parties jostling for the upper hand on national security ahead of November's midterm elections, a port security bill is headed for approval." The measure — "expected to pass the Senate this week — would, among other things, impose deadlines on background checks for port workers, expand a program to screen for 'dirty bombs' and authorize $400 million to help ports bolster anti-terrorism defenses. A good chunk of that money is likely to go to the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex."

WPost Urges Senate To Pass Port Security Bill. The Washington Post (9/12, A22, 748K) says in an editorial that the Port Security Improvement Act of 2006 "contains several common-sense proposals" and "two things distinguish this moderate legislation from the irresponsible rhetoric on port security that has marred debates on the subject for years. First, it does not call for 100 percent of containers arriving at U.S. ports to be individually inspected for all dangerous materials." Second, "while providing five years of steady funding for port security projects, the bill does not dedicate money for port security in perpetuity." With "those sensible checks in place, the Senate should pass this bill."

WSJournal Criticizes Prospect Of Partisan Retribution For CIA Agents. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) says in an editorial that if Jack Bauer of Fox's "24" program "worked at the CIA in real life today," he "would apparently be buying insurance in case the ACLU or John Kerry decided to sue or subpoena him for protecting America with too much vigor. The Washington Post reported yesterday that more CIA counterterrorism officers are signing up for private insurance that would pay for civil judgments and legal costs if they are sued or charged with a crime. These are the agents who interrogated Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, Abu Zubaydah and other jihadis, using what President Bush last week called methods that were legal but 'tough.' Those methods succeeded in breaking these men into divulging information that led to the arrest of other al Qaeda bigs, and to the foiling of plots that could have killed thousands." Though "the government pays the premiums for this kind of insurance, it is a sorry spectacle that these agents must now fear partisan retribution for having done precisely what the country asked them to do."

Abercrombie Criticizes Administration Gulf Coast Rebuilding Efforts. In an op-ed in the Hill (9/12), Rep. Neil Abercrombie writes that one year after Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans and Mississippi's Gulf Coast remain "a terrible, twisted portrait of lives and families and whole communities washed away; home by home, block by block, neighborhood by neighborhood. One year after President Bush viewed the destruction from 40-thousand feet as he flew back to Washington from his vacation; one year after he vowed—'We will do what it takes,' promises of timely federal assistance to help the people of the region rebuild are as empty as the endless square miles where homes and businesses once stood." Abercrombie calls for FEMA to "be restored to independence from the Department of Homeland Security, with a legislative mandate to rebuild now." He adds, "The Pentagon has just announced a new czar for infrastructure construction in Iraq. The American people should demand that the federal government's post-Katrina priorities reflect an equal and urgent commitment to the infrastructure of the US."

WAR NEWS:

Intelligence Report Paints Negative Picture Of Situation In Western Iraq. The New York Times (9/12, Gordon, 1.21M) picks up the story broken by the Washington Post yesterday, concerning Marine Col. Peter Devlin's grim intelligence assessment of the situation in Anbar Province: "The political and security situation in western Iraq is grim and will continue to deteriorate unless the region receives a major infusion of aid and a division is sent to reinforce the American troops operating there, according to the senior Marine intelligence officer in Iraq." The Times adds, "Military officials familiar with the document disclosed additional material and provided several quotations from the assessment."

Pentagon Takes Anbar Report "Very Seriously." The Washington Post (9/12, Tyson, 748K) reports, "The Pentagon is taking 'very seriously' a classified intelligence report concluding that the U.S. military has fought to a stalemate in Iraq's western Anbar province as political conditions also worsen in the 'epicenter' of the country's Sunni insurgency, a senior defense official said yesterday." Speaking to the House Government Reform Committee was Undersecretary for Policy Eric Edelman. Panel members Reps. Dennis Kucinich (D-OH) and Christopher Shays (R-CT) are quoted questioning Edelman or Rear Adm. William Sullivan about the classified Devlin report and about the length of the US presence in Iraq, respectively.

Sadr Opposes Iraq Division Plan. The Washington Post (9/12, Paley, Sarhan, 748K) reports, "Moqtada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite Muslim cleric, remains adamantly opposed to a controversial plan to partition Iraq into a federation of three largely independent regions." Sadr's stance differs from that of "intermittent rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim": "The dispute between two of the most influential Shiite politicians in Iraq highlights the bitter divisions between various parties in the country's fragile ruling coalition. The rift also underscores the divisive nature of the federalism issue, which has pitted Sunni Arabs against some Shiites and Kurds." Sunnis reportedly fear being "left with" resource-poor "swaths of the country."

Sadr Aide Describes Vision Of Iraq Without US Troops. The Washington Post (9/12, Knickmeyer, Raghavan, 748K) reports the vision of Mustafa Yaqoubi for an Iraq after US forces leave: "First, 'there will be a civil war,' said the aide, Mustafa Yaqoubi ...The rising violence and rivalries under the American occupation make a shaking-out all but inevitable once foreign forces go, Yaqoubi said. ... 'No matter the number of people who would lose their lives, it is better than now,' he added. 'It would be better than the Americans staying.'" He ultimately envisions the "freedom to usher in a Shiite religious government that ... would be moderate and perhaps comparable in some ways to Iran's." Yaqoubi denies any need for Shiite "gratitude" to the US, saying that the US ousted Saddam Hussein out of its "own interest[s]."

Militias May Be Spinning Out Of Leaders' Control. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Moore, 918K) reports, "As U.S. and Iraqi officials seek a way to disarm Shiite militias involved in the sectarian violence driving Iraq toward civil war, the paramilitary forces are splintering into more extreme groups that militia leaders say they are powerless to control." The Times adds, "A series of devastating paramilitary strikes against Shiite neighborhoods has eroded early gains attributed to the security sweep and severely undermined U.S. arguments for disarming militias." A proposal by Abdelaziz Hakim to install "popular committees" to provide neighborhood security could end up adding to Iraq's "chaotic patchwork of gangsters, revenge squads and insurgents."

Iraqi Elections Said To Have Worsened Sectarian Divisions. McClatchy (9/12, Brown) reports, "Iraq's political process has sharpened the country's sectarian divisions, polarized relations between its ethnic and religious groups, and weakened its sense of national identity, the Government Accountability Office said Monday." The GAO report is called "unusual in its sweep" because it relied "on a series of other government studies, some of them previously unpublicized, to touch on issues from violence and politics to electricity production. Published on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the GAO report was downbeat in its conclusions - underscoring how Iraq's deteriorating security situation threatens the Bush administration's goal of a stable and democratic regime in Baghdad."

Kristol, Lowry Call For "Substantially More" Troops In Iraq. In the Washington Post (9/12, 748K), conservative commentators Bill Kristol and Rich Lowry state, "At this urgent pass, there can be no doubt that we need to stop the downward slide in Iraq by securing Baghdad. There is no mystery as to what can make the crucial difference in the battle of Baghdad: American troops." Shifting troops from one Iraqi area to another weakens control in the former areas; therefore, "we need substantially more troops in Iraq," not just Baghdad.

Shiite-Sunni Dating Wanes In Polarized Baghdad. The Washington Post (9/12, Paley, 748K) reports in a front page article, "For decades, marriages between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq were as ordinary as the daily call to prayer. But the sectarian warfare gripping the country has created a powerful barrier to Sunni-Shiite romances." The breakdown of intermarriage is "a grim foreboding of the future." The Post mistakenly calls the "oppressed" Shiite population a "minority" in Iraq.

Saddam Accuses Kurds Of Sowing Hatred. The AP (9/11, Al-Bashir) reports, "A defiant Saddam Hussein accused Kurdish witnesses at his genocide trial Monday of trying to divide Iraqis by alleging chemical attacks and mass arrests during a crackdown that the prosecution says killed up to 180,000 people." AFP (9/11, Deshmukh) reports the trial as well, saying that Saddam delivered "a tirade from the dock" stating that the trial was a scheme to split "Kurds and Arabs."

The New York Times (9/12, Von Zielbauer, 1.21M) reports, "The trial of Saddam Hussein on charges of genocide against Iraq's Kurds resumed Monday, after a nearly three-week hiatus, while sectarian violence continued on Baghdad's streets, including the suicide bombing of a crowded downtown bus that killed more than a dozen people." In parliament, "lawmakers aligned with the political movement led by the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr came out against efforts to enact legislation that would allow Iraq to be divided into autonomous regions, with Shiites and Kurds controlling the oil-rich south and north. Sunni Arabs, who would be left holding the barren western and central regions, are vehemently opposed to the legislation." American soldiers patrolling a neighborhood in Baghdad reportedly "delivered six headless bodies" and a seventh, unmutilated body to a hospital.

Suicide Bomber Attacks Assassinated Iraqi Governor's Funeral. The New York Times (9/12, Gall, 1.21M) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up Monday at the funeral of the assassinated governor of Paktia Province, killing at least seven people and wounding up to 40. Five of the dead were policemen, and two were children." The bombing was perceived by some "as a message from the Taliban that they are ready to strike in areas outside their traditional homeland, which is in the south, and are showing they can hit where they want." Denial by a Taliban spokesman of responsibility for the funeral bombing may signify "fissures are showing in the Taliban movement, with some Taliban commanders based inside Afghanistan opposed to suicide bombing."

The Washington Post (9/12, A24, Constable, 748K) reports that the bombing was the "third major suicide attack in four days." The Post theorizes that the escalating violence may be part of an "orchestrated offensive by the revived Taliban militia."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorneys Lose Appeal On Overtime Pay. In his "Federal Diary" colulmn for the Washington Post (9/12, D04), Stephen Barr writes, "There's no dispute that Justice Department lawyers worked overtime and on holidays, and there's evidence the lawyers were 'expected and induced' to work extra hours. But that's not enough to win back pay, a federal court ruled yesterday." Barr continues, "Overtime hours must be 'ordered or approved' in advance for pay purposes, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit said. … The ruling is the latest in a long-running class-action lawsuit involving more than 9,000 Justice Department lawyers, but it's not the end of the case." Barr adds, "The agency lawyers, represented by Williams & Connolly LLP, will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court, said Robert A. Van Kirk , a lawyer for the firm. … 'The Federal Circuit's decision essentially guts the Federal Employees Pay Act and gives federal agencies the green light to disregard the mandatory overtime provisions of the law,' Van Kirk said. … The Justice Department would not comment on the ruling. In the past, the department has said that its lawyers are professionals who accept that they will work more than 40 hours a week to carry out their responsibilities." Barr notes, "Yesterday's ruling was the second defeat for the Justice Department lawyers -- many are assistant U.S. attorneys -- at the circuit court. They had prevailed in a federal claims court only to see that decision reversed on an appeal by the department. The lawyers went back to the circuit court in hopes of readdressing certain issues in the case. … The agency lawyers are seeking compensation for overtime, holiday and 'administratively uncontrollable overtime,' a special pay category. The department has said the case covers the period between 1992 to 1999, but the lawyers think the case could extend to the present."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ, FBI Launch Probes Of Hewlett-Packard Leak Investigation. The Washington Post (9/12, D1, Noguchi) reports, "The Justice Department, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a House subcommittee have started their own probes into how Hewlett-Packard Co. investigators obtained private phone records in an attempt to identify a source of company leaks to the media, according to the company and regulatory filings released yesterday." The Post continues, "Last night, the HP board of directors also reconvened to consider ousting its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, who led the company's efforts to identify the source of the leaks from its own board." HP "revealed yesterday in a regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it had been contacted by the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California for information regarding its investigation. … A spokesman for the FBI said the agency also was looking into the methods of HP's investigation. The House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on oversight and investigations has asked HP to submit information as part of the committee's broader look at breaches of private information. Last week, the California state attorney general's office launched its own investigation, and the Federal Communications Commission requested information from AT&T Corp. about the disclosure of the phone records."

The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Carlton, Emshwiller) reports, "A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California yesterday confirmed that his office and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are probing the 'processes employed' in the H-P leak investigation. Separately, a House committee said it is seeking information from H-P about the matter, including the identity of private investigators that H-P has said it used in the investigation, which involved accessing the private phone records of board members and nine journalists." The Journal continues, "The focus of the government inquiries is an H-P investigation that was requested by Ms. Dunn in 2005 and intensified in early 2006. That company probe involved a practice known as 'pretexting,' in which a person's private phone records are obtained by someone impersonating them. … The Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker has disclosed that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out the inquiry and the firm, still unidentified, hired a second firm that used pretexting to obtain phone records. Ms. Dunn has said she knew directors' phone records were being scrutinized, but didn't realize those records had been obtained improperly."

The New York Times (9/12, Darlin) reports, "The company's board, which met inconclusively on Sunday, resumed telephone consultations Monday afternoon. Foremost among the topics was the role of the chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, who the company says first authorized the investigation last year. … Ms. Dunn recused herself from parts of the discussion, according to a person with knowledge of the board's deliberations, leaving the company's outside counsel, Larry W. Sonsini, chairman of the powerhouse Silicon Valley law firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, to preside." The Times adds, "Mr. Sonsini and his firm were consulted at various points in the investigation, according to the company. As a result, his role at the board meeting was 'an odd choice,' said Jeffrey A. Sonnenfeld, a professor at the Yale School of Management who advises companies on corporate governance. 'They have a highly conflicted law firm right now,' he said." The Times notes, "Tne reason for the board's extended talks was reported to be discussion of Thomas J. Perkins, who quit the board in May in anger at Ms. Dunn over the internal investigation. A person with knowledge of the board's deliberations said that Mr. Perkins, a pre-eminent Silicon Valley venture capitalist, sought to return to the board but that members are split on whether he should. … Mr. Perkins's spokesman, Mark Corallo, disputed that report. 'Mr. Perkins will not return to the H.P. board, even if asked,' Mr. Corallo said, but 'he believes in the performance and prospects of the company under the leadership of Mark Hurd.'"

USA Today (9/12, Kessler) reports, "In a five-page letter Monday to HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, the House Energy and Commerce Committee said it was 'troubled' by reports of pretexting. … The letter, signed by two Republicans and two Democrats, asks HP for the names of everyone involved and other data."

The AP (9/12, Robertson) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission has also taken interest in the HP investigation, asking AT&T Inc. last week how the company's private investigators managed to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists."

Bloomberg (9/12, Guglielmo, King) reports, "The new inquiries add pressure on Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who authorized the probe that California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has already said may result in criminal charges. Hewlett- Packard's board is meeting today for a second day to discuss the scandal and consider calls by former director and venture capitalist Tom Perkins for Dunn's resignation."

More Commentary. USA Today (9/12) editorializes, "Just how easy is it for people to obtain your private telephone records? The scandal at Hewlett-Packard provides a stark and troubling answer. … Aside from exposing dysfunction in the HP boardroom, the episode illustrates just how loose phone companies are with customers' records." USA adds, "Despite its obvious deceit, however, pretexting might not violate federal law if is not used for identity theft. California, where HP is based, has more stringent laws, and authorities there are investigating whether any of them were broken. … If nothing else, the events at HP should put pressure on telephone companies to make it harder to get sensitive data. They should adopt restrictions that would keep private records out of the hands of unscrupulous poseurs, such as requiring passwords and mailing records only to the customers' listed addresses." USA concludes, "A federal response might be in order as well, both to set standards for releasing sensitive data and to crack down on the pernicious practice of pretexting, which some Internet companies have turned into a for-profit business model. … Perhaps then, people would feel more secure. And perhaps companies like HP would focus more on their customers, and less on themselves."

Dell Delays Filing Financial Report Amid DOJ, SEC Probes. USA Today (9/12, Acohido) reports, "Amid rising uncertainty about its strategic course, Dell on Monday delayed filing its quarterly report and postponed a high-profile analysts briefing for the second time in six months." USA continues, "The No. 1 PC maker also put its stock-repurchase program on hold and noted that the Justice Department has joined the Securities and Exchange Commission in examining its accounting practices. In a statement with few details, Chairman Michael Dell vowed to make things right. … Federal regulators are examining whether Dell misstated financial reports 'including issues relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items,' Dell said. Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of New York has requested to review accounting documents from 2002 to the present."
